"And I was disappointed," said Miss Wilkins, "for I have often wished to meet a real Gipsy who could tell fortunes, and this seemed to be one."

"Do you mean a real Gipsy or a real fortune-teller?" asked Mrs. Howes.

"Why both, Ma'am."

"I am surprised, my dear, to hear a young lady so well instructed as you have been, speak as if she believed a poor ignorant creature like this capable of foretelling future events; a thing which the wisest of men would not presume to do."

"I do not exactly believe it, Ma'am. I wanted to find out if she could, and it might do no harm."

"A very great deal of harm, my dear,—a great sin, as well as folly—a great injury to yourself and your fellow-creatures, and an exceeding great insult against God."

"Let us hear all about it, if you please, Mamma," said Jessy, rubbing her little hands, and setting herself on the sofa; for Jessy dearly loved to listen to her mother's instructions.

Miss Wilkins said, "I know that many sensible people entirely disbelieve in these things; but does not the Bible tell us of them? The witch of Endor, for instance."

"Yes," answered Mrs. Howes; "and the Bible most positively forbids the holding of any communication with them. Witchcraft, as it existed in early times, was punished with death; and the Lord's most severe displeasure was denounced against such as sought unto those who had familiar spirits: so that, even if you believe these wretched impostors in our days to possess any extraordinary power, you see it is a dreadful sin to listen to them."

"But suppose we do not believe it, Ma'am; and only amuse ourselves with their folly."

"Their folly, my dear, is a very great sin; for it begins in a lie, and fearfully insults the Most High God—assuming either that He is not the supreme Ruler of the world, or else that He cannot hide his designs and counsels from the impious worms of earth; or that He is pleased to hold converse with, and to communicate the knowledge of his purposes to, the most notoriously wicked and profane of persons—such as lie under His wrath, and blaspheme Him daily with their lips and in their lives. And this applies to all the idle methods practised by superstitious people, to find out what shall occur to them. It is a terrible jest with the fore-knowledge of the omnipotent God."

"But, Ma'am," said Miss Wilkins, "I have heard very extraordinary things, proving how much these fortune-tellers know of the concerns of people whom they never saw before."

"Very probable," answered Mrs. Howes; for without seeing them, they could learn from servants and neighbours quite enough to enable them to give a good guess at many particulars. This Gipsy might have found out, with little trouble, from my simple maid servants, as much as might have enabled her to astonish us all with her wonderful knowledge of past events, and to gain attention to her pretended predictions.—By listening to her, and of course paying her for this information, we should at once reward a lying lip, and encourage the unhappy creature to farther deceptions. If the slightest supposition that she might be speaking truth entered our minds, we should be guilty of witchcraft. If we only amused ourselves with her ignorant pretensions to utter prophecies, we must be numbered among the 'fools' who 'make a mock at sin'; and such fools are held in abomination before God. Besides, if we who are supposed to understand our duty, set the example of listening to her for our own senseless diversion, servants and poor people will think themselves right in following it; and they will do so with superstitious belief, regarding her as one who has 'familiar spirits.' They will also be persuaded to squander their earnings in a way most ruinous to their own happiness, for these artful people take care to foretell, in general, great riches and honours to their hearers; and many a simple girl is led by them to leave the path of humble industry, and fix her hopes on something which will never come to pass, but in the expectation of which she may fall into destruction."

"If you had held out your hand to that Gipsy woman, my dear young friend, or listened to her deceitful language, you would have made yourself answerable before God for more sin than you can easily imagine. Every poor creature around us, who should have been robbed, deceived, or puffed up with proud and mischievous conceits by her, might justly accuse you of setting the example, and charge upon you the injury sustained, both here and hereafter."

"No one would have seen us," observed Miss Wilkins.

"Perhaps not; but would the woman have neglected to boast that a young person of education, and of the better class of society, had acknowledged her claims to witchcraft? She knows too well the force of example to let such a circumstance pass by untold. And even were it otherwise, how could you answer to God for the gross insult offered to his divine majesty and wisdom, in permitting a wretched creature like this to claim His awful attributes, and to boast of searching into those 'secret things which belong unto the Lord our God,' and to him alone? Reflect, my dear, upon these solemn words, and judge whether, without dreadful sin, you could lend your ear to so blasphemous a deceiver."

"Mamma," said Caroline, "how does it happen that these people so often discover thefts, and restore lost goods, by directing the losers where to find them?"

"I do not think that it occurs so frequently as you seem to imagine: but greater wonders are performed every day by the Police, and by the same means—active inquiry, carried on with secrecy and perseverance. Besides, it is too often found that the supposed witch is an accomplice in the theft; or has, by terrifying the superstitious mind of the suspected criminal, extorted a confession."

"Have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness," my children; but commit yourselves wholly unto Him who is willing to make all things work together for good to you; and to bless your going out and your coming in, from this time forth for evermore."

Take no thought, O child of dust,

For what to-morrow's dawn may bring;

But in the Lord thy Saviour trust,

And bide beneath his guardian wing.

Thy times are in His hand alone,

That hand which deals thy daily bread:

To him the coming hour is known,

That lays thee with the silent dead.

Would'st thou, a worm of earth, explore

His counsels, hid from angel eyes?

Indulge the impious wish no more,

Nor tempt thy God—"God only wise."

Enough, if through life's path to heaven,

He deign to guide thy devious way;

Enough, that grace and strength be given,

Sufficient for the passing day.

NINEVEH AND ITS REMAINS.*

Since we followed the footsteps of Mr. Stephens through the forest-shrouded cities of Central America, and saw the memorials of its lost civilization brought to light, we have met with nothing half so exciting as this vivid narrative of Mr. Layard's recent discoveries. It has a peculiar interest as recording the acquisition of a noble addition to our national collection of antiquities; mainly, it is but just to observe, through private munificence and private enterprise. With a sense of gratitude to Mr. Layard for his energy and perseverance, we should have welcomed any relation, however bald, of his discovery and removal of the sculptures of Nineveh. But, far from this, we have to thank him, in addition, for one of the most agreeable, as well as important, books of travel in our language. The style of the narration, no less than the interest of the subject itself, will bespeak for it an enduring popularity. Whether we follow the author in his thrilling exploration of the mounds of Ninrou, or wander with him among the nomadic Arab tribes, the Chaldean Christians, or the devil-worshipping Yezidi, our interest never flags. The story flows on with all the attractiveness of romance. Many a delightful episode of pastoral and patriarchal life—many a vivid sketch of climate and scenery—many an amusing and characteristic incident of local manners and customs, diversify the pages of these delightful volumes.

"Although," well observes Mr. Layard, "the names of Nineveh and Assyria have been familiar to us from childhood, and are connected with our earliest impressions derived from the inspired writings, it is only when we ask ourselves what we really know concerning them, that we discover our ignorance of all that relates to their history, and even to their geographical position." The colossal temples, and the sculptured and painted tombs of ancient Egypt, have long been a subject for the research of the learned, with immense and still increasing results. The labours of Sir Gardiner Wilkinson, for instance, have familiarized us with even the minutest particulars of her daily household life. But over fallen Assyria had gathered a dark and seemingly impenetrable cloud of obscurity. She had left nothing beyond a vague and mighty name in history. Besides the shapeless heaps which were supposed to mark the sites of her once stupendous cities, every vestige of her past greatness was believed to be obliterated. Few of us, perhaps, but have seen some representation of the huge and mysterious mound of Ninrou, on the lonely banks of the Tigris; but who could have imagined that from its recesses were to be disinterred, after a slumber of ages, the magnificent memorials of the splendor of the ancient empire of Assyria, from the study of which, her history was to be re-written, her religion, manners, and customs ascertained, and a wide field of collateral inquiries bearing upon the early civilization of Asia, opened to the research of scholars? All this comes upon us with something of the startling strangeness of a dream, and we follow the narration of it with an excitement akin to that of the enterprising explorer. Certainly no discovery of the kind, of equal interest and importance, has been made in an age which is particularly distinguished for its spirit of research and for its love of adventurous travel: none has been more delightfully recorded.

* "Nineveh and its Remains: with an Account of a Visit to the Chaldean Christians of Kurdistan and the Yezidis or Devil-worshippers; and an Inquiry into the Manners and Arts of the ancient Assyrians." By Austen Henry Layard, Esq., D.C.L. London: Murray.

"The ruins in Assyria and Babylonia," observes Mr. Layard, "chiefly huge mounds, apparently of mere earth and rubbish, had long excited curiosity from their size and evident antiquity. They were, at the same time, the only remains of an unknown period—of a period antecedent to the Macedonian conquest. Consequently, they alone could be identified with Nineveh and Babylon, and could afford a clue to the site and nature of those cities. There is, at the same time, a vague mystery attaching to remains like these, which induces travellers to examine them with more than ordinary interest, and even with some degree of awe. A great vitrified mass of brickwork, surrounded by the accumulated rubbish of ages, was believed to represent the identical tower which called down the Divine vengeance, and was overthrown, according to an universal tradition, by the fires of heaven. The mystery and dread which attach to the place were kept up by exaggerated accounts of wild beasts who haunted the subterranean passages, and of the no less savage tribes who wandered amongst the ruins. Other mounds in the vicinity were identified with the hanging gardens, and those marvellous structures which tradition has attributed to two queens, Semiramis and Nitocris. Several travellers had also noticed the great mounds opposite the modern city of Mosul, which were supposed to mark the site of the great Nineveh."

The first to examine these Assyrian mounds with any degree of attention was Mr. Rich, resident of the East India Company at Bagdad. The remains of Hillah near that city, first attracted his notice; and, though his discoveries were but trifling, his memoir on the site has proved extremely valuable. On returning from a journey into Kurdistan, he visited Mosul, and, struck with the huge mounds already alluded to, he made a survey, and even commenced some excavations; but they were not carried far, and he left Mosul, "little suspecting that in these mounds were buried the palaces of the Assyrian kings." As he descended the Tigris, he halted for awhile at the great mound of Nimrou, listened to the traditions about it current in the neighbourhood, and obtained a few bricks with the cuneiform or arrow-headed character, which were afterwards deposited in the British Museum. "A case scarcely three feet square enclosed all that remained, not only of the great city of Nineveh, but of Babylon itself!"

It was during a recent journey in these countries, that Mr. Layard, whose interest had been previously strongly excited by the sight of these mounds, found himself gliding down the Tigris on a raft past the mysterious tower of Nimrou.

"It was evening," he says, "as I approached the spot. The spring rains had clothed the mound with the richest verdure, and the fertile meadows which stretched around it were covered with flowers of every hue. . . . A long line of consecutive narrow mounds, still retaining the appearance of walls or ramparts, stretched from its base, and formed a vast quadrangle. The river flowed at some distance from them; its waters, swollen by the melting of the snows on the Armenian hills, were broken into a thousand foaming whirlpools by an artificial barrier built across the stream. On the eastern bank the soil had been washed away by the current; but a solid mass of masonry still withstood its impetuosity. The Arab who guided the raft gave himself up to religious ejaculations as we approached this formidable cataract, over which we were carried with some violence."

MINISTERIAL RECOLLECTIONS.—No. XXII.

THE MISTAKEN KINDNESS OF THE FRIENDS OF THE SICK.—A DECLINED VISIT WILLINGLY ACCEPTED.

I was reading the sixty-ninth page of the August number of the "Churchman's Penny Magazine," when my attention was arrested by the following question and answer, "Why did you not call on me before?—I have been confined this fortnight."—"Sir, I have made frequent attempts, but was always told you were too ill to see any one."

Now I have no doubt but that this describes a case which my brethren in the ministry, in common with myself, have very frequently had to encounter. By the poor, whose humble dwellings are usually open to receive the visits of their minister—whatever be their state of mind—if he is not received with a welcome, it is happily an exception. But with those of higher grades it is too often otherwise, and various expedients are adopted to keep the messenger of peace and love from those who in many cases I firmly believe, like the "eminent physician," would be very glad to "see their minister." I recollect once to have met with a case of this kind, which may afford some encouragement to my brethren not to give up their attempts, but to persevere as long as any practicable ground remains open for accomplishing an important object and duty. If success after all cannot be obtained, we have at least the satisfaction of having made the attempt, and it may serve to quicken our supplications at the Throne of Grace, that the Lord Himself will do that which His servants are thus unwisely prevented from effecting. It will leave the responsibility,—awful, indeed!—on those who would rather suffer a friend or a relative to go out of the world in ignorance, than that he should be, as they think, disturbed by a visit from a messenger of mercy, coming to bring glad tidings of good things.

There was in my parish a gentleman, who, when he retired from his pursuits in a neighbouring town, had come to take up his abode with a married daughter. He was getting far advanced in life, and had not long been there, when I heard that he was very ill. Their residence was at a distant part of the parish, and I went to see him. I did not obtain access to him, but of this I did not think much, as it was the first call. I therefore repeated my visits several times. I was always very courteously received, but sent away with some excuse.—"Just got into a doze."—"Just been disturbed to take his medicine."—"Very poorly, too ill to see any one to-day."—"Was ordered to be kept perfectly quiet," and such like. At length, finding there was no disposition to admit me to the sick chamber, I thought it my duty to express myself plainly on the matter, and on coming away, I said to the lady of the house, "I have been several times to see your father, and at some inconvenience at this distance, considering it my duty, he being as you admit, very ill, but I have been put off from seeing him. Now I must leave the responsibility with yourself, if he leaves the world without my seeing him. I shall not have to charge myself with neglect, and I have now only to say, that whenever you will send, and let me know when it will be convenient for me to see him, I will most assuredly come, and I shall not trouble you with any further call until you send." This was received very courteously too, with expressions of much regret for my trouble, and thanks for my offer, which would be accepted when opportunity admitted.

The father was however gradually getting worse, and nearer his end, and—whether the daughter was prompted by alarm, or influenced by my decided charge of responsibility, I did not inquire—a few days after, on the Sunday afternoon immediately after my second full service, a messenger came to the church requesting me to go and see Mr. ——. Whether it was expected that I should really go at such an hour on such a day, I did not stop to think, but replied to the messenger, that "I would follow him quickly." On my arriving at the house, I was received with the usual attention, and with many apologies for troubling me at such a time; and I received a very earnest caution as I was passing up stairs to the sick man's chamber, that he was very weak, and therefore 'hoped I would not mention the subject of dying to him, as it might alarm him, and he might not be able to bear it.' To this I only thought it needful to give a respectful token that I heard it as I proceeded.

On approaching the bed of sickness, its occupant immediately put forth his hand, and with an earnest look of satisfaction, said, "O Sir, I am so glad to see you, you are come to see a poor dying man!" He struck the key-note himself. I had no occasion to alarm him. He told me what was evidently the truth. I had no difficulty. He spoke to me as a dying man, and I spoke to him as a dying man. He listened attentively to my statements of the wants of a dying man, and I told him, with all possible plainness, of the only ground of hope, and of the only source of comfort for a dying man; while the party whose fears had been excited, and whose cautions were unnecessary, stood at the foot of the bed, almost astounded at what was going on. But I heeded it not, I had fairly got possession of my ground, and was determined to keep it as long as it was expedient. I prayed with him as a dying man, and he thanked me, and I promised to see him again the next day, if he should be then a living man. I kept my promise, and was admitted without any objection; but though still living it was too evident he was now indeed what he had stated himself to be. He could scarcely either converse or understand, and soon departed to the world of spirits. But the nurse told me that scarcely had he passed a short interval without allusion to my visit, and even my name was almost constantly on his lips. To what extent the Great Head of the Church vouchsafed his blessing, the "great day" alone will discover. But it affords a strong case in proof that sick persons are often themselves far more willing, and even desirous, to see Christian ministers than their friends about them are willing that they should. Perhaps too, it may happen, that when access is obtained, and the truth is set forth in a kind spirit, a blessing may reach the hearts of others who may be present—even the very objectors to the visit. Whether it was actually so in the present case, I would not venture to say, yet I may add a little by way of sequel to my narrative.

As years rolled on apace, and life's chequered scenes came with them, the lady herself became a widow, and from altered circumstances removed to a smaller residence; and as life advanced, affliction too became her portion, and the time did arrive when I was to her, at least, a welcome visitor, especially in seasons of adversity. At length, as I was in my usual course among my people, I heard she was suddenly taken very ill. I hastened to her sick bed. There was no excuse now,—no refusal,—no difficulty in an immediate admission. Death had evidently already seized fast hold on his victim. She listened readily to the only consolation which could be given to a dying woman,—a Saviour's power to save,—a Saviour's compassion and love to souls. Life was fast ebbing. Time with her was soon to be no more. She could bear but little. I promised to see her again in the morning, if life held out. The morning came. I had occasion to be early at a spot near her residence. I sent a message on to say, if it were not too early, I would see her as soon as my business was over. The answer was, she appeared to be in the very article of death, and after less than half an hour's engagement, a messenger met me:—the spirit had departed. She too had her one visit!

Should this meet the eye of any one inclined to put obstacles in the way of a minister's visit to the sick or healthy, may God grant them to see the folly of such a course, and lead them to consider that the time will come when they themselves may be in a position to require, and to value, the visits of one, whose only object is to guide the "dying" to Him "who hath abolished death, and hath brought life and immortality to light through the Gospel."—A Village Pastor.

ANSWERING OUR OWN PRAYERS.

In the vicinity of B———, lived a poor but industrious man, depending for support upon his daily labour. His wife fell sick, and not being able to hire a nurse, he was obliged to confine himself to the sick bed and the family. His means of support being cut off, he soon found himself in need. Having a wealthy neighbour near, he determined to go and ask him for two bushels of wheat, with a promise to pay as soon as his wife became so much better that he could leave her and return to his work. Accordingly he took his bag, went to his neighbour, and arrived while the family was at morning prayer. As he sat down on the door-stone, he heard them pray very earnestly that God would clothe the naked, feed the hungry, relieve the distressed and comfort all that mourn. The prayer concluded, the poor man stepped in and made known his business, promising to pay with the avails of his first labour. The farmer was very sorry he could not accommodate him, but he had promised to loan a large sum of money, and he had depended upon his wheat to make it out; but he presumed neighbour—would let him have it.

With a tearful eye and a sad heart the poor man turned away. As soon as he left the house, the farmer's little son stepped up and said, "Father, did you not pray that God would clothe the naked, feed the hungry, relieve the distressed, and comfort mourners?" "Yes; why?" "Because, father, if I had your wheat I would answer that prayer." It is indeed needless to add that the Christian Father called back his suffering neighbour, and gave him as much as he needed.

Now Christian readers, do you thus answer your own prayers?

OFFICE OF THE BANNER OF THE CROSS.

Messrs. King & Baird have fitted up a new and commodious office on the first floor of the large building, No. 9 Sanson St. (late George street,) above Sixth.

Those wishing to pay subscriptions, to insert advertisements, or to transact any business with the publishers of this paper, will find the office open between the hours of 8 A. M. and 6 P. M.

Communications for the editor are also to be left at this office.

QUIETNESS.

Dear readers, just open your Concordance, if you have one, at the words "Quiet" and "Quietness," and then take your Bibles and trace in the Holy Book of God the blessings which are to flow to man from these sources.

The sweet Psalmist of Israel, whose kindling thoughts were not the offspring of poetic imagination, but of holy inspiration, when describing the glorious ends to which the good Shepherd conducts His flock, says, "He leadeth me beside the still waters," (waters of quietness.)

Messiah's own noble Prophet when telling the people of God how to share the blessings of eternal might, says "in quietness and confidence shall be your strength."

Though perfect quietness may not be found in this unquiet world, belonging to that rest which remaineth for the people of God, yet if Christians only realized the greatness of this blessing so that they would make all needful sacrifices for its attainment, how much more of calm and peace would heavenly Hope and Faith pour upon the troubled waters of life. If men would only consent to be quiet, or, as the Apostle exhorts, "study to be quiet," how much more comfort, how much less tribulation would they find in the world.

These thoughts have been impressed more forcibly upon our mind by a blessed week of quietness spent in a distant country place, far from the noise and strife of cities. In a peaceful parish undisturbed by fears of Rome or Geneva, and in a happy Christian home, where (happy editor!) the sight of a newspaper did not disturb our quiet for a whole week, our pleasant lot was cast. Thus realising what a blessed thing it was to be quiet, we returned filled with thoughts of quietness to our editorial post. With what disquietude were we at once affected by the sight of "heaps upon heaps" of letters, papers, communications, &c. All were opened with the strong resolution of taking things quietly. On this principle we shall for the present, quietly and silently pass over the disquieting articles about "Romanizing," and our friend of the Calendar's remarks upon "propinquity," &c.

If editors would only go now and then to quiet country parishes, it would perhaps make them more careful how they needlessly disturbed their peace, not only with novelties, but with news of which it may truly be said, "where ignorance is bliss, &c."

If it were not for noisy tongues and unquiet pens, we might hope to behold the fulfilment of Isaiah's prophecy, a glorious promise for the Church—"Look upon Zion, the city of our solemnities: thine eyes shall see Jerusalem a quiet habitation, a tabernacle that shall not be taken down."

CHURCH MATTERS.

From the Belfast Commercial Chronicle.

APPOINTMENT OF A BISHOP TO THE VACANT SEE OF DOWN AND CONNOR AND DROMORE.

We are at length enabled to announce, which we do on undoubted authority, that her Majesty has been pleased to approve of the nomination of the Rev. Robert Knox, A. M. to the episcopate of Down and Connor and Dromore.

Mr. Knox is a nephew of the present Bishop of Limerick, Ardfer, and Aghadoc, and in the absence from his diocese of his right rev. relative, has administered its affairs much to the satisfaction of his brethren. We have been informed that he has been for many years a faithful and pious parish minister, is understood to be a man of evangelical principles, and though comparatively speaking young, will bring to the discharge of his high and responsible duties, a mind matured by experience, kindly consideration for those of whom, in the Providence of God, he has been given the oversight, and a warm love for the Church of his fathers. Of his opinions upon the subject of National Education we are not precisely aware; but we have reason to think that if he be inclined towards the system at all (which we doubt), his views are extremely moderate and conciliatory.

We have much gratification in making this announcement, and we entertain a sanguine anticipation that the appointment will be satisfactory to the clergy and laity of the united diocese, and tend to the glory of God and the best interests of the Established Church.

We are glad to hear that the Rev. D. Anderson has been appointed the first Bishop of the newly-formed colonial diocese of Prince Rupert's Land in the Hudson's Bay territory, in North-West America. The locality may probably be better known as the Red River Settlement, which is one of the most interesting stations of the Church Missionary Society. The reverend gentleman was formerly curate at Everton, during the incumbency of Rev. R. P. Buddicom, and accompanied that gentleman to St. Bees College, where he held the responsible post of theological tutor during the whole period of Mr. Buddicom's residence there. The appointment to the Bishopric is in the gift of his Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury, who, we doubt not, has selected the reverend gentleman on account of his great theological attainments and his fervent piety. He will depart to his distant See with the prayerful blessings of his numerous friends and relatives in this town.—Liverpool Standard.

The Vicar of Cockerham, the Rev. John Dodson, has resigned his living, owing it is said, to his holding the same views which led Baptist Noel to secede from the Church. Mr. Dodson was a member of the Evangelical Alliance. The living is worth 600l. a-year, and is vested in four lords of the manor of Cockerham, each of whom has the presentation in rotation. Villiers Dent Esq., has the next presentation.—Manchester Times.

SOCIETY FOR THE PROPAGATION OF THE GOSPEL IN FOREIGN PARTS.—ST. MARTIN'S IN THE FIELDS.—A meeting of the Parochial Association was held yesterday, at eleven A. M., in the vestry-room of St. Martin's, the Lord Bishop of London in the chair. From the crowded state of the room it appeared highly probable, as the Right Rev. Chairman took occasion to remark, that the future meetings of the association would have to be convened elsewhere. The excellent speeches delivered were listened to with the most marked attention throughout. After reading the report, the first resolution was moved and seconded by the Rev. the Vicar of St. Martin's, and the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone. The former presented a striking view of the duties entailed upon the Church of England towards the heathen population of our foreign dependencies, contrasted with the manner in which those duties had been fulfilled. The sad tale of the lost and perishing tribes of America, India, Australia and the Cape, brought under the dominion of Great Britain that they might partake of her spiritual light, not that they might meet their ruin, suggested to the Church of England whether she would be prepared thus to go before the tribunal of her Judge, saying, "Behold! I, and the children whom Thou hast given me." The Right Hon. seconder of the resolution commented with eloquence on the Church's duty towards her colonial branches, and on the primary importance of religious principles in the formation of colonial societies, an importance which it was alike impossible to evade or to underrate.

The vote of thanks to the chairman, moved by Mr. Churchwarden Jervis, and second by Dr. Todd, was cordially acknowledged by his lordship, at the same time that he took occasion to protest against a servant of Christ, whatever his rank in the Church, being thanked for his "condescension" in taking a share, whatever that share might be, in proceedings which ought to tend solely to his glory, and which, without His blessing, must come to nothing; he would, therefore, close the proceedings with invoking that blessing upon all.

ROME.

At Rome, on the 10th instant, there were some attempts at a re-action, which were easily put down by the National Guards. The disturbance arose from the demand for the delivery of bells. The following notice, issued by the Direction of Public Security, details the circumstances:—

"Yesterday the law of the Republic was not respected. Three commissioners, conformably with the decree of the Assembly, having demanded of the heads of the congregation of St. Philip the delivery of certain useless bells, they refused, not directly, but they displayed hypocritically the Holy Sacrament, as if to avert a plague, and as if the religion of Christ depended on a bell the more or less. By these means the said congregationists succeeded in assembling round the establishment a crowd, composed of the most uneducated part of the people.

"The Commissioners, not wishing to employ force, suspended their proceedings, thus giving a proof of the prudence and humanity of the Republic in discharging its duties.

"But the Roman people, indignant at this perfidious and hypocritical act, determined that the law should be respected, so in the evening a large number of brave citizens presented themselves at the said establishment to demand that the decree of the Assembly should be executed. No one answering their summons, and the gates being barricaded inside, the people set fire to them, and soon opened a passage. The authorities now interfered, assisted by the National Guard and Carbineers, and the fire was extinguished. On entering the house it was found that the young Priests had been confined and chained by the old ones, and the former on being liberated rushed with eagerness into the arms of the citizens and soldiers who had released them.

"Finally, every thing has been religiously respected and the law upheld; the bells are in the power of the Republic, except that of St. Philip, which has been left; but the sons of lying and malignity, who have endeavoured to mislead the people, will be severely punished; they are now in the hands of the Republic!" Rome, March 11.

"F. Meucci, Director.

The Minister of the Interior has issued a proclamation, stating that the Government have no intention of despoiling the Churches of the necessary bells, they only require the useless ones to be surrendered for the public service.

From Rome we learn that the Republican Government are hastening preparations for war. The little news that we have from the Holy City is confined to the recital of acts of democratic tyranny. The arrests of cardinals, bishops, abbés, and priests, continue upon the most frivolous pretences, and fines are inflicted without the slightest provocation. Passports however perfectly en règle, are totally useless.

Cardinal Mezzofanti, the celebrated linguist, died at Rome on the 16th ult:—

"He was born at Bologna on the 19th of September, 1774, and was consequently in the 75th year of his age. He was nominated Cardinal-priest in 1838, and held the office of Prefect of the congregation of the Books of the Oriental Church. Mezzofanti was a native of Bologna, and was educated at the university there. A zealous anxiety to confer spiritual assistance on the various foreign soldiers who in the stirring times of Bonaparte filled the hospitals of the city, first led the Rev. Joseph Mezzofanti, then chaplain to these institutions, to the study of modern languages. He soon discovered that, by some peculiar mental adaptation, the acquirement of any given dialect was to him the most quick and facile undertaking imaginable; and, about the time when Lord Byron made his acquaintance, he could fluently converse in every European idiom. Since then he became master of all the Oriental forms of speech, and there was scarcely a spoken jargon, from the Himmelaya mountains to the Andes, of which Mezzofanti had not made the comparative anatomy. Personally he was most affable, and generally beloved in Rome."

SUMMARY OF FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

In France the National Assembly has authorised the Government to interfere in Italy, if they shall think it necessary, by taking possession of certain places in Piedmont. The French army in consequence, has approached nearer to the frontier, to be ready to act according to circumstances.

The disastrous conflict at Novara, on the 23rd ult. has destroyed all hopes of the foundation of a Constitutional Monarchy in the North of Italy. Charles Albert, after fighting with more than his usual gallantry, was with difficulty forced from the field of battle by his Generals. The Republican faction will now have it all their own way, for it is not to be supposed that the Austrians can permanently retain possession of Lombardy.

The Sicilians still persist in rejecting the ultimatum of the King of Naples, and are preparing for war with the greatest energy and determination.

War was fully expected to commence between Denmark and Germany on the 3rd instant.

The Archduke John has resigned, and the King of Prussia has been elected Emperor of Germany. It is considered probable that he will accept the office, but upon certain conditions. The affair, therefore, will not be settled immediately.

General Bem has taken Hermannstadt, and departed, after sacking the city. The Imperialists have taken the town of Comorn, but the citadel still holds out. The Magyars are said to have crossed the Theiss.

From India the news is that Lord Gough has totally defeated Shere Singh at Gojjerat, and captured his camp, with most of his guns. This satisfactory result is mainly owing to the promptitude of General Whish in securing the ford of the Chenuah, near Wuzerabad, and thus preventing Shere Singh from marching to Lahore. Sir Charles Napier seems fated to be a day too late. However, he will have plenty to do to keep the country quiet when he arrives in the Punjab.

Ireland is full of Sir Robert Peel's plan for the colonization of Connaught. It is simply a copy of King James the First's plan for the colonization of Ulster, minus the religious part of it, which was its chief recommendation.

BOARDING SCHOOL FOR YOUNG LADIES.

It will be seen, from the advertisement, that Mrs. A. C. Tilghman has opened a school for young ladies, at No. 313 Walnut street. We have great pleasure in complying with a request to call the attention of our readers to the school.

The Principal, well known in this city, enjoys the highest confidence of her numerous friends. The manner in which she discharged the important duties of Matron, in the Girard College, and the happy influence she exerted there, are well known to others. If any thing more were needed to inspire confidence, the high character of the gentlemen whose names are given as references would be sufficient. As we have such good reason to believe that this school will deserve success, so it has our sincerest wishes for its prosperity.

DOMESTIC MISSIONS.—We are desired to state that, Edward Wilcox, Esq., No. 128 Chesnut street, in this city, has consented to act as Receiving Agent for the Domestic Committee of the Board of Missions, until further notice. The Clergy and others having funds for this department of Missions will confer a favor by paying the same into his hands.

THE SCHOOLS AT BURLINGTON.

An announcement, similar to the following concerning Burlington College, in relation to St. Mary's Hall will be found under the head of Church Intelligence.

We are happy to learn that these Institutions, so important to the Church, have every promise of increased extension and success.

BURLINGTON COLLEGE.

The undersigned, Trustees of Burlington College, in taking charge of the economical and pecuniary affairs of the Institution, deem it right to announce to Parents and other, who are interested in it, that their object has been the relief of the Right Reverend President, from the ever recurring and annoying details and responsibilities incidental to the financial department: leaving to him, as heretofore, and to the Master and Teachers under him, the direction and control of the whole process of Education; subject, of course, to the proper supervision of the Board.

Burlington College is not yet three years in operation; and already it numbers, in its Collegiate Classes, and Preparatory Forms, one hundred and twenty-seven pupils. This institution was the conception—it is not too much to say, is the creation—of Bishop Doane; to whose ardent aspirations, in the cause of sound Christian Education, in such a Diocese as this, all things seemed possible. If all he anticipated has not yet been realized, much has been accomplished. Burlington College began without funds, and without endowments of any kind. It now possesses a beautiful and valuable estate, convenient buildings, and a respectable Library and Scientific Apparatus; subject to a debt for a portion of the purchase money of the real estate, secured by the property. Subscriptions for the enterprise, amounting to eleven thousand dollars, have been obtained: and, if, as the Trustees confidently anticipate, the future growth of the College shall keep pace with the past; and it shall be seen and felt by the Church in the Diocese, and by the friends of good education, that both are to be advanced by every thing that tends to strengthen Burlington College, and founded as it is upon a rock, there seems little risk in assuming that, in a few years, the debt will be paid: leaving the College unshackled and vigorous, for a long career of honour and usefulness.

As conducing to this end, and to confirm confidence in the prosperity and efficiency of the College, and to relieve the Bishop from pecuniary liabilities and duties, with which he ought not to be burthened, the Trustees have designated three of their number, Messrs. E. B. D. Ogden, J. C. Garthwaite, and R. S. Field, as a Provisional Committee, to manage and direct all receipts and expenditures for the College: who, in pursuance of authority given to them, have appointed Mr. Robert B. Aertsen their financial Agent, to reside at Burlington. To him, all payments or remittances, on account of maintenance and instruction at the College, are to be addressed; and by him, under the direction of the Committee, all expenditures are to be made.

Upon this state of facts, the undersigned, Trustees of the College, invite the confidence, not only of the Parents and Guardians of those who are now members of the College, but of those who may be looking for a safe and efficient place of education for their children.

The Terms at the College—two of five months, in each year—begin 1 May and 1 November. April and October are vacations. The whole charge for the Term, is one hundred and fifty dollars, payable in advance.

Application for admission should be made to the Right Reverend Bishop Doane, President; or to the Rev. James W. Bradin, Head Master, Burlington, New Jersey.

New Publications.

Absence from the city prevented an editorial notice in the last Banner, of the excellent publication whose title is given below. Although a clerical friend favoured our readers with a Review of this work last week, we cannot withhold the following additional commendation; it comes from a clergyman of this city, whose endorsement is a surety to be depended upon. There is no more trying hindrances to our carrying out the noble purposes of the Gospel, than the vain excuses by which Christians are kept from a faithful use of the more solemn means of grace. We trust this publication may be effectual in removing some of these obstructions from the path of life, and so prove a blessing to many souls. It is published by H. Hooker & Co., Chesnut and Eighth streets.

"AN ANSWER TO ALL THE EXCUSES AND PRETENCES WHICH MEN ORDINARILY MAKE FOR THEIR NOT COMING TO THE HOLY COMMUNION." By Archbishop Syngé.

"WITH A PREFACE AND A SERMON ON THE PERPETUAL OBLIGATION OF THE INSTITUTION OF THE LORD'S SUPPER." By the Rev. M. A. De Wolfe Howe, Rector of St. Luke's Church, Philadelphia.

Few works have enjoyed a larger measure of popularity than this little tract of Archbishop Syngé. It has been for many years on the catalogue of the Society in England for Promoting Christian Knowledge, and has been distributed over the whole christian world. The editor states, in his preface that, in 1808, it had passed through thirty-eight editions in London. In the forty years which have since elapsed, many thousands of copies must have been circulated. The wonder is that a work so admirable in its kind, and so much needed among us, had not been long since reprinted in this country. We take this opportunity to express our gratitude to Mr. Howe for bringing it before the church at this time, and to Mr. Hooker, the publisher for the beautiful manner in which it is got up. It is well-timed, and cannot fail, we think, to be eminently useful here, as it has been elsewhere.

The author was a man eminent for piety and talents in his day and generation. He had "the singular fortune of being a bishop, the son and the nephew of a bishop, and the father of two bishops." He died in 1741, at the advanced age of four score and two years; having held the primacy of Tuam for a quarter of a century. His religious tracts, of which this is one, are a beautiful and enduring monument to his memory.

The excellent sermon by Mr. Howe is a fit companion for the Archbishop's tract, and will be found particularly valuable in this meridian, where the errors which it is designed to remove, so generally prevail. Let all who make "excuses and pretences for their not coming to the Holy Communion," read this little volume attentively, and they "will by God's grace return to a better mind."

LADY MARY; OR, NOT OF THE WORLD. By the Rev. CHARLES TAYLER, M. A. Author of "the Records of a good Man's Life," "Margaret, or the Pearl." Third American edition. New York: Stanford & Swords, 137 Broadway.

We are unable, not having had time to peruse it, to express any opinion of the particular merits of this work. The fact of its having reached a third edition is a proof that it has secured no small share of public favor. One thing we can say in its behalf, and no small recommendation, it is printed in remarkably good type.

THE INTELLECTUAL PRIMER, whereby a child may learn to spell and read in one third of the time usually employed for that purpose. Philadelphia: H. Hooker & Co.

The ambitious title of this little publication, we must admit, excited a prejudice against it. An intellectual Primer! The name suggests sad thoughts of infant minds blighted, of the tender buds which have withered and fallen into premature graves, under the forcing system applied by vain parents or cruel pedagogues to secure the earliest developments of intellect! The monuments of this system are to be found chiefly in our graveyards. But the title, and we hope in a second edition it may be changed, does great injustice to the Primer. It has not in reality the dropsical tendency which the label promises. It is a sensible, and well arranged Primer, suited to its object. It does not at all deserve the abusive epithet "intellectual." Nor do we think that it belongs to the "high pressure" steam power Primer, or that it will carry the infant mind along a railroad, or by telegraph, to the end proposed. It is a good old fashioned turnpike, a little smoother and easier for the traveller perhaps, but both teacher and pupil will have to pay the usual toll. A friend has favoured us with the following account of this little work, which will more fully explain its object.

"The great attention which has been paid of late years to elementary books for children, has induced the author of this Primer to endeavour to shorten the time which is usually employed to teach a child to read. The Primer professes to effect that object in one third of the time usually employed for that purpose. If the Primer accomplish this even in one half of the time usually employed, a great improvement has been made, and he will deserve the thanks of the public. We should like to see the thing fairly tried by those who have children to whose situation it is suited: that is, to all who are old enough to learn and yet do not know their letters. The chief features in the book appear to be its extreme simplicity, and the easy manner in which the pupil is carried along from syllables of two letters to words of three syllables in the course of a few lessons."

For the Banner of the Cross. THE RAISING OF SAMUEL.

BY M. R. T.

Within the shadow of the rifted crags
The mountain wolf had sought his lair, and like
The mingling footsteps of a countless host
The autumn rain upon the withered leaves
In mournful murmurs fell; and night winds crept
With dismal sighs across Gilboa's wilds,
When from the sleeping camp the king went forth.
A darker cloud than that which in its folds
Enveloped all the hills, was on his brow;
His step was regal still and firm as when
Of yore amid the gathered tribes he stood,
A graceful stripling at the prophet's side,
And heard the loyal shout that made him king.
His giant form, that like the forest pine
Had soared on Mizpah's plain above the throng
Of mail clad chiefs, was still unbent with years,
And in its iron prime the strength revealed
That on an hundred fields had backward rolled
The tide of war, and made his name a fear
Wherewith Philistine mothers oft had stilled
The cries of children trembling at their knees.
Unquenched within his martial eye there burned
The blaze of that heroic courage still
That in his youth before him drove like sheep
The scattered rout of Amalek, and o'er
The plains of Moab scourged the gentile brood
That with its presence mocked the camp of God.
But from his cheek the bloom had passed away
That like the crimson sunrise on the sea
Had tinged the dusky olive of his youth.
Upon his manly visage bronzed by toil
And desert marches and the watch fire's light
The majesty of peace no longer dwelt;
But from the gloomy portals of his soul,
Like caged and cruel vultures through their bars,
Looked forth remorse and desolate despair.
Before his eyes in visioned horror rose
The priests in sacrilegious fury slain,
Their snowy robes all stained with gore
And on their sacred brows the furrows deep and red
Of his apostate sword. Within his ears
Forever rang, as if they called for doom,
The smothered cries of Hebrew babes that from Their mother's bleeding arms were dashed, when by His stern command the sacred city fell.
In dreams or by the voice of holy men,
Or on the mystic breastplate's awful front
No sign appeared, and in the frown of Heaven,
As in the shadow of a thunder cloud,
His proud and melancholy footsteps lay.

Upon the night breeze came

From far, above the sound of dashing rain,
The warlike murmur of the heathen host
That with its thousand camp-fires lit the sky,
And with the sound of desert drums and clash
Of cymbals sharp the midnight silence broke.
That morn with tread that shook the harvest fields
And banners streaming in the golden dawn
Through Shunem's gates their countless spears had passed,
And in her crowded ways their hostile hordes
With tumult fierce and wild confusion swarmed.
In Judah's rocky camp the sound was heard
And in his heavy sleep the soldier turned
And dreamed of laughing children in his vine-clad home;
And as around his neck he felt once more
Their little arms entwined, awoke in tears.

Across the hills and through the forest paths
And o'er the stormy plain the monarch strode,
And stood at length within the cavern'd gloom,
Where with the beasts among the mountain wilds,
An outcast from the brotherhood of man,
In fearful solitude the sorc'ess dwelt,
Whose voice, as white-lipped rumor trembling told,
Had power by dark mysterious spells
From out the voiceless realm of dusty death
The living shapes of buried men to call.
Her wrinkled form with years and sorrow bent
Upon the wall a ghastly shadow cast,
And like the sea-foam on her shoulders streamed
Her long disheveled hair. A light like that Which gleams from out the eyes of dying men
Was o'er her pale and hollow features cast,
And on her ashen cheek the dreadful smile
That madness in its rapture wears. She seemed
A living death forever doomed to bear,
Amid the ruins of decrepit age,
The weary load of joyless life that prays
In vain for dreamless slumber in the grave.
Upon the king her mournful gaze she turned
And o'er her withered limbs a shudder passed
As with a frozen voice he bade her call
The spirit of the buried prophet up
Whose bones were hearsed in death at Ramah.
The air was calm and not a sound save that
Of falling rain among the forest leaves
Was heard, and like a giant statue stood
The king, breathless and still amid the gloom,
And on the dusky air his vision bent,
When with her gaunt and shriveled arm upraised
And with a muttered charm she bade him "come!"
A peal of thunder shook the midnight sky;
And as it died among the distant hills
There came a sound upon the ebon air
As if an earthquake struggled with its chains
And from its prison gloom was rushing forth.
A wild unearthly gleam the cavern filled,
And in its dim and lurid light stood forth
A pale majestic form.

The woman shrieked with fear, and from the king
Burst forth a groan, as to the earth he reeled
And on the rocky floor his armor rang;
"I see, I see," she screamed "the form of Gods
From out the womb of earth ascending rise!
Such as he was when in his robes he stood
To judge the tribes, he stands! an aged man
With frowning look and locks like drifted snow
And o'er his form a prophet's mantle thrown!"
She ceased, and like the sound of sullen floods
There came a sad and solemn voice that cried,
"Wherefore with rude disquiet from the dust
Hast thou provoked my resting soul, and called Me up to earth O false degenerate Saul!
Behold from out thine hand the Lord hath rent
Thy kingly power! upon thine uncrowned brow
The dews of death already stand, and ere
The shadows of another night shall fall
Thou and thy princely sons with me shall be!"
The voice was hushed, and like the viewless wind
The shadowed form had fled.

The storm had passed.

Slowly the king rose up; and as he went
The light of morning stars revealed big tears
That stood upon his cold and bloodless cheek. }

THE TWENTY-SEVENTH ARTICLE.

MR. EDITOR:—

Strange as it may appear, this Article which was intended to set forth distinctly the doctrine of the Church on the subject of Baptism, has received almost as many interpretations as the Scriptures which it was intended to explain. This diversity of exposition has arisen, I think, first, from inattention to the language of the Latin copy of the Article, which is of equal authority with the English; and secondly, from not comparing the Article with the Homily which explicitly defines the meaning of a Sacrament. From a comparison of the two, and of the word "promise" as employed in the latter, with the same word as sometimes used in Scripture, it will be seen that "instrument," "signed and sealed," and "promises," have all been misunderstood.

"Baptism (says the Article,) is not only a sign [signum] of profession, and mark [nota] of difference, whereby Christian men are discerned from others that be not christened, but it is also a sign [signum] of regeneration or new birth, whereby as by [per] an instrument, they that receive baptism rightly are grafted into the Church; the promises of the forgiveness of sin and of our adoption to be the sons of God by the Holy Ghost are visibly signed and sealed,* [obsignantur], faith is confirmed and grace increased by virtue of prayer to God."

First, as to the "Instrument." This is of a double character; it is a grafting and a sealing instrument. With it the great spiritual vine-dresser marks the scions while he inserts them in the stock. It is not, therefore, like an instrument of parchment, to be passively sealed upon; by it, actively, an impression is made.

Next, as to the Sealing. The word is employed in the New Testament to indicate several modes of suretyship. 1. Sepulchres were made secure by sealing a stone.† (Matt. xxvii. 66.) 2. The sign of circumcision was a seal or ratification of the righteousness of faithful Abraham. (Rom. iv. 11.) 3. They in Corinth who were "in the Lord," were the seal or evidence in that city of St. Paul's Apostleship. They had been converted through his medium, and as they had witnessed, they could bear witness to the signs of his Apostleship. (1 Cor. ix. 2.—2 Cor. xii. 12.)‡ 4. The Son of Man was by God the Father sealed, or designated for sacrifice.§ (St. John vi. 27.) 5. St. Paul says, that "the foundation of God standeth sure, having this seal, the Lord knoweth them that are His; and, let every one that nameth the name of Christ depart from iniquity." (2 Tim. ii. 19.) An allusion is here supposed to be made to the custom that prevailed of "engraving upon some stones, laid in the foundation of buildings, the names of the person by whom, and the purposes for which the structure was raised." (See Rev. xxi. 14.) The walls of the Church of God, therefore, have a double inscription. Under this head may be classed certain passages which represent the faithful members of the Church as marked with a seal to indicate their relationship to God, and their possession of the consequent privileges, e.g. "In whom also, after that ye believe, ye were sealed with that Holy Spirit of promise, which is the earnest of our inheritance," &c. (Eph. i. 13.) The sealing mentioned in the Article, it will be seen presently, was of the last sort.

Again; The word Promise is used in the New Testament as well for the fulfilment, as for the original making of, a pledge. In the Acts i. 6, the disciples are enjoined to wait for the "promise," which, said the Redeemer, "ye have heard of me." (See also Heb. xi. 39.) The Greek word employed signifies both promise, and the fulfilment of a promise. (In the Latin language, Dare promissa may be rendered, either to give, or to fulfil, promises.) Webster in his Dictionary very properly remarks, that "in Scripture the Promise of God is the declaration or assurance which God has given in his Word of bestowing blessings on his people. Such assurance resting on the perfect justice, power, benevolence, and immutable veracity of God cannot fail of performance." The promise may have respect to the Church at large, and to particular members of the human family. It may also be absolute, independent of human agency; or conditional. If blessings are pledged to particular persons, to be bestowed conditionally, the promise is fulfilled the moment

* The signing and sealing are not different marks or operations.

† Books were also sealed, and their contents secured. (Rev. v.) St. Paul sealed or secured to the poor saints at Jerusalem certain contributions. (Rom. xv. 28.)

‡ See also St. John iii. 33.

§ See Horne's Introd. III. 279. This passage, however, has been differently interpreted.

the conditions are performed. "The Lord is not slack concerning his promise, as some men count slackness. One of the conditions may be that the persons interested shall submit to have the promise outwardly sealed to them. In that case the sealing is the visible evidence of the fulfilment.

Before I quote the Homily of "Common Prayer and Sacraments," it must be observed that there are but two passages of the New Testament in which the promises of God or the Spirit of promise are expressly declared to be sealed to Christians. The first (Eph. i. 13,) has already been quoted. The other is 2 Cor. i. 20, 21, 22. "All the promises of God in Him (i. e. in Christ) are YEA, and in Him AMEN, unto the glory of God by us. Now He which stablisheth us with you in Christ, and hath anointed us, is God, who hath also sealed us, and given the earnest of the Spirit in our hearts." If, therefore, the Articles and Homilies of the Church speak of the sealing of God's promises, we who uphold the Articles and homilies are irresistibly led to the inference that these two are the passages on which the doctrine of the "sealing" is founded. We must either explain away the passages, and find others better suited to the Articles and Homilies, or we must adopt the conclusion.

The views of the Reformers on the subject of the Christian Sacraments are thus formally set forth in the Homily referred to:—

"The common description of a sacrament" is, "that it is a visible sign of an invisible grace; that is to say, that setteth out to the eyes and other outward senses the inward working of God's free mercy; and doth, as it were, seal in our hearts the promises of God." "As for the number" of the Sacraments, "if they should be considered according to the exact signification of a sacrament—namely, for the visible signs expressly commanded in the New Testament, whereunto [as unto a seal] is annexed the promise of free forgiveness of our sins, and of our holiness and joining in Christ,—there be but two, viz., Baptism and the Supper of the Lord. For although Absolution hath the [sealed] promise of forgiveness of sin; yet by the express word of the New Testament it hath not this [sealed] promise annexed and tied to the visible sign, which is imposition of hands. For this visible sign—I mean laying on of hands, is not expressly commanded in the New Testament to be used in Absolution, as the visible signs in Baptism and the Lord's Supper are; and therefore Absolution is no such sacrament as Baptism and the Communion are. And though the Ordering of Ministers hath this visible sign and [sealed] promise; yet it lacks the [sealed] promise of remission of sin, as all other sacraments besides the two above named do. Therefore, neither it nor any other sacrament else be such sacraments as Baptism and the Communion are."*

At the ordination of ministers, then, there is a visible sign, and there is a fulfilled promise; just as in the case of Timothy, (1 Ep. iv. 14,) an ecclesiastical "gift" which had been pledged, was conferred at his consecration to the sacred office. But this sealed gift is not that of the remission of sins. When Absolution is authoritatively pronounced to the penitent, it may be accompanied or unaccompanied with the imposition of hands; upon the official declaration the promise contained in St. John, xx. 23, is fulfilled; but the use of the sign is not absolutely necessary. In Baptism and the Lord's Supper there are signs and fulfilled promises; the promises are so annexed and tied to the signs, that they become, as it were, sealed in the heart, and the privileges vouchsafed are remission of sins, holiness or sanctification, and union with Christ.†

To revert now to the 27th Article. Does the Word of God authorize it to connect the "promises of the forgiveness of sins, and of our adoption to be the sons of God by the Holy Ghost," with baptism? Four passages shall reply. "Repent, and be baptized, every one of you, in the name of Jesus Christ, for the remission of sins." Acts ii. 38.‡ "Arise and be baptized, and wash away thy sins." xxii. 16. "Ye are all the Children of God by faith in Christ Jesus; for as many of you as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ." "As many as received him, to them gave he power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on his name." Gal. iii. 26-7.—St. John, i. 12.

The Article being thus interpreted by a reference to the Homily and to Scripture, the writer humbly conceives that it cannot easily be misunderstood. It is proper, however, that a word or two should be added, touching the sentence of the Homily which immediately follows the one first quoted:

"And so was Circumcision a sacrament; which preached unto the outward senses the inward cutting away of the foreskin of the heart, and sealed and made sure, in the hearts of the circumcised, the promise of God touching the promised seed that they looked for."

* According to a theory which has been earnestly propagated, the "promises" mentioned in the 27th Article are made but not fulfilled in Baptism. The promise of something future is supposed to be sealed in that sacrament. But let us suppose that "promise" in the Homily above quoted simply signifies a pledge of something future; then we may repent and be baptized, and with faith receive the Holy Communion weekly, and humbly listen to the declaration of absolution every time that we attend the services of the Church, and still be without the assurance of pardon; and this may continue till the day of our death. And the Ministers of Christ who think that at Ordination they were sealed, that a "gift" was conferred upon them, must hope on, hope ever, till they actually obtain the gift. Salvation, which includes remission of sins, is promised to ministerial fidelity. (Rev. ii. 10.) The Homily, therefore, must mean that at Ordination a promise is fulfilled by being sealed; or else the passage must be condemned as unscriptural.

† "The Church of God (says Bp. Pearson) in which remission of sins is preached, doth not only promise it at first by the laver of regeneration, but afterwards also upon the virtue of repentance; and to deny the Church this power of Absolution, is the heresy of Novatian." (On the 10th Art. of the Creed.)—When penitents in the ancient Church were after excommunication received into favour, "all the absolutions" "were accompanied with imposition of hands and prayer." (Bingham, 1st Sermon on Absolution.)

‡ "In vain (says Bp. Pearson) doth doubting and fluctuating Socinus endeavour to evacuate the evidence of this Scripture."

Did Circumcision, it may be asked, seal in the heart the promise of God respecting the Saviour in precisely the same sense that the Christian sacraments seal the promises?

The answer is, No; by no means. 1. If it did, it would in efficacy equal the sacraments of Christ; and the ordinances of the Gospel, instead of being the antitypes, would be but the reproduction of those of the Law. 2. The ancient patriarchs and prophets, although they died in faith, "received not the [fulfilment of the] promises, God having provided some better thing for us." (Heb. xi. 13, 39.) That they were "accepted" we cannot doubt. But they nevertheless desired to see the things which we see, and to hear the things which we hear, without receiving all the blessings with which we are crowned. No language could more forcibly declare their need of something invaluable than this of our Lord, "Verily I say unto you, among them that are born of women there hath not risen a greater than John the Baptist; notwithstanding, he that is least in the kingdom of heaven is greater than he." 3. The Christian sacraments, according to Scripture and the Homily, seal in the hearts of believers the promises of God. But this is not all. Certain promises are made to the sacraments received rightly. Thus it is said, "Repent and be baptized for the remission of sins." No similar promise was made to Circumcision. The original promise "touching the promised seed" was announced to Abram in the land of Uz; and in faith he received it. Several years afterward, in the land of Canaan, "he received the sign of Circumcision, a seal of the righteousness of the faith which he had yet being uncircumcised." This constitutes a very important distinction between Baptism and Circumcision. When, therefore, the author of the Homily, probably adopting a definition of St. Austin,² declared that Circumcision sealed in the hearts of the circumcised the promise of God, &c., he used the word seal in a somewhat different sense from that given to it in other passages. He doubtless meant that in Circumcision the original promise was ratified.

MACAULAY.

I ask the privilege of submitting to the public, through the columns of your paper, a few strictures upon Mr. Macaulay's history, and I flatter myself that the privilege will not be denied me, since a sense of justice and regard for historic accuracy are the motives, which impel me to ask it.

That this popular author has produced an exceedingly fascinating book, I am not at all disposed to question. Every impartial reader must be charmed by his glowing eloquence, the grace, beauty, and richness of his narratives, as well as the skillful and at times splendid analysis of his characters. But here, all just praise of the work must end. It will not stand the test of time, the best touchstone of a great history. It cannot endure the scrutiny of a close and discriminating criticism. It is not unfrequently deficient in accuracy of statement, justness of view, and profound philosophy. The calm and philosophic observer of the stirring incidents and sublime movements of the past is too often merged in the excited advocate and the warped reviewer.

On page 39, vol. 1, cheap edition, I read the following:—"The founders of the Anglican church had retained Episcopacy as an ancient decent, and convenient ecclesiastical polity, but had not declared that form of church government to be of divine institution."

Just compare the statement with the preface, which was prefixed by those very founders to the ordinal in the book of Common Prayer. "It is evident unto all men diligently reading Holy Scripture and ancient authors, that from the Apostles' times there have been these orders of ministers in Christ's Church, Bishops, Priests and Deacons. No man shall be accounted or taken to be a lawful bishop, priest or deacon in this church, or suffered to execute any of the said functions, except he hath had Episcopal consecration or ordination."

In 1552, these very founders, thus distinctly declared their doctrines upon this all-important subject. And to whom I ask should we refer for an exposition of their views, if not to themselves; and what must be thought of the historian, whose business it is to record facts and opinions as they are, when we find him, looking away from such a pregnant assertion of the divine source of the ministry in the threefold order, and persisting in maintaining that Episcopacy in the Anglican church, was a merely ancient decent and convenient ecclesiastical polity?

The historian proceeds, "We have already seen how low an estimate Cranmer had formed of the office of a bishop."

It is a matter of record, that in 1570, (Mr. Macaulay exhibits no very great partiality for dates,) Cranmer did hold views upon this subject, that would have sustained the statement of the historian, if Cranmer had not subsequently, by the most decided language and in the most public manner, abjured them. But surely the learned historian and his learned readers have not forgotten that even in 1540, he did not hold them firmly, and that "in 1543 he allowed that order is a gift or grace of ministration in Christ's Church, given of God to Christian men by the consecration and imposition of the Bishop's hands upon them." He cannot have forgotten that in 1548 his catechism insists on the divine commission and apostolic succession.

We have heard, through Mr. Macaulay, the oft repeated tale of the low views, entertained by Cranmer, of the office of a Bishop; but what reader of this celebrated historian, not otherwise informed, would ever have supposed that this very Cranmer was instrumental in drawing up the preface to the ordinal above referred to; and that this was his settled, deliberate, and unchanged judgment upon the subject? See necessary defence, 277—"Palmer on the Church," &c., &c.

Passing over the few intermediate sentences, which are scarcely remarkable, I light upon the following.

"When the States General of the United Provinces convoked at Dort, a Synod of doctors, not Episcopally ordained, an English Bishop and an English Dean sat with those doctors, preached to them," &c., &c.

² Bp. Horsley thinks that some of the Reformers placed "an undue reliance" on the authority of St. Austin. (Sermon on 1 Pet. iii. 18-20.)

This allusion to the Synod of Dort, though in immediate connection with the assertion, "that the founders of the Anglican church retained Episcopacy only as a decent and ancient ecclesiastical polity," could have no reference to it; and I will not so far insult Mr. Macaulay's capacity as to intimate that it was ever designed to have. The founders of the English church published, to the world, their view in 1552, while the Synod of Dort was convened in 1618.

The Church of England sent no deputation to the Synod of Dort, none at all. "The instruction and commission of the four deputies that went were solely from the King. They had no delegation from the Bishops, and consequently were not representatives of the English church." What they did, therefore, was in no way binding upon the Church, and was no compromise of either her honor or consistency. It is true the learned historian says that they were commissioned by the head of the English church, but why did he preserve such profound silence, respecting the English bishops, who had no such agency in the matter as could involve them in any great share of the responsibility.

But again, it is necessary that I refresh the memory of the historian. Bishop Carleton did solemnly protest before this very Synod against the thirty-one articles of the Belgic confession, which inculcated ministerial parity, and assert the divine origin of Episcopacy. Now, what shall we say of an historian, who adduces the fact of one Bishop and Dean sitting among the doctors of the Synod of Dort, as proof that the English church held low views of the office of a Bishop; and yet omits to inform his readers that that Bishop and Dean were not sent by the Church at all, and that the Bishop did openly protest against the thirty-one articles which alleged ministerial parity, and challenge contradiction? Jeremy Collier, vol. 7, 488, Grant, &c., &c. I admit that the omission saves the logical reputation of the passages, but truth in a history is of far higher importance than logical precision.

Mr. Macaulay is a brilliant writer. He paints with pencil of a consummate artist the scenes he describes. He is at times a keen and powerful discriminator of character. And all these are admirable qualities in an historian. His is a beautiful, clear, rich and copious style, which is of high importance. His fertile imagination imparts interest to the most barren and arid wastes. But it seems to us that he has not yet attained the power of painting things as they are, rising above the mists of prejudice, merging the reviewer in the historian, the zealous partizan in the calm and enlarged observer of men and things. I have given you, one short paragraph in illustration of this opinion, and may, perhaps, when I find a leisure moment, give you one or two more. Let this suffice for one reprint, and let the admirers of Macaulay pause before they indiscriminately praise, and weigh before they implicitly receive his standard in the measure of historic accuracy.

MR. EDITOR:

Your correspondent has recently received two pamphlets from New York, styled one the Voice of the Anglican Church on Confession, and the other the Voice of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States on Confession. He desires to return his thanks for the favours.

I send you an extract from that learned Anglican Doctor Bingham, quoted by Rev. M. Curtis in his masterly Sermon before the Convention of North Carolina on Sacerdotal Absolution, published by request in 1843. In that sermon, the learned author enforces the doctrine with power, that "God is the efficient, his ministers the instrumental cause of remission and of all other spiritual blessings which are derived to us through the offices of the church." So far the sermon as to the general power of the ministry.

The extract from Bingham is taken from remarks on that part of the Anglican Liturgy which exhorts "to the opening of one's grief," and the unburdening of an unquiet conscience to some Godly minister, "that by the ministry of God's Holy Word he may receive the benefit of Absolution," &c. In remarking upon this, the judicious Bingham says,—"This I take to be the true state of the case, as to what concerns the necessity of a particular confession and a particular declaratory absolution. It is not simply necessary for all men, but only for those whose condition is such that they cannot have peace and satisfaction without it. And therefore the Church of Rome is highly to blame which imposes the absolute necessity of a particular confession and a particular absolution universally upon all men, in all cases of mortal sin, under pain of damnation." (Sermon II. on Absolution.)

In agreement with the Anglican Bingham is the Augsburg Confession—"that private confession and absolution are to be retained in the Church, though the confession of all sins is an impossibility, and is not binding on the conscience."

And in agreement with the above, are the sentiments of Calvin. He thus writes—"I have no intent to deny the usefulness of private absolution; but as I commend it in several places in my writings, provided the use be left to men's liberty and free from superstition; so to bind men's consciences by a law to it, is neither lawful nor expedient." Again—"It happens not rarely that a person who hears the general promises which are given to the whole congregation, remains in some doubt and his mind continues uneasy, lest he has not himself obtained remission. If such an one opens the secret wound of his mind to his pastor and hears that passage of the gospel directed particularly to himself,—"Be of good cheer, thy sins be forgiven thee"—it will give his mind the confidence of security, and relieve it of that alarm by which it was before disturbed. The entire efficacy of the ministry of the keys consists in this, that the grace of the gospel is publicly and privately sealed to the minds of the faithful by those whom the Lord hath ordained." (Inst. L. iii. c. 4, § 14.)

Now a few remarks of your humble friend will close this communication, and I would say, just after reading the two "Voices," one after the other, that neither of them to my mind, brings out the full doctrine of the churches, of which they profess to be "written voices."—And the reason is, because both are extreme and partial.

The "Anglican" seems to be deaf to the judicious voice of the really Anglican Bingham, making the necessary discrimination, as to the obligation of private confession, which discrimination is made in the Prayer Books of both the Anglican and American churches. The extracts given from various authors are not "integra et perfecta," but "by halves," rather by hundredths. Compare even the extracts given, and the doctrine taught is not the same—for example, Hugh Latimer—Bishop, and Usher—Arch Bishop, with Sparrow—Bishop, and Dove—Doct.

The "Protestant Episcopal," on the other hand, has forgotten that the church authorises and recommends private confession in some cases, as above noticed. So does Calvin strongly, and I see no reason which should forbid a Priest from using, if desired, a singular form of absolution, as "Be of good cheer," &c., or the Anglican form. But the general form even after private confession, I consider the more perfect form as more strongly tending to cultivate faith, and realize our fellowship in the body of Christ—it is more unselfish, so to speak—more like "Forgive us our trespasses."

The effect of imposing private confession by law, and making it imperative on the conscience under pain of damnation, has been most blightingly witnessed in some of the churches of the Roman obedience; conscience is too sacred—too tender a principle to be forced or put under restraints other than God has imposed, without the most appalling deadliness. Says Palmer, "It may be asserted as a matter of public notoriety that the state of morals in all orders of society, in the Roman churches of Italy, Spain, Portugal, France, (and we may add Mexico,) is immeasurably degraded and corrupt; and what is worse, that the very persons whose lives are spent in the most infamous vices, are assiduous in their attendance on all the offices of the church—they are constant at confession, (to the priest,) &c. "The harlots and assassins of Spain confess, communicate and return to their sins."

Would to God we had more faith in the ministrations of the Church—that we could believe, that every thing she says and does for us has a meaning and effect through Christ; that we are members of the very body of Christ—that we will be condemned if we doubt our privileges and fail to claim and realize them in that Body—that the great congregation is no mockery—that Christ is "in the midst of them." MR. EDITOR:—

As it frequently happens that in country parishes, it is difficult to get plans of churches at all, and is next to impossible to get good and economical designs, I would beg leave to recommend to all such, the plan and elevation for a cheap church, communicated by Frank Wills, Esq., Architect, New York, for the November number of "The Spirit of Missions." To those requiring a more costly offering to Almighty God, I would recommend something similar to the beautiful design for Trinity church, S. Francisco, by the same talented Architect.

CHEERFUL OBEDIENCE, SULLEN OBEDIENCE, AND DISOBEDIENCE.

When children are away from home, they are bound to obey those to whose care their parents have entrusted them. Three boys, Robert, George and Alfred, went to spend a week with a gentleman, who took them to be agreeable, well-behaved boys. There was a great pond near his house, with a flood-gate, where the water ran out. It was cold weather, and the pond was frozen over; but the gentleman knew that the ice was very thin near the flood-gate. The first morning after they came, he told them they might go and slide on the pond, if they would not go near the flood-gate. Soon after they were gone, he followed them to see that they were safe. When he got there, he found Robert sliding in the very place he had told him not to go. This was disobedience outright. George was walking sullenly by the side of the pond, not so much as sliding at all, because he had been forbidden to venture on the dangerous part. This was sullen obedience; which is, in reality, no obedience at all, because it comes not from the heart. But Alfred was cheerfully enjoying himself, in a capital long slide, upon a safe part of the pond. This was true obedience. Suddenly, the ice broke where Robert was sliding, he immediately went under water, and it was with difficulty that his life was saved. The gentleman concluded that Alfred was a lad of integrity, but that his two brothers were not to be trusted. Obedience secured him happiness, and the confidence of the kind gentleman with whom he was staying; while the others deprived themselves of enjoyment, lost the gentleman's confidence, and one of them nearly lost his life; and yet, to slide on the dangerous part of the pond would have added nothing to their enjoyment. They desired it from mere wilfulness, because it was forbidden. This disposition indulged, will always lead boys into difficulty; and if they cherish it while boys, it will go with them through life, and keep them always "in hot water."—Anecdotes for Boys.

Think how unfit it is that a child or a fool should be left to itself, and you will perceive the difference betwixt what God chooses and ordains for us, and our own conduct and management of ourselves under the influence of headstrong appetites, blind passions and worldly tempers. Think how eligible and happy it is to live under a wise government, and wholesome laws regularly executed, rather than in a state of wild confusion, where every man is at liberty to do what is right in his own eyes, without law or restraint, and you will have some faint conception of the superior excellence of God's universal government, and the much greater happiness of living in subjection to it. Think of his commands as proceeding from unerring wisdom, and you will see the fitness and necessity of every one of them; you will be convinced that he has revealed and appointed them as a means of our happiness, and feel a secret pleasure in reflecting, that whatever is the state of the country to which we belong, whether it is better or worse ordered than many others, it is every man's own fault if he does not live under the best and wisest government in the world.—Rev. Thomas Adam.

In Easter week the Bishop visited the churches in Northampton and Bucks counties. In Trinity Church, Easton, he confirmed eight, in St. James the Less, Bristol, eight, in Yardleyville, one. In the other parishes there were no confirmations.

On Sunday, A. M., (April 22d,) the Rev. Charles W. Quick, Minister of St. Paul's, Chester, and St. Martin's, Marcus Hook, was admitted in the former church, to Priest's Orders. The Bishop preaching and administering the Communion.

In the afternoon of the same day he preached and confirmed one, at Marcus Hook; in the evening, preached and confirmed three, in Chester.

On Wednesday, A. M., at St. Andrew's Church, Philadelphia, the Rev. Samuel Randall was admitted to Priest's Orders—sermon by the Rev. Dr. Ducachet.

On Sunday, April 29th, the Bishop preached and confirmed eight, in St. Thomas Church, White Marsh; in the evening—preached and confirmed nine in St. Luke's, Germantown.

The Rev. Samuel Randall, minister of Trinity Church, Carbondale, was admitted to the order of the Priesthood, on Wednesday, the 25th of April, (Festival of St. Mark), in St. Andrew's Church in this city. The sermon was delivered by the Rev. Dr. Ducachet, the candidate was presented by the Rev. Dr. Stevens. These gentlemen, together with the Rev. Dr. Morton, Rev. Thos. R. Lambert of the U. S. Navy, and Rev. Mr. Watson of Newark, N. J. united with the Bishop in the imposition of hands.

Mr. Randall has been elected Rector of Trinity Church, Moorestown, New Jersey. Here I preached my first sermon

The Rev. J. W. HOFFMAN, has resigned the Rectorship of St. John's Church, York, Pa., and is at present officiating in All Saints' Church, Wolcott, Conn. His residence is Waterbury, Conn., to which place he wishes all Communications for him to be directed.

CONVOCATION OF NORTHERN PENNSYLVANIA.

The Vernal Session of this Convocation commenced on the 17th inst, in St. John's, Bellefonte. The Rev. Messrs. Natt, Morris, Elsegood, and Clark, were present. The Rev. Mr. Elsegood read evening prayer. Rev. Mr. Clark, the lessons. The Convocation sermon was preached by Rev. Mr. Morris, from St. Mark, 4: 26, 27, 28.

On Wednesday morning, Rev. Mr. Morris read prayers, Rev. Mr. Elsegood, the lessons. Rev. Mr. Clark preached from Psalm 51, verse 17. The Holy Communion was then administered by Rev. Mr. Natt, assisted by Rev. Mr. Morris.

In the afternoon, Rev. Mr. Morris read prayers, and Rev. Mr. Clark, the lessons. Rev. Messrs. Natt, Elsegood, and Clark, delivered addresses, chiefly with reference to the Choctaw Mission.

In the evening, Rev. Mr. Morris read prayers, Rev. Mr. Clark the lessons. Rev. Mr. Elsegood preached from Mark 5, 1 to 3.

On Thursday morning, Rev. Messrs. Morris and Elsegood conducted divine worship, and Rev. Mr. Clark preached from Luke 5, 17.

In the afternoon, Rev. Messrs. Clark and Elsegood conducted the service, and Rev. Mr. Morris preached from 1 Corinthians, 15, 33, followed by Rev. Mr. Elsegood in an address.

In the evening, Rev. Messrs. Clark and Morris conducted the service, and Rev. Mr. Elsegood preached from Daniel 10, 19. Rev. Mr. Natt closed the services with an address to his congregation and with prayer.

Among the items of business transacted at our private sessions, was the appointment of a Committee to confer with the Bishop in reference to procuring a Missionary for Jersey Shore and Lock Haven. St. Matthew's, Sunbury, was designated as the place of meeting for the summer session.

Great changes have passed over our Convocation since we first assembled in Williamsport two years ago. Towanda and Wellsborough are no longer in connection with us; Muncy, Bloomsburgh, Danville, Huntingdon and Lewistown have all parted with the pastors who met with us on that occasion, and in the Summer after. Muncy has twice exchanged. Bloomsburgh, Danville, and Lewistown are now supplied, and Towanda and Wellsborough also supplied, are now connected with the North-eastern Convocation; and Rev. Mr. Colton has left Pike, in Bradford county, and gone South. It is sad to realize these changes; but we hope and pray for better things. We are very distinctly taught that "here we have no continuing city."

Our meetings were interesting, and for myself I can say they were instructive. May they prove so to all.

BISHOP DELANCEY'S VISITATION.—On Sunday, April 15th, Bishop DeLancey visited St. John's Church, Canandaigua, and officiated morning and afternoon. The Bishop preached twice and confirmed at the morning service fourteen persons.

On Sunday, April 22, Bishop DeLancey visited Zion Church, Palmyra, where he preached morning and afternoon, and confirmed at the former service seven persons.—Gospel Messenger.

CONNECTICUT.

CONSECRATION AT NORWICH.—On Wednesday the 18th, the new and beautiful Church at Norwich, was consecrated by the Rt. Rev. Bishop of the Diocese, to the service and adoration of the blessed Trinity.

Morning Prayer was read by the Rev. Mr. Vail of Westerly, R. I., the Rev. Mr. Pitkin of New Haven reading the Lessons. The Bishop read the Ante-Communion Service, the Rev. Mr. Nichols of Cheshire reading the Epistle. The Sermon was preached by the Rev. Dr. Williams of Trinity College; after which the Holy Communion was administered by the Bishop assisted by the Rev. Mr. Baldwin of Guilford, and the Rector of the Parish.

In the afternoon the holy rite of Confirmation was administered to seventeen persons; the Rev. Mr. Scott of Massachusetts, reading prayers, the Rev. Mr. Prentiss of the Sermon, and the Rector reading the Confirmation Preface.

There were present beside the clergy above named the Rev. Messrs. Hallam, Bennet, Park, Camp, Hithcock, Willey, Roberts, and Brewster.

We most heartily congratulate the worthy Rector of Christ Church and his liberal minded parishioners, on the completion—in part at least—of the noble work which God has put it into their hearts to undertake. Many a heart that has long since mouldered into dust beside or beneath the newly erected Church would have leaped for joy could it have anticipated the auspicious services, which we have been permitted to chronicle.

Too much can hardly be said in commendation of the edifice; whether we consider the severe and impressive character of its architecture, or the admirable adaptation of its arrangements. Every thing about it is real, and everything tells. We annex from one of the local papers, the following description, which it is proper to preface with the statement that Mr. Upjohn is the architect.

"It is in the early English style, and built of the brown sand stone, quarried at Chatham on the Connecticut river. The interior length of the nave is 85 feet, its width 58 feet; the length of the chancel being 24 feet, its width 27 feet, making the full interior length of the Church 109 feet; extreme length outside 121 feet; extreme outside width 67 feet. At the eastern bay of the south side, there is a porch 17 feet by 17. On the south side of the chancel is a vestry 17 feet by 13. Communicating with the chancel, and on the north side, a large porch 25 feet by 13, leading into the north aisle. At the west end where the ground is depressed about 10 feet below the level of the chancel end, it is intended to erect a Chapel or Sunday School room, 50 feet by 30. On the south-west corner there will be a detached tower, connected with the Chapel by a covered passage, but not communicating directly with the body of the Church, in consequence of the great slope of the ground from the east to the west end, the floor of the tower being nearly 18 feet below that of the Church. The tower is to be 21 feet square and 100 feet in height, with a turret containing a winding stairway on the south-west corner, and on the other corners buttresses which run up into pinnacles. The body of the building is divided into nave and aisles, the nave being 30 feet wide, and the aisles 24 feet each. In these are 150 pews, which seat between 7 and 8 persons. The roof is of wood, and is supported by 8 columns, 4 on each side, between the nave and aisles. The arch pieces, principal rafters, are all shown, being planed and chamfréd. The roof is not of one pitch, but is broken over the columns, the roof of the nave being of a steeper pitch than that of the aisles. The timbers are colored with a rich dark sienna, and ceiling between the rafters an ultra marine blue.

The roof and aisles are lighted by 9 pointed windows; 5 on the north, and 4 on the south side. In the west gable of the nave there is also a large wheel window. The chancel window is a triplet, filled with stained glass, in rich and appropriate designs; and the other windows of the Church are filled with plain glass, in diamond panes, toned down to a warm grey, which intercepts the glare of the sunbeams, and yet admits the requisite light.

The nave and chancel are separated by a noble arch 23 feet in span. The floor of the chancel is elevated several steps above that of the nave, and the sacrarium, or part of the chancel within the rail, is one step higher.

The altar stands against the east wall of the chancel, and behind it is an altar screen with tablets.

The pulpit is placed against the east wall of the nave, at the north side of the chancel arch, and is entered from the chancel by a stair case winding around the jamb of the arch. The reading desk is on the south side of the chancel, just within the arch. On the south side of the chancel within the rail are sedilia, and opposite, on the north, a credence table and Bishop's chair. Outside of the rail are the stalls. The organ, in a gothic case, is in a gallery over the porch, at the eastern bay of the south side.

The altar and its screen, sedilia, stalls, pulpit, reading desk, organ case, gallery front and pews, are all of black walnut.

There is also a panelled wainscoting of black walnut running around the Church and chancel. A massive stone font stands near the south porch.—Calendar.

ILLINOIS.

ORGANIZATION OF A SCANDINAVIAN PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN CHICAGO, ILLINOIS.—The Rev. Gustav Unonius, Missionary at Manitowoc, in Wisconsin, has communicated some highly interesting information relative to a recent movement among his Scandinavian brethren in Illinois. We subjoin a copy of the Petition, which they have forwarded to the Bishop of Illinois, asking to be received under the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of that Diocese, and sincerely trust that their request may be granted. The following extract from Mr. Unonius' letter, gives a brief but satisfactory account of the movement; and we insert it as a suitable introduction to the Petition. He says:

"At the commencement of this year I received a letter from a countryman of mine in Chicago, Illinois, where about 6 or 700 Swedes and Norwegians are residing,—expressing the desire of himself and others that I should visit them. They had heard that many of their countrymen in Wisconsin had entered into communion with our Church; and, their ecclesiastical affairs being at present rather in a state of confusion, they wished earnestly to make it a subject of deep consideration with themselves, how they should best order these important matters, to the end of which they wished to have some conversation with me as a clergyman of the Church, and as their countryman. I accordingly asked, and received permission of the Bishop to leave my parish for a few weeks, and went to Chicago, where I officiated and preached several times to the Scandinavians. In private and public conversation I represented to them their duty in regard to the Church, and the claim which the Church had upon them. The Prayer Book and the Constitution and Canons of the Church, were examined and explained in several meetings which they had during the time I spent among them. Some copies of a "Manual for Churchmen,"—translated by me into the Norwegian language, and printed at the expense of our Tract Society—were distributed, and carefully studied, promoting, as I think, in no little measure, a result, for which I have all reason to be thankful to God. The Swedes met first, and resolved to organize into a parish, in communion with the Church; honoring me with a call to become their Rector. Soon after, some of the Norwegians declared themselves willing to unite with the Swedes. Accordingly, both parties drew up and adopted a Constitution for a Parish, and forwarded a petition to the Rt. Rev. Bishop of Illinois, by which they respectfully asked to be received into communion with the Church of that Diocese. A copy of this petition, signed in behalf of the Parish by the Wardens and Vestry, I have at hand, and do hereby forward to you, to make what use of it you think proper. The matter now rests in the hands of the Bishop. The late overflowing of the rivers in Illinois has cut off all communication with that part of the state where the Bishop resides, and retarded his answer, so that probably it will not reach me before a week or two. If he—as I hope—will receive under his jurisdiction the lately organized Scandinavian Parish in Chicago, and institute me as the Rector thereof, I have, of course, no choice. Providence has opened for me a way to become more useful to the Church than remaining here, and I should do wrong did I not improve the opportunity thus afforded me. My present place can be supplied by many, who are in all respects more qualified for this station than I am; when again, there is of the Church none but myself who now are able and ready to take charge of a Scandinavian Parish, many members of which are more or less acquainted with the English language. That I, therefore, under such circumstances leave a station occupied by me merely a year, will, I hope, meet with your approbation.

"Of the Scandinavians in Chicago, there are yet comparatively but a small number who have united with the Church; but, I trust, that many will follow their example. Some of the Norwegians are members of a Lutheran parish, organized at that place, having for its minister a Norwegian gentleman, ordained in this country. In adopting, like many other Lutheran societies, the doctrines and mode of worship of the Presbyterian denomination, he has entirely laid aside the Liturgy of the Church in his native land, and introduced an extemporaneous mode of worship, which latter circumstance, perhaps, more than anything else, has opened the eyes of many of the Scandinavian Lutherans, as to the true condition of the Lutheran Society in this country, convincing them that it by no means corresponds with the Church which—unfortunately having the same party name—with a true Episcopal government, is by law established in our native land. It might, perhaps, be worth noticing, that many of the Swedes in Chicago left Sweden as members of a fanatical sect, called Jansenites, after a peasant in that country, Erik Jansen, who like another Joe Smith, pretended to have immediate revelations from God, and formed a Society very similar to the Mormons in America. Not tolerated by the government of Sweden, and expelled, Mr. Jansen and followers emigrated by hundreds to this country, where, in a kind of Fourierite association, they have settled in the western part of Illinois, there in possession of considerable property. It seems as if it had been reserved to freedom of sentiment and liberty to effect what compulsion and force could not accomplish. Some of them have been made to see the errors of their way, and the imposition for which they were near to losing the salvation of their souls. Suffering the loss of their share in the common property—everything that they had being given up to their Prophet and his society—they have left all, and are now anxious to return into the bosom of the Church. Other seceders among the Jansenites, a more numerous body remain—after what I am told—in the interior of Illinois, where they have turned Methodists. My situation in Chicago will probably place me in communication with many of these people, and perhaps it is the will of Providence that here, far from our native land and the Church of our fathers, I might be an humble instrument, in the hand of God, to bring them back into the universal Church of Christ."—Spirit of Missions.

ATHENS.—From the Rev. Mr. Hill, advices have been received, dated 21st February, at which date all were well. The following is an extract:

"We have just received the news of a change in the British Representative here. Sir Edmund Lyons, who has for the last fourteen years been British Minister at this court, and who, during the whole of that period, and for many years before, when he was commander-in-chief of the naval forces of Great Britain on this station, was our steady friend and faithful adviser, has been at length rewarded with a much better post,—Switzerland. The whole community regrets the departure of this excellent gentleman and his lady, the devoted friends of our Mission, and the patrons of everything that could promote the welfare of this country. Our individual loss is irreparable. His successor, Thomas Vyse, Esq., is highly spoken of as a gentleman of ability, universally esteemed, and distinguished for his efforts in the cause of national education.

CONSTANTINOPLE.—Bishop Southgate writes, under date of Feb. 8th:

"I can have no doubt that it is my duty to return to America, and to take my family with me. Indeed, the last seems necessary, even if I resume operations here in behalf of the Board; and I shall not, probably, think of bringing them again to this country if I come myself.

"This point being settled, it is desirable to leave as soon as possible. I cannot be ready before the first of April, and I cannot leave then, unless I have in hand the funds necessary for the purpose; that is, unless I shall have received the amount of the appropriation for the present half year, in addition to the arrears of last year still due. I beg you, therefore, to use all expedition in this matter, and let me not be long in waiting. If I wait, the funds necessary for going home will be consumed here. The receipts must get ahead of the expenses, in order to furnish me with the means of travelling. I beg you, therefore, to use all diligence in this matter. It will be necessary, to anticipate my appropriation for the second quarter, or I cannot leave. At least, this is my present prospect. Money received for a quarter already past, has been spent before it arrives. I therefore entreat you and the committee to favor me so far as to give me the means of going home. If the balance of the funds required is not sent until this letter is received, I suppose it will not reach me in time to leave before the first of May. But I shall get away at the earliest moment possible."

The foregoing extract is published to show the importance of prompt and liberal contributions from the friends of the Constantinople Mission, in order to meet the views of Bishop Southgate. The Foreign Committee are most unaffectedly desirous of doing this, but without the means it is simply an impossibility. The contributions to this Mission, since the circular letter was issued on this subject, will hardly reach $700, and after drawing all that could be spared from the General Fund, there is still needed to complete the appropriation up to first of July next, the sum of $726 07.

NINEVEH AND ITS REMAINS.

The obstruction was, in fact, caused by an immense dam, one of the monuments of a great people, undertaken to ensure a supply of water to the endless canals that formerly covered the country. Struck by this wild and impressive scene, Mr. Layard from that time formed the design of thoroughly examining the mounds whenever he might have it in his power.

It was not until the summer of 1842 that he revisited Mosul, where he found that M. Botta, the French Consul at Mosul, to whose high and disinterested character Mr. Layard bears most cordial testimony, had commenced excavations in the large mound on the opposite side of the river, called Kouyunjik, and to this gentleman is due the honour of having first discovered an Assyrian monument. A peasant having reported to him that sculptures existed in the mounds of Khorsabad, at a short distance, he directed excavations to be made, and soon opened one of a series of chambers, covered with representations of battles, sieges, &c. "His wonder may easily be imagined. A new history had suddenly been opened to him; the records of an unknown people were before him." Inscriptions in the cuneiform character were attached to these sculptures, like the hieroglyphics to the Egyptian bas-reliefs. As it was generally admitted that this character was not used after the Macedonian conquest, the sculptures were referred to a more ancient period, even to the inhabitants of Nineveh. Unfortunately, the gypsum slabs, reduced to lime by the fire which had consumed these ruins, rapidly decomposed on exposure to the air. This remarkable discovery M. Botta immediately communicated to the Institute of France, and the government of that country immediately placed at his disposal ample funds, with which he carried on his excavations, and, having secured for his country many fine specimens of Assyrian sculpture, he returned to Europe with a rich and important collection of inscriptions.

The researches of M. Botta, which were not carried beyond Khorsabad, raised Mr. Layard's enthusiasm to the highest pitch. He had already suggested Nimroud for M. Botta's examination, who had, however, declined the proposal. He spoke to others on the subject which haunted his mind, but for a long time without encouragement. At length our enterprising discoverer obtained the funds necessary for at least a partial exploration, through the munificence of Sir Stratford Canning, but for whose public spirit the French nation would in all probability have acquired that noble collection of Assyrian antiquities now happily secured to the British Museum.

Although the principal obstacle was thus removed, there were not a few others. Mr. Layard had received the most friendly assistance from M. Botta; but there were others at Mosul, it seems, who did not share his sentiments. Some measure of caution, and even of secrecy, was needful; and thus, giving out that he was going to hunt wild boars in the neighbourhood, Mr. Layard again descended the Tigris from Mosul on a raft, and at sunset reached the well-known ancient dam. He was accompanied by Mr. Ross, a British merchant, (from whom he received the greatest assistance, and who afterwards continued the excavation,) besides his janissary and a servant. They landed to seek the shelter of a neighbouring village for the night. It proved to be a heap of ruins, and they were about to return to pass the night upon their raft, when by the glare of a fire they caught sight of the family of an Arab crouching round a heap of half-extinguished embers. This man, named Awad, had, he found, long been acquainted with the ruins, and entertained him with traditions concerning the mighty Nimroud. Mr. Layard at once opened to him his views, and concluded an agreement with him. Awad set off in the middle of the night to procure assistance from a short distance. Meantime, sleep fled from Mr. Layard's eyes.

"Hopes long cherished were now to be realized, or were to end in disappointment. Visions of palaces underground, of gigantic monsters, of sculptured figures, and endless inscriptions," he says, "floated before me. After forming plan after plan for removing the earth and extricating these treasures, I fancied myself wandering in a maze of chambers from which I could find no outlet. Then again, all was reburied, and I was standing on the grass-covered mound. Exhausted, I was at length sinking into sleep, when, hearing the voice of Awad, I rose from my carpet and joined him outside the hovel. The day already dawned. He had returned with six Arabs, who agreed for a small sum to work under my directions. The lofty cone and broad mound of Nimroud broke like a distant mountain on the morning sky. But how changed was the scene since my former visit! The ruins were no longer clothed with verdure and many-coloured flowers; no signs of habitation, not even the black tent of the Arab, was seen upon the plain. The eye wandered over a parched and barren waste, across which occasionally sweeps the whirlwind, dragging with it a cloud of sand."

And now commenced the exciting search. Some fragments of sculpture picked up by the Arabs were encouraging signs, and the angle of an alabaster slab peeped up above the soil. Soon discovering indications of an entire chamber, their labours were only interrupted by night. Next day the excavations were continued, and many other objects came to light, such as the figure of a man, partly gilt. At this, Awad, who had his suspicions that Mr. Layard's object was the discovery of hidden treasure, carefully collected the fragments of gold leaf, and calling him mysteriously aside, exposed them. "O Bey," said he, "Wallah! your books are right, and the Franks know that which is hid from the true believer. Here is the gold, sure enough, and, please God we shall find it all in a few days. Only don't say anything about it to those Arabs, for they are asses, and cannot hold their tongues. The matter will come to the ears of the Pasha." The Pasha of Mosul, whose character is capitably drawn, had in fact already received from his spies exaggerated rumours of the wealth obtained. The cupidity and jealousy of the Cadi and principal Mussulmen were excited, and they soon began to throw every possible obstacle in the way of further discoveries.

Meanwhile, Mr. Layard had increased his force to thirty workmen, the excavations were carried on actively, and at length, on the afternoon of the 28th November, came to light, for the first time, the top of a bas-relief. The Arabs, no less excited than our discoverer, notwithstanding a violent shower of rain, worked until dark, and completely exposed to view two slabs, covered with elaborate sculptures of battle-scenes. This gratifying discovery had scarcely been made, when an agent of the Pasha appeared to forbid the prosecution of the work. Upon this Mr. Layard rode to Mosul to explain and to remonstrate. The Pasha told him that it was with deep regret that he had discovered that the soil invaded had been used as a burial ground by the Mussulmen, and the Cadi had already complained of its desecration. "No," said the Pasha, "I cannot allow you to proceed. You are my dearest and most intimate friend; if anything happens to you, what grief should I not suffer! Your life is more valuable than old stones—besides, the responsibility would fall upon my head." On returning to Nimroud, Mr. Layard was not long in discovering the artful proceedings of the Pasha. He had privately ordered an Agha to make some graves in the mound. "We have destroyed," confessed this agent to Mr. Layard, "more real tombs of the true believers in making sham ones than you could have defiled between the Zab and Selamiyah. We have killed our horses and ourselves in carrying these accursed stones." It was now time to get rid of these petty annoyances, and having ascertained beyond question the importance of the discovery, Mr. Layard lost no time in acquainting Sir Stratford Canning, with a view to obtain an order from the Porte, to prevent interference by the local authorities. After a short visit to Bagdad, he returned to the scene of operations, and found that another Pasha had been appointed, who was favourably disposed towards him. He had still, however, to contend with Mussulman suspicion and intolerance. The Cadi of Mosul was endeavouring to stir up the people by representing that the infidels were not only carrying away treasures, but searching for inscriptions to prove that the Franks once held the country, upon the discovery of which they intended to resume possession, and exterminate the true believers. For a while, therefore, he thought it better to visit and conciliate a neighbouring tribe of nomadic Arabs, from whose predatory propensities he feared some eventual interruption. In the middle of February he returned, and cautiously continued his explorations. And now every day brought with it some new and important discovery—mural tablets, winged lions, figures of marvellous form, with traces of extensive chambers running deep into the mysterious mound.

On returning one morning from a visit to a neighbouring encampment, Mr. Layard saw two Arabs of this tribe urging their mares to the top of their speed.

"On approaching me," he says, "they stopped. 'Hasten, O Bey,' exclaimed one of them—'hasten to the diggers, for they have found Nimrod himself. Wallah! It is wonderful, but it is true! We have seen him with our eyes. There is no God but God,' and both joining in this pious exclamation, they galloped off, without further words, in the direction of their tents.

"On reaching the ruins, I descended into the new trench, and found the workmen, who had already seen me as I approached, standing near a heap of baskets and cloaks. Whilst Awad advanced and asked for a present to celebrate the occasion, the Arabs withdrew the screen they had hastily constructed, and disclosed an enormous human head sculptured in full out of the alabaster of the country. They had uncovered the upper part of a figure, the remainder of which was still buried in the earth. I saw at once that the head must belong to a winged lion, or bull, similar to those of Khorsabad and Persepolis. The expression was calm, yet majestic, and the outline of the features showed a freedom and knowledge of art scarcely to be looked for in the works of so remote a period. I was not surprised that the Arabs had been amazed and terrified at this apparition. It required no stretch of imagination to conjure up the most strange fancies. This gigantic head, blanched with age, thus rising from the bowels of the earth, might well have belonged to one of those fearful beings which are pictured in the traditions of the country as appearing to mortals, slowly ascending from the regions below. One of the workmen, on catching the first glimpse of the monster, had thrown down his basket and run off towards Mosul as fast as his legs could carry him. Abderrahman, followed by half his tribe, now appeared on the edge of the trench. When they beheld the head, they all cried together, 'There is no God but God, and Mahomet is his Prophet!' It was some time before the Sheikh could be prevailed upon to descend into the pit, and convince himself that the image he saw was of stone. 'This is not the work of men's hands,' exclaimed he, 'but of those infidel giants of whom the Prophet—peace be with him!—has said, that they were higher than the tallest date tree. This is one of the idols which Noah—peace be with him!—cursed before the flood.' In this opinion, the result of a careful examination, all the bystanders concurred."

THE REVELATIONS OF A CLOCK.

My place is on a snug little mantelpiece, in an humble cottage. And my situation in life has been such, as to lead me to a close view of the characters and the designs of men. Perhaps it may seem strange, that I should write my own biography; but this I do, not so much to praise myself, as to give a correct view of my acquaintance with others. To be sure I cannot handle the pen, or perform the office of a scribe; but my faithful conduct has engaged the interest of my owner, who writes beneath my eye, while I tick away, all the while a ready approval.

The place from which I sprang, as far as I remember, is called Down East; and the first gleam of consciousness which broke upon my mind, was when I was set upon a long shelf, with others of my own kind, to see if we would answer the purpose for which we were made. Our maker being satisfied of this, we were then put in a large box, and hurried off to be exhibited in a distant city. There we were released from our unpleasant confinement, and after much rubbing and properly adjusting our faces, we were arranged in different places, according to our respective merits and the fancy of our new master. As I happened, for some reason, to gain his esteem, my owner placed me in a prominent position, in the window of our new habitation. After regulating my motions as he thought proper, he left me to my reflections, taking care to pay me an occasional visit, at which time I generally met his approbation.

My first care was to observe the manners of those who passed by my nook in the window. Many people, of fine appearance, went and returned; all of whom I was careful to mark. My first impression was, that all well-dressed people were truly wise and good; but a circumstance, strange and unpleasant, soon dispelled my delusion. One evening a gentleman of goodly appearance stopped before my window, and commenced observing my motions. Of course, I was pleased with this compliment, and ticked on with full satisfaction. While he was thus standing, he laid his hand upon a gold chain, hanging from his breast, and drew from its hiding place a golden miniature of myself; but as he was observing the similarity of time on our faces, a man equally well dressed, but quick in movement, passing by seized the image of myself from the hand of its owner, and fled quickly from sight in the shadows of evening. The noise this occurrence made was very great, and while many were running by, I ticked on with anxiety, but saw no more of the uncivil stranger. At length I observed again my former visitor; but he looked sadder than before, as if some trouble oppressed him. After this, I was more careful to judge people by their actions than by their dress. And I was constantly on the alert to discover the treacherous thief; for I resolved, if he ever appeared, to tick reprovingly, or sound an alarm with my little bell.

For a long time I watched, but in vain. The days were dark, and the streets were dull; so, as there were few passing, my attention was turned to my neighbours across the way. There, in a stately mansion, appeared to live a great man; this I gathered from the number who waited his pleasure, and the deference which was shown him if any met him in the street, or caught a glimpse of his person, when going by his dwelling. One thing grieved me much, when certain miserable beings with wasted forms and tattered garments, who sought bread at the rich man's door, were turned empty away. But I was glad to see the same wretched beings supplied with food at an humbler dwelling, which stood near the great mansion.

Again the days grew dark, and the streets grew dull, while the anxiety I had to know more of the world, at last ripened into a desire to change my habitation: besides, the misery I had witnessed, with the continual din of rattling wheels, and the screaming voices of the paper-carriers, led me to long after a more retired life. But all this was nothing to the noise of certain large bells, which rang by night and by day, and with their deep sound set all my wheels ajar; while my alarm was frequently heightened by the shouts of fire, mingled with a clattering in the street, which fairly made me tremble.

But lest I should be tedious in the history of myself, I will only say that my desire soon found a way for its gratification. The same gentleman, who had before observed me, appeared one morning in my master's shop. He said he resided in the country, and his watch having been stolen, a short time before, he wished in some measure to replace it, by purchasing a family clock. The fear I had lest he should select some of my companions, amounted almost to a torturing anxiety; and though I do not know as I ever felt what some call envy, yet the love of myself ran so high, as to wish my place near one who had showed me such attention and respect. What was my joy to see him finally turn to me, as the object of his choice. The day of my ransom was come; I was packed away in a snug soft box, and committed to my new master, after which I lost all consciousness till I awoke far in the country, and found myself on the mantelpiece of a pleasant little cottage.

When my master brought me home, before giving me possession of the mantelpiece, he ventured to take a peep at my workmanship, which alarmed me somewhat, lest he should disarrange my delicate wheels, and so unfit me for keeping time—the great business of my life. However, he managed so cautiously as to allay my fears; and contenting himself with improving my appearance, he introduced me to his family, by telling them to watch my movements, and be governed by my advice. My concern now was to learn the habits of my new acquaintances, and I must confess that I found it much better to be a family clock than to be perched in the window of a public shop. The first morning, when my little bell struck five, my master awoke, and after kindling a fire, commenced early the duties of the day. The children too obeyed the summons joyfully, and by their morning frolics gave me unutterable pleasure. It was not long before my master's wife was busily engaged, and the breakfast was prepared and spread. My task had never seemed so easy, as when I counted the seconds while my new acquaintances were cheerfully eating their humble meal. At length, breakfast being over, something still more strange came under my observation. My master took a large book from the stand, and read from it a portion, while all, even to the children, paid the most unbroken attention; and after closing the book, he bent the knee, and all united in worship to the Supreme Being. Of course my motions were slow, and I ticked on solemnly till the exercise was ended. At this time several reflections passed through my mind, and engaged me in study. My profound admiration was always drawn out toward man, who could fashion my wheels, and control my motions with such regularity; but my whole thoughts were now taken up with God, who could himself make man, a mechanism more complete than my own, and give him an animating and reflecting soul.

After the day was ended, my master gathered all together for prayer, as in the morning, and this he has generally done ever since. There was, however, an occasion when he failed in this duty. One morning my bell rang five, six, seven, and no signs of the usual life appeared. At last my master and the family awoke, and began the daily round; but about the usual time of prayer, some of my master's friends came in, and called him away; so the good old book lay neglected upon the stand. This grieved me much, as I had come to like the sacred volume more and more. That evening my master was not as pleasant and as mild as common; while my mistress, a meek-eyed woman, gently told him he had forgotten morning prayers. The next day my bell rang five louder than ever; the family was soon up, and I was glad when all, quietly gathered sat listening to my master, as he read from the good old book. His voice slightly trembled, but I heard distinctly from his lips these words—"Redeem the time, because the days are evil." Now, ever and anon, when my bell rings seven, the quiet family is gathered for prayer, the venerable book is read, and the moments which my pendulum measures in this happy employment are the seed-time of future life, and the harbinger of joys to come.

I am now coming to a part of my experience, which it is painful to remember. My master's daughter, who was in the bloom of youth, was taken sick. Her slight form, which glided so often by me, now yielded to disease; and she was laid in a little room, whose door opened near the mantelpiece where I kept my station. The spring came; and as the outer door stood open, we could hear the birds sing, and the creek waters flow; but they could not soothe the distressed. She would call for the good old book, from the stand, and clasp it to her bosom, and ask her mother to read. Hour after hour did I tick along, and my little bell strike, while my master's wife read to her child those sweet counsels of truth, which seemed to be medicine to her pain. At last her form was wasted, and her cheek paler still: many a night did I toll the hours while the watchers sat by her bed. But the last of her earthly time was passing. The physician was called in haste; and while the mourning parents and loving children clasped her bed, he pointed to my dial, and said, "Ten minutes, and she will be gone." Sadly I measured the last moments of her departing spirit. Before I had ticked the allotted time, which counted ten upon the dial, her breath quivered upon the pendulum's beat, the heart sounded a rapid alarm, and "the silver cord was loosed." Never did I feel as then the value of an hour. Let the young and thoughtless take the simple warning of a clock; for the moment which you venture to neglect, may be the one which decides your doom. My master's daughter died ere yet the index reached the hour of twelve, and every tick the pendulum gave took off a moment from her life. The flowers of spring were placed upon her pillow, and the tears of love were shed upon her coffin as she passed away; but when they bore her from the fireside over which I watch, her eyes were deep closed in sleep, never again to awake till time shall be no longer.

TIMOTHY TIMELY.

WHAT IS "BAPTISMAL REGENERATION?"

THE QUESTION PLAINLY ANSWERED; AND THE DOCTRINE PRACTICALLY APPLIED, AND ILLUSTRATED.

"Line upon line, line upon line."—(Isaiah xxviii. v. 10.)

Third Edition, Enlarged.

We have received from England the third edition (London) of an excellent Tract, with the above title. After quoting particularly each apposite expression from the Baptismal and Confirmation service, thus setting forth in a striking view the strong testimony of the Prayer Book on this subject, the Tract thus proceeds:—

We have now gone through those portions of the Prayer Book which are directed to be used in reference to the spiritual nurture of the Children of the Church; and we have produced such evidence as will enable most persons to judge for themselves, what the Church does really and plainly teach, with regard to the ordinary Effects, or Benefits, of Baptism, in the case of Infants. Let us very briefly sum up what we have learnt from these extracts from the Prayer Book:—

I. That every Child is "born in sin," and is by nature the "child of wrath."

II. That every Infant baptized by God's Minister, with WATER, in the name of the FATHER, and of the SON, and of the HOLY GHOST, is Regenerated.

III. That in this term, "Regeneration," are included the following Blessings:—

1. Pardon or remission of that "original sin" in which the child was born by inheriting the evil and corrupt Nature of Adam.

2. A Death unto Sin, and a New Birth unto Righteousness, for being Baptized by Water and the Holy Ghost, he has the power to resist and mortify the sinful lusts of the Flesh, and to lead a life of Righteousness, and true Holiness.

3. The Gift of the HOLY GHOST, ("the Lord and Giver of Life,") to Sanctify and Guide the Child, in his warfare with the World, the Flesh, and the Devil.

4. Adoption as the Child of God, and heir of the Kingdom of Heaven.

5. Incorporation into the Church, by which the Child is made a Member of Christ.

IV. That these Blessings and Privileges are bestowed upon the Baptized through the merits and Atonement of our Lord and Saviour JESUS CHRIST.

V. That they will be continued, and increased, if we follow the guidance of the Holy Ghost, in believing all the Articles of the Christian Faith, and keeping God's Holy Will and Commandments; but that we shall forfeit them all by wilful and unrepented sins.

All these several things, and nothing less than these, are to be understood when a faithful and well-taught member of the Church uses the term Baptismal Regeneration. The Church tells us of no other kind of Regeneration than this, nor of any other time for Regeneration than our Baptism.

How simple, Scriptural, and consistent is this Doctrine! Its importance cannot be overrated, for all the Services of the Church are founded upon it; and it is one of those fundamental Articles of the Faith in which she differs from Dissenters of every class and name. Even those who most profess to exalt the free grace of God through Christ, and to disclaim all notion of human merit, reject this Doctrine, although it is evident that, on their own principles, they should eagerly advocate it. For no one can suppose that Infants who are Baptized and Regenerated receive that blessing by reason of their own merits; whereas those who commit the error of supposing that persons Baptized in Infancy are Regenerated in after years—and thus put asunder what God had joined together—are far more likely to commit another error, and suppose that the gift of Regeneration has been bestowed as a reward. But the Church, by teaching us that we were Regenerated when we were Baptized, in our Infancy, completely takes away from us all excuse and temptation for presuming that we owe the Blessing to anything else than the free Grace and Mercy of God. Moreover, we are also taught that, having received in our Baptism the Gift of the Holy Ghost, all our thoughts, words, and works, which are acceptable to God, are the fruits of that Holy Spirit working within us, and do not spring from our own unassisted strength. On the other hand, "the exceeding sinfulness" of our sins is manifest when we reflect that God gave us His Holy Spirit, to Sanctify and Guide us, before we had committed any actual sin, or been subject to any temptation: consequently, in committing sin, we must have listened to the voice of Satan rather than the voice of God, speaking to our conscience.

Is it not plain, then, that this Doctrine is a very practical one, and that it very closely concerns every man, woman, or child, who has been Baptized? It especially concerns all those who have anything to do with the training or teaching of Baptized children. How careful should we all be in everything which may influence a little Baptized child! A single word, a look, or a deed of ours, may tempt it to "grieve the Holy Spirit of God," by Sin, and thus open the door of its Regenerate soul to the Devil, who is ever keeping watch that he may enter in and dwell there. How careful should we be to keep that Regenerate soul pure and holy—without spot or blemish!

In some way or other, every one who reads these pages must have something to do with a Baptized Child. Let me earnestly and affectionately remind you, on the authority of God's Holy Word, that that child's soul is, by Baptism, made the Temple of God the HOLY GHOST—and, "if any man defile the Temple of God, him will God destroy." (1 Cor. iii. 16, 17.) Watch, then, every word you say, and every you do, in the presence of a Baptized child, or you may stain its purified, Regenerate soul and thus bring upon your own soul the destruction which God here threatens.

If you have anything to do with the training or teaching of a Baptized child, recollect that, as a member of the Church, you are bound to bring up that child as the Church directs. For this purpose you must constantly study the Baptismal Service, and the Church Catechism, and must lead the child to do the same. Those are the charts by which you must steer your course. If you do not keep them before you, you cannot train the child in the way which the Church points out. You must constantly remind him (or her) what a solemn Vow, Promise, and Profession, Baptized persons have to fulfil—what Mercy and Grace God has shown, by pardoning his birth-sin, and in giving him the Holy Spirit to sanctify, and help him in his warfare with the Devil. Teach the child that, though Satan is always seeking to lead him into temptation, yet there is the Holy Spirit within, to deliver him from evil, if he will earnestly and sincerely listen to the Voice of God the Holy Ghost, and follow His teaching and guiding with faithfulness and Truth. The child must be taught that, as he has received the Holy Spirit in his Baptism, so he will be held responsible for the use, or neglect, of that Gift, and will have to give an account at the Judgment Day.

Let me turn all this into a few plain practical questions, and let me ask any parent or God-parent; any Relation, Teacher, or Companion, of a Baptized Child:—

Are you daily training that child upon these principles?

Do you make the Baptismal Service, and the Church Catechism, your constant study and guide, and do you teach the child to do likewise?

Are you, and that child, really and truly acting upon a firm belief in the declaration which God's Minister made at the Baptism of the child:—"Seeing now, dearly beloved brethren, that this child is Regenerate?" Recollect that this was no formal, ceremonial, and general assertion, which might be true of some children, and not of others. God's Minister has publicly and solemnly declared, in God's House, and the very Child which he held in his arms, and with which you now have to do, is Regenerate: and he publicly thanked God for giving that Child the Holy Spirit. You cannot suppose that any Minister of God would dare to deceive you in such a matter. You might as well suppose that when he gives you a Certificate of the Child's Baptism, he does not mean to say that that Child has been Baptized, but that some other children have been. You have just the same authority for believing that the Child is Regenerated, as for believing that it is Baptized. God's Minister has solemnly declared the one by word of mouth, and he certifies the other in writing.

Do you carefully watch over the child, both at Church and at home, to see that it prays to God, regularly, earnestly, and reverently, for the continual Presence and increase of the Holy Spirit?

Are you daily helping it, and training it, to bring forth the Fruits of the Spirit—"Love, Joy, Peace, Long-suffering, Gentleness, Goodness, Faith, Meekness, Temperance?"

Or are you ignorantly, or carelessly, allowing the Child to "grieve the Holy Spirit of God," and to grow up as though it had not been Baptized and Regenerated by the Holy Ghost? Every Sunday you solemnly declare in God's House that you believe "in One Baptism for the Remission of Sins." Let this remind you that it is your duty to carry out this Doctrine in regard to every Baptized Child with whom you have to do.

Are you contenting yourself with merely sending it, or taking it, to Church, without troubling yourself to learn, or see, that it behaves orderly, quietly, and reverently, as in God's more immediate Presence, and that, as far as it is able, it diligently obeys the rules and directions which the Church has given in the Prayer Book? Do you see that it repeats aloud, and reverently, those things which the congregation are directed to say, and do you see that the child kneels devoutly at the proper places, and that it stands, or sits, quietly, orderly, and attentively, without looking about, or speaking to others?

And when at home, do you merely tell the child to say its prayers, or get a servant, or some other person, to hear them, without giving yourself any trouble to ascertain that the Prayers which it says are what they should be, and that they are said as they should be—regularly, seriously, and reverentially, on bended knees, quietly, and without interruption or disturbance from others?*

I earnestly beseech all Parents, God-parents, and Teachers, to lay these things very seriously to their hearts and consciences; for I much fear that many members of the Church have been sadly ignorant, careless, and neglectful in these matters. They have altogether lost sight of the Baptismal Blessings, Privileges, and Responsibilities, of the Children with whom they have had to do. They have, in fact, acted as though Baptism were nothing more than a ceremony for giving the child a name—as though there were neither a Holy Ghost within, to sanctify and guide the child's soul, nor a Devil without, to tempt and pollute it. The Doctrine of Baptismal Regeneration has been in their Prayer Books, but not in their hearts and lives.

And what have been the consequences of this conduct? Why, that Baptized children and Unbaptized children have been brought up very much alike, and have appeared very much alike, so that people have been brought to think that Baptism is of little or no importance, beyond giving the child a name; and thus, by the sad neglect of members of Christ's Church, the Holy Sacrament of Regeneration has been trampled under foot, as a useless, unprofitable ceremony, and thousands of souls have been lost, either by not being Baptized at all, or by neglecting to use the blessings and privileges which their Baptism placed within their reach. If a Baptized child lead no better life than an Unbaptized child, it is mainly the fault of those who have brought it up, and for that fault they will most assuredly have to answer at the judgment-seat of God. God has made a difference—a very great difference—between Baptized and Unbaptized children, and if those who have had the care of the Baptized have not kept up this difference, but have allowed it to get less and less, till it is destroyed, they will be held responsible for their neglect, and for its consequences.

In order that we may see this matter more clearly, let us place before us what the Bible says about these two Classes—the Unbaptized and the Baptized. We have already seen what the Prayer Book tells us about them.

THE UNBAPTIZED.

"In sin did my mother conceive me."—(Psa. li. v. 5.)

"By nature the children of wrath, even as others."—(Ephesians ii. v. 3.)

"By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned."—(Romans v., v. 12.)

"Verily, verily, I say unto thee, Except a man be born again, he cannot see the Kingdom of God. Except a man be born of Water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the Kingdom of God."—(St. John iii. v. 3.)

"The wages of Sin is death."—(Romans vi. v. 23.)

"Be baptized every one of you in the Name of Jesus Christ, for the remission of sins."—(Acts ii. v. 38.)

"Be Baptized and wash away thy sins."—(Acts xxii. v. 16.)

THE BAPTIZED.

"Ye are washed, ye are Sanctified, ye are justified in the Name of the Lord Jesus and by the Spirit of our God."—(1 Cor. vi. v. 11.)

"Not by works of righteousness which we have done, but according to His mercy He saved us, by washing of Regeneration, and Renewing of the Holy Ghost."—(Titus iii. v. 5.)

"As many as have been Baptized unto Christ, have put on Christ."—(Galatians iii. v. 27.)

"If any be in Christ he is a new creature: old things are passed away; behold all things are become new."—(2 Cor. v., v. 17.)

"By one Spirit are we all baptized into one Body."—(1 Cor. xii. v. 13.)

Now, who can read the description of these two classes, and say that it is reasonable, much less Christian, or faithful, or just, to train and teach both in the same manner. We see plainly, on the one hand, that the Unbaptized Child is in a state of Nature and Sin; and, on the other hand, that the Baptized Child is in a state of Grace and Salvation. With the one, we have no sure ground for Hope, nor for expecting the aid of the Holy Spirit, for God's appointed Ordinance for giving His Holy Spirit to unregenerate souls has been entirely neglected; but, with the other, we have God's Word, and the plain teaching of the Church, to assure us of the certainly that Regeneration, with all its Blessings—especially the Gift of the Holy Spirit—has been actually bestowed upon the Child. What becomes of those children who are never Baptized, it is not for us to enquire or decide, beyond what is revealed by God, and taught us by the Church: what we have to do is to see that every Child, under our care or influence, is duly Baptized, and that it is trained and taught to feel its deep Responsibility, and to make a proper use of the Blessings and Privileges which Baptism bestows upon it.

We have seen that God has mercifully Regenerated every Child Baptized into His Church, by pardoning its birth-sin, and giving it the Holy Spirit, to Sanctify and Guide it in its warfare with the World, the Flesh, and the Devil. It is our part and duty to see that those children with whom we have to do, are so trained that they may bring forth the Fruits of the Spirit. We must daily watch over every Baptized Child committed to our care, and see that it walks worthy of the high and holy vocation wherewith it is called.

QUIETNESS DISTURBED.

For some time past the Church has been permitted to enjoy a season of calm and quietness. In a review of the history of the past year, the able editor of "the True Catholic" justly remarks.—"In our Church the year has not been an eventful one. It has, in fact, been more quiet and tranquil, than any which has passed over us for a long period: more so than we had ever hoped to see in our time. The differences of opinion among us are not however changed; but men have seen that strife and contention are not the most available modes of disseminating opinions." To "the Calendar," a highly respectable Church Paper, belongs the unenviable distinction of having needlessly disturbed this quietness. The excitement which has thus been got up, for the entertainment of those who think that quietness is akin to dullness, is not to be sure very extensive. In our esteem it partakes rather of the smallness of a tempest in an appendage to the tea-table, than of the grandness of an ocean storm. But it is hard to say what may be the end, in our restless times, of the smallest beginnings. An editor, for example, sitting in his uneasy chair may be puzzled to find, in quiet times, a topic for a racy editorial. The soiled hands of the Printer's little emissary may be outstretched, in impatient eagerness, to clutch the expected article for which types and press are all kept waiting. Under such pressing circumstances the merest rumor is caught at as a something, and the hasty invention of which "necessity is the mother," is sent forth to feed the public appetite ravenous for news. Such an article may be the cause of the greatest disturbances, and verify those words of inspired truth—"Behold how great a matter a little fire kindleth."

We cannot but think, with the very kindest feelings towards the acting editor of "the Calendar," that whatever disturbance his article on "Romanizing" has occasioned, it has been a needless interruption of the peace and quiet of the Church. The alarm, the suspensions (worse than all,) the angry words and bitter feelings thus called forth, have been, we must think, needlessly excited. At the cost of much unpleasant clamor nothing has been gained which might not have been effected in a quiet way. We wish there was a little more of this kind of "Romanizing" in our Church which does not proclaim to a hostile world, all the differences and all the faults of brethren.

On the supposition that the acting Editor of "the Calendar" had proof that there was a Romanizing spirit "infecting the neighbourhood of our General Theological Seminary, and rendering the labors of its able Professors almost ineffectual," what was his duty? Was his temporary editorial character to smother all brotherly sympathies, and to remove him beyond the influence of "propinquity," which he tells us, "means not only nearness of place, but nearness of kin?" Is an editor no longer a brother and a son? Does a Professorship in the General Theological Seminary exclude its incumbents from the brotherhood of the Ministry and of the Church? And would the Editor of the Calendar deny that such fraternity is not nearer of kin than the "propinquity" caused by any natural ties?

Somewhat ungenerously, we must think, the Editor of the Calendar attributes our "zeal for the Seminary," to the "nearness of kin," existing between the editor of the Banner, and one of the Professors of that Institution. While we lay no claim to the Roman stoicism, which could triumph over all natural feeling, we humbly trust that if the sad necessity occurred, we might yield obedience to the principle set forth in that saying of our Lord—"he that loveth Father or Mother more than Me, is not worthy of Me." We plead guilty to the charge of "a zeal for the Seminary," because we honestly think it is the noblest Institution in the Church for supplying a well qualified Ministry. We may be excused for our "zeal for the Seminary," for we owe its able Professors a deep and lasting debt of love, for unwearied patience and labor in our instruction. We remember too that we share with the acting Editor of the Calendar the honor of being an Alumnus of that Seminary, and it has, as it justly deserves, our filial love.

We here again assert that we have had no consultation, no interchange of opinions, with any one of the officers or students of the Seminary since the appearance of the first article in the Calendar on "Romanizing."

If then the Editor of the Calendar had proofs of any danger threatening the Seminary, was it not plainly his duty, as a son and a brother, to write to his Brethren the Professors warning them of the evil? Has he not, by pursuing an opposite course, added strength to the unjust prejudices by which the confidence of the Church, as he complains, has been impaired in relation to her noblest Institution? And in proof that, after all this "much ado," this charge had no foundation in fact we give the following documentary evidence.

To the Editor of the Calendar.

REV. AND DEAR SIR:

It is stated in the "Churchman" of last week that the Bishop of Connecticut has been requested to institute an investigation in relation to certain charges supposed to affect the General Theological Seminary. If the matter should be thought of sufficient interest to the Church, you are at liberty to publish the request referred to, and the reply which was made to it.

T. C. BROWNELL.

General Theological Seminary,
Easter Tuesday, 1849.

To the Right Reverend Thomas Church Brownell, D.D., LL.D.,
Bishop of the Diocese of Connecticut.

RT. REV. FATHER IN GOD:

The oft repeated clamors against the students of the General Theological Seminary having at length been reiterated by your official organ, whose attacks have been widely copied, both in and out of the Church as being made under your Episcopal sanction, and as bearing the weight of your venerable name. We, students, not only express to you our willingness that our soundness in the faith should be investigated, but we make our earnest request that it may please you to institute a legal Visitation of the Seminary, to the end that, if there be traitors amongst us, or holders of unsound doctrine, the discipline of the Church may be visited upon the guilty, the reputation of the innocent may be protected, and the high claims of the Seminary to the confidence of the Church be maintained. And since the Church has confided to her Bishops alone the visitatorial power over the Seminary: since its usefulness must be in a great measure impaired when its fair fame becomes so tainted that to have studied within its walls is considered not an honor but a reproach; and since it appears that the teaching of our able Professors being confessedly above suspicion, the whole odium of the charge of "Romanizing," so far as the Seminary is concerned, is thrown upon us, Students, who look for correction or defence to our Right Reverend Fathers in God; we sincerely trust that our request for this official Vindication will not be refused, nor our humble prayer for Justice be denied.

We are faithfully,

Your sons in Christ and the Church.

To Messrs, Childs, McIlvaine, &c.

GENTLEMEN:

I have received your communication dated Easter Tuesday, the 10th instant, calling my attention to an article published in the "Calendar," of this city, and requesting that I would institute an official visitation of the Seminary, in reference to the doctrinal errors referred to in that article.

It gives me much pleasure to witness your zeal for the welfare of the Seminary, and for the vindication of its soundness in the faith.

The article in the Calendar was published without my knowledge or concurrence; but after its appearance in print, the author exhibited to me the proofs on which his charges were founded, and I am bound to say, I consider them amply sufficient to sustain his allegations. There was nothing, however, in these charges which has any immediate reference to the students of the Seminary, as you will perceive by referring to the article in question. The mention of the Institution seems to be altogether incidental, and to be prompted wholly by a jealous regard to its reputation and usefulness. That the students may be affected by external influences, counteracting the instruction of the Professors, has already been painfully demonstrated in its past history.

* In Schools and families this point should be especially attended to; and it would be well if a small room could be set apart for this express purpose. Many a child's habit of private prayer is destroyed at school for want of attention to these matters. Surely every religious parent, and teacher, will consider this a point worthy of their constant, anxious and personal attention.

At the present time, I do not think that the interests of the Seminary would be promoted by the visitation which you suggest. I see no reason to doubt the general soundness of the Institution.—Besides, a trial, and acquittal, is but a poor certificate of character. Such a verdict may result from a want of evidence, as well as from innocence. It is better so to live as to avoid suspicion. That every man is the maker of his own character, may be received as a general truth.—Misrepresentation and calumny may indeed work a temporary mischief; but in most cases, it is better to live them down, than to take up arms against them.—Time and patience seldom fail to correct the erroneous impressions of the moment, and to vindicate the cause of truth and righteousness.

Very respectfully,

(Signed)

T. C. BROWNELL.

For the Calendar.

To the Rev. John D. Ogilby, D.D.

(COPY.)

MY DEAR DOCTOR:—An article recently published in the Calendar, a copy of which I herewith send, contains the following statement respecting the students of the General Theological Seminary.

"This is what we mean by Romanizing, and this is what we now feel it our duty to point out as infecting the neighborhood of our General Theological Seminary, and rendering the labors of its able Professors almost ineffectual by the ensnaring influence which it exerts through young men, upon young men engaged in the study of divinity."

As you are the Dean of the Institution, may I take the liberty to ask you whether you know or believe that such a state of things exists in the Seminary as would warrant the assertion to which I have directed your attention? As a Trustee, I feel a deep interest in this subject, and will esteem it a favor if you will give me the desired information at your earliest convenience.

Very truly yours,

WM. COOPER MEAD.

Norwalk, Ct., April 11th, 1848.

The Rev. William Cooper Mead, D.D.

REV. AND DEAR SIR:—I beg leave to acknowledge the receipt of your favor of the 11th inst., and, as in duty bound, I cheerfully answer the question which you propose in "reference to the statement quoted from the 'Calendar,'" viz. "whether you know or believe, that such a state of things exists in the Seminary, as would warrant the assertion, to which I have directed your attention."

To this question, I feel bound to answer emphatically, "No." What influences may be attempting to operate upon the students, I either know not at all, or little regard, because I do thoroughly believe, that at no time since I have known the Seminary, have the students been so docile and dutiful as they are at present; and consequently that "the labors of the Professors" have at no time been less "ineffectual" than at present.

It is of course impossible to pronounce an unqualified judgment of every word and act of each and every individual among a body of young men, whose age and circumstances expose and incline them, not only to entertain at times, but also occasionally to utter, immature opinions, which with proper treatment, generally ripen into sounder conclusions.

But this I can safely and truly say, that in twenty-one years experience as a teacher, I have never known a body of young men more united in sentiment, more attentive to duty, and more free from extreme tendencies, than the present body of students here. And it is not the least satisfactory sign of a right spirit and temper on their part, that, whenever during the present year, any indiscretion has seemed to call for official counsel, the admonition has in every case been meekly received and dutifully heeded. I heartily believe (admitting the possibility of an exception) that the body of the students are as free from all affection for isms, of whatever name or character, as the most ardent lover of the prayer-book and of the church could reasonably expect, or even desire.

I must add, therefore, that I have largely shared in the feeling, not only of surprise and regret, but of righteous indignation, which prevails among the students, on account of the injustice of the assumption, to which you refer in your query that, because there is, or is supposed to be, (with this question, as irrelevant, I have nothing to do,) a "Romanizing clique" in "the neighborhood of our General Theological Seminary," therefore the students of the Seminary are so infected by it, that "the labors of its able professors are rendered most ineffectual."—As well argue that because they are beset by the temptations of the world, the flesh, and the devil, they are therefore the willing victims of their wiles.

In concluding, let me say, that the students of the Seminary are, as such, amenable to a juster and more legitimate tribunal, than "public opinion," or any of its anonymous and irresponsible organs; before whose bar they find themselves arraigned indiscriminately, by no process known to the law of the Church, without the benefit of a visible accuser, or of witnesses, and without the opportunity of being heard in self-defence!

If any responsible person or persons have any positive proof that any of the students are so infected by any hostile influence, Roman or Genevan, or of what sort soever, as to be guilty of violating wilfully their Matriculation vow, (as is more than implied of many of them in the statement to which your question refers,) I hereby invite and challenge the production of the evidence, and pledge my official influence and efforts to subject the guilty to proper discipline.

I remain, Rev'd. and Dear Sir,

Yours faithfully,

JOHN D. OGILBY.

April 13, 1849.

The Editor of the Calendar accompanies these letters with a long article of three columns and a half. At the risk of wearying our readers, we must add some remarks upon this article. Its whole tone, we are compelled to say, betrays a laboured effort to make out a case, by special pleading and sophistical argument, rather than "by manifestation of the truth."

The editor commences with a little self-gratulation on the result of his effort. In the course of which he says—

"We meant to challenge such replies as have been given, and which have saved us the disagreeable necessity of designating infected persons and places. But we did not imagine they would come so immediately and show themselves at our call. Mr. Howland's disclosures have betrayed the existence of a clique, for which he is at least the apologist."

With great deference to the Editor's intentional veracity, we must deny the truth of this concluding statement. Having submitted to the pain of reading the letters referred to, we must positively declare that they betray nothing at all that we could make out; except it be the writer. And if we knew nothing of the writer, but from these letters, we would think his productions of no great consequence to any body. Mr. H., according to his own interpretation of this mysterious letter, merely designed to inform the Calendar, that if there were any such persons as the Calendar designated, and if they saw fit to hold certain opinions, they had a hypothetical right to do so. We utterly deny the right of any Minister of the Church to hold the opinions referred to, and we trust that, if there are any such in the Church, they will go out of her voluntarily or else be subjected to proper discipline. We desire no changes in the Creeds, Articles, Order or Ritual of the Church, and least of all such change as these would bring us. Those who want to change their Church, can do it by going elsewhere. We did not publish Mr. Howland's letters because we did not think the Church should be disturbed by the fancies of any man among her Ministers, who, if his views are erroneous, is amenable to proper discipline. And, besides, these letters do not positively assert anything of himself or any others. Dear Mr. Calendar, do tell us where you found anything so positive and tangible as a clique in these letters? Is a clique anything like a hypothesis? If so, "the disclosures" referred to, "have betrayed the existence" of most awful cliques! We would like also to know how many it takes to make a clique? Besides these letters there was an article, in the Protestant Churchman which had something positive in it, but this was not in answer to the Calendar's "call." Such views might be justly classed under the head of "Romanizing," but as it was signed "Scholasticus," and a painful remembrance of Jacob's Greek Reader teaching us the usual acceptance of that term, and the article being silly enough for such a name, the whole matter struck us as a clumsy piece of burlesque. This is all the evidence the Calendar can furnish to prove the existence of "the clique."

This part of the article concludes with a vague threat to the hypothetical clique, that its "Romanizing" will be prosecuted "at the proper tribunals, if it is not instantly repented of and given up"! In the name of the Church, we call upon the writer of this editorial to pursue this straight-forward course which should have been its beginning. The Editor then proceeds as follows:—

"Some who have justified our course in general, have regretted nevertheless that we mentioned the Seminary. The Seminary, however, was our apology for entering upon the matter. The Seminary is the common ground of the Church; our District of Columbia."

We again ask the Editor, if he had the good of the Seminary at heart, would it not have been a more friendly course to make this subject a matter of private caution, rather than of public attack? He admits that two of the Professors had shown themselves anxious in their Matriculation Addresses, to guard the students against evils of this kind. He owns that one of these was "a former friend," and yet with a daily mail, and we think, a telegraph, between Hartford and New York, he conveys his intelligence first through the columns of a newspaper! And after all he complains that the Professor, in repelling, with just indignation, the injurious charge, uses a tone "somewhat immoderate." Why, Mr. Calendar, a man on Long Island came near being hung for murder the other day, because he received without "immoderate" agitation the news of the burning of his house and his wife and children. If a professor of the General Theological Seminary should answer with moderation a charge of "Romanizing" against the Seminary, it would be regarded by many as proof positive of the fact.

But the Editor thinks he finds confirmation of his impressions about the evil influence of the surrounding infection upon the Seminary, from the Addresses delivered by the Professors, at the two last annual Matriculations. The argument is, that because these Professors cautioned the students against certain evils, there is proof positive that those evils are not guarded against! Because Professor Ogilby cautioned the students in reference to books of devotion, therefore, the students use "Romanizing" books! Because Professor Haight exhorted the students to be sober-minded, therefore they pay no attention to the instructions of their Professors, and "young men" are now their sage teachers! What conclusive, overwhelming, force there is in such logic!

Suppose we apply it so as to test its virtue. The Rev. Dr. — never preaches a sermon in which he does not tell his people of some of the "abominations of Popery," and caution them against the errors of "Romanizing." Go Sunday after Sunday to his church, and you will hear him thundering against these errors. Is his congregation therefore suspected of Romanizing? Dear Readers, according to the logic of the Calendar, when you hear a clergyman constant and urgent in his arguments or declamation against "Romanizing," you must suspect his congregation of infection. Or when you see a newspaper harping upon this theme, you are to infer that it has a great many "Romanizing" subscribers! These addresses, be it remembered, were not intended for the public, but for the private instruction of the students. According to this logic, if a Professor lectures the students upon the errors of any sect, heresy, or schism, he shows that the views he cautions them against must be entertained by some. They must therefore give up teaching the evidences of Christianity for fear the world may have thus learned to argue that the students are infected with infidelity!

The Editor proceeds to inform his readers that he has hitherto been checked by his "privileged terms with the professors," and his "many dear personal friends among the students," from censure of the Seminary. Perhaps his lack of an editorial chair has also had some little influence. Now, however, as he has "incurred the indignation," of a Professor, he concludes "we now hold ourselves absolved from any further restraint in speaking about the Seminary." We ask our readers to refer to the above letter, written by "the Dean of the Institution" in answer to the request of a Trustee, and see for themselves whether its tone and temper are not such as the case demanded. We cannot discover any declaration which absolves "a former friend" from the restraints of love and friendship.

He goes on, we are sorry to say, to prove his unfettered freedom by speaking in a way which shows he holds himself absolved from the wise restraints of prudence and of justice. He says, for instance,

"We consider it humiliating to the church that her General Theological Seminary by no means answers its original purpose, and is far from inspiring that kind of confidence which enables a pastor to recommend it without hesitation, as providing a safe and wholesome preparation for usefulness in the ministry."

Who is to blame for this want of confidence, if it exists? Is it not the fault of those who rashly and without evidence, make public attacks upon the Seminary, or of those who whisper and talk in private circles?

And upon what does the Editor justify this grave assertion? The only real specific fact brought to sustain this charge, we brush away the dust which he would throw in weak eyes, is this: "Apostasy has, in some instances, sadly verified such forebodings." Why not tell the number? Why make a charge which could be specific so general? We call upon the Calendar to show how many instances there are on record of Apostasy from the Seminary. We hold ourselves ready to show that another Seminary, for which much is said by those hostile to the General Theological Seminary, can boast nearly an equal number of apostacies to infidelity. The number and names of the persons are at the service of the Calendar, also the names of the Seminary, which is often set up as a rival of the General Theological Seminary. We do not argue against it, because it has had the misfortune to have fools among its students. This is the force of the Calendar's logic. The follies of men are a poor basis on which to rest a sound argument. It is thus the Infidel argues against Christianity. Who suspects the Diocese of Pennsylvania of "Romanizing," because two of its clergy have gone to the Romanists, one of whom, (to use the Calendar's own language,) "sits in an editorial chair of a Romish journal?" The Calendar's logic proves too much. When called upon, by a Professor, for particular proofs, the Calendar discreetly answers:

"We have taken care, already, to say nothing unjust, and we are willing to rest our cause on the general facts which are verified by men's eyes, without trapping ourselves in minute specifications, which require forensic proof, and which are often the scandal of equity."

As to the arguments which the Calendar derives from the diversity of opinion among the Students about the publication of the Addresses, it is surely a weak cause which needs such support. The Students might have thought that what was intended for their private teaching should not be brought before the public. Some of them may have anticipated the unjust use which would be made of their Professors' cautions.

We have neither time nor room for further comment upon this article which we have felt unwillingly compelled to notice. We hope that one good result may follow from all this. It will show the necessity of placing the Seminary under a pastoral head. We admit the evil of distributing the Students in the various Parishes of New York. We think it has been shown that the Calendar has not made good its charges against the Seminary, or justified the injurious effect of its article by proving the existence of a Romanizing clique in New York. We have good right then to think that its uncalled for articles have needlessly disturbed the quietness of the Church.

ST. BARNABAS COLLEGE, PIMLICO.—The first stone of the College was laid on St. Barnabas Day, 1846; it includes schools for boys, girls, and infants, about six hundred in all, twenty-four of whom are to be on the foundation, to be clothed, boarded, and lodged, as well as educated, gratuitously. The schools were opened on St. Barnabas Day, 1847, and at present serve as a temporary Church for the district.

DEATH OF THE ROMAN CATHOLIC PRIMATE.—The Most Rev. Dr. Crolly, the Roman Catholic Primate, expired on Friday, in Drogheda, after an attack of cholera of nine hours' duration. The deceased Prelate was highly esteemed by men of all religious and political persuasions, being ever remarkable for Christian liberality towards his fellow countrymen, and love of peace and order. Dr. Crolly was a warm supporter of the National system of education, and, indeed, of every measure which tended to the progress of enlightenment. He was one of the Commissioners of Charitable Bequests, and in accepting that office, in conjunction with Drs. Murray and Denvir, incurred a large share of odium, from which, however, he never shrank, notwithstanding that the opposition against him was led by the late Mr. O'Connell in person. He was about 70 years of age, but from active habits and strong constitution looked to be much less advanced in age.—Times' Correspondent.

SUMMARY OF GENERAL INTELLIGENCE.

In France, the people are looking forward to the coming elections. The Deputies are expected to be of all parties, except that of the Republic. The trials at Bourges have terminated peaceably, nor have the Red party been able to excite a disturbance on the Italian question.

The war has broken out in Schleswig Holstein. The Danes have taken Gravenstein and Hadersleben; but have lost a line-of-battle ship and a frigate.

The King of Prussia has accepted the Imperial Crown of Germany on certain conditions, which amount to a refusal. He will accept the Viceroyalty at once, in the hope, no doubt, that the people will force the Princes to acquiesce in his being Emperor.

The State of Italy is very disturbed. The Austrians were driven out of Brescia and Bergamo, but have again taken possession of the former city, after a desperate struggle. Genoa proclaimed itself a Republic, and drove out the Sardinian garrison; but has been again obliged to yield to the Sardinian army, under General La Marmora.

The Duke of Genoa has secretly left Turin, most likely to assume the Sicilian Crown, to which he was elected some time ago. The war has commenced between the Sicilians and Neapolitans, but no decisive operations have yet taken place.

In Hungary, Bem is victorious; and the Austrians, it is said, are going to call in the Russians to help them against the Magyars. General Hess, to whose military skill Radetzky has been so much indebted, is to leave Italy, and take the command of the Imperialists.

In Spain, Cabrera has divided his forces into small foraging parties, with a view to raise contributions. M. Napoleon Bonaparte has at last gone to Madrid, and will use his best endeavours to reconcile the English and Spanish Governments.

THE CHURCH TIMES.

Last week's Paper contains the following announcement:—

"With the present number, the Editor, to whose care the Church Times has been committed for the past year, bids farewell to the readers. Duties which demand his undivided attention require a relinquishment of what has thus far been pleasant labor, and would be gladly continued if consistent with other claims upon his time."

The Presbyterian, who thus retires from the editorial office, has conducted "The Church Times" in a kind and courteous spirit, yet ever with a firm and decided expression of the Truth. He carries with him to his more quiet and, we trust, happier sphere of duty and usefulness, the best wishes of his brethren.

The Publisher announces the discontinuance of the Paper for the present. Its publication will be resumed after the meeting of the Maryland Convention, "should a sufficient number of subscribers be added to the list."

We have great pleasure in adding this to our former notice. It comes from a layman of the highest character in our city.

SCHOOL FOR YOUNG LADIES,

By Mrs. A. C. Tilghman, No. 313 Walnut street, under the supervision of the Bishop of Pennsylvania.

REV. AND DEAR SIR:—May I ask the favour (in addition to your previous notice,) of your presenting this Church School to the notice of your readers, and of Episcopalians in general. Mrs. Tilghman, its Principal, is a lady of one of the oldest and most respectable families of this state, of cultivated and elegant mind, of refined manners and of unfeigned piety. No lady of this city, in early life enjoyed greater advantages, social, domestic and literary. Her subsequent life and efforts have afforded ample evidence that such advantages were well improved. For many years she has brought to the service of those who were dependent upon her unwearied industry and self-devotion sustained by a persevering reliance and firm faith in the kind Providence that has watched over her and hers. Her present establishment, I feel confident, offers one of the most eligible Christian schools and homes for the daughters of Churchmen that has ever been presented here—one in which all pupils will be assured of the fullest and most finished literary training, accompanied undeviatingly by religious instruction—in the constant society and under the care and hourly influence and maternal kindness of this refined and highly gifted matron.

To her own circular I would refer you and your readers for the various details of the course and arrangement of her establishment.

GUIDE TO THE TEMPLE OF TIME: AND UNIVERSAL HISTORY, FOR SCHOOLS. By EMMA WILLARD. New York: Published by A. S. Barnes & Co., 51 John street. Cincinnati: H. W. Derby & Co.

Mrs. Willard's School Books are so well known, that we need only say of these works, that they are published in very neat and convenient form for the use of Schools.

THE CHILD'S FIRST BOOK IN GEOGRAPHY, designed as an introduction to R. M. Smith's new Common School Geography. Illustrated with 18 maps and upwards of one hundred beautiful engravings. Philadelphia: Grigg, Elliot & Co., 14 north Fourth street.

This is a book of descriptive Geography, in plain and simple language, and well designed to interest and instruct children of early years.

DIED.

In this city, on Saturday morning, Mrs. HELEN MORTON, wife of the Rev. Dr. Morton, Rector of St. James' Church.

In the affliction, which has thus befallen one of the most beloved of our Clergy, we must express our deepest sympathy, shared in by all his brethren. Many hearts will sorrow over their own sad loss in parting with one so truly loved, so justly respected. We speak but feebly the truth when we say that in all the relations of life this Christian Lady illustrated the holy and glorious faith she so consistently professed. Few have passed through life, in her position, challenging less of censure, and securing more of praise. Her gentle spirit, patient and uncomplaining in a long and trying illness, passed serenely and peacefully to her eternal rest. The love which excites sorrow for our loss, bids us rejoice at her eternal gain.

Died, in the Borough of Muncy, on Monday afternoon the 16th inst., Mrs. AMELIA WATSON, wife of G. L. J. Painter, Esq., Editor of the Muncy Luminary, and daughter of the late James W. Bowman, Esq., of Wilkesbarre, aged 26 years.

The deceased had been suffering from the early part of winter; and although her case was continually assuming a less hopeful aspect, her near and dear relatives and friends were unwilling to admit the unwelcome truth, that she must be separated from them. Her sufferings were borne with much Christian patience, and she died as she had lived in the communion of the Protestant Episcopal Church, leaving an example not unworthy to be followed by all of the household of faith. She was borne to the grave amidst the sorrows of a large number of relatives and acquaintances who, as they loved her in life, lamented her in death.

THE TRIUMPHS OF OUR LANGUAGE.

BY THE REV. JAMES GILBORNE LYONS, LL.D.

Now gather all our Saxon bards,
Let harps and hearts be strung,
To celebrate the triumphs
Of our own good Saxon tongue;
For stronger far than hosts that march
With battle-flags unfurled,
It goes, with FREEDOM, THOUGHT, and TRUTH,
To rouse and rule the world.

Stout Albion learns its household lays,
On every surf-worn shore,
And Scotland hears it echoing far,
As Orkney's breakers roar:—
From Jura's crags, and Mona's hills,
It floats on every gale,
And warms, with eloquence and song,
The homes of Innisfail.

On many a wide and swarming deck,
It scales the rough wave's crest,
Seeking its peerless heritage,
The fresh and fruitful West:—
It climbs New England's rocky steeps,
As victor mounts a throne;
Niagara knows and greets the voice,
Still mightier than its own.

It spreads where winter piles deep snows
On bleak Canadian plains,
And where, on Essequibo's banks,
Eternal summer reigns:—
It glads Acadia's misty coasts,
Jamaica's glowing isle,
And bides where, gay with early flowers,
Green Texan prairies smile.

It lives by clear Itasca's lake,
Missouri's turbid stream,
Where cedars rise on wild Ozark,
And Kansas' waters gleam:—
It tracks the loud swift Oregon,
Through sunset valleys roll'd,
And soars where Californian brooks
Wash down rich sands of gold.

It sounds in Borneo's camphor groves,
On seas of fierce Malay,
In fields that curb old Ganges' flood,
And towers of proud Bombay:—
It wakes up Aden's flashing eyes,
Dusk brows, and swarthy limbs:—
The dark Liberian soothes her child
With English cradle hymns.

Tasmania's maids are wooed and won
In gentle Saxon speech;
Australian boys read Crusoe's life
By Sydney's shelter'd beach:
It dwells where Afric's southmost capes
Meet oceans broad and blue,
And Nieuweld's rugged mountains gird
The wide and waste Karroo.

It kindles realms so far apart,
That, while its praise you sing,
These may be clad with Autumn's fruits,
And those with flowers of Spring:—
It quickens lands whose meteor lights
Flame in an Arctic sky,
And lands for which the Southern Cross
Hangs its orb'd fires on high.

It goes with all that prophets told,
And righteous kings desir'd,
With all that great Apostles taught,
And glorious Greeks admir'd,
With Shakspeare's deep and wondrous verse,
And Milton's loftier mind,
With Alfred's laws, and Newton's lore,
To cheer and bless mankind.

Mark, as it spreads, how deserts bloom,
And error flees away,
As vanishes the mist of night,
Before the star of day;
But, grand as are the victories
Whose monuments we see,
These are but as the dawn which speaks
Of noontide yet to be.

Take heed, then, heirs of Saxon fame,
Take heed, nor once disgrace,
With deadly pen, or spoiling sword,
Our noble tongue and race.
Go forth prepar'd, in every clime,
To love and help each other,
And judge that they, who counsel strife,
Would bid you smite—a brother.

Go forth, and jointly speed the time
By good men pray'd for long,
When Christian States, grown just and wise,
Will scorn revenge and wrong,—
When Earth's oppress'd and savage tribes
Shall cease to pine or roam,
All taught to prize these English words,
FAITH, FREEDOM, HEAVEN, and HOME.

ANOTHER WAY OF INDUCING A VESTRY TO PAY THE CLERGYMAN.

The undersigned knew a clergyman in a diocese, as undefined as the one to which your correspondent "B" alludes, greatly distinguished for his learning and many excellencies, and somewhat so for his eccentricities. He ministered acceptably to a small congregation, but it included a number of wealthy individuals. His salary at best, and if it had all been paid, was insufficient to answer the necessary wants of a large and increasing family. With great patience the good man laboured among his attached people, and though many happy results crowned his pious efforts and zeal, yet his vestry seemed not to think of his personal wants, or how his family might be sustained, while his whole time, his talents, learning and energy, were consecrated to their service. Being unwilling to make known his actual wants, or to speak to them about his salary, supposing it might be thought he was preaching for money, a charge sometimes vainly urged in new countries, he attempted a school. In the school alone, he could have more than supported such a family as his, but this would not do, as it was at once said, Mr. — has impaired his influence and usefulness, by that school of his. From being such a visitor, so agreeable and useful too, we never see him now only in the church and on Sundays, when he only reads prayers and preaches. Any one may imagine, how unpleasant and distressing a situation, my good friend, from no fault of his, was placed in for a while. Alike unwilling to remain idle in his Master's vineyard, or to starve over the plough—and yet opposed in his honest efforts, to work at a secular calling, that he might not be burdensome to his congregation! The facts of the case, in some way or other, came to the knowledge of his distant friends. He did not communicate them, for he was not one of those who willingly divide trouble with his friends. As they had written him and generously advised him to abandon a situation, where it was thought inexpedient for him to do for himself what his parishioners would not—and in right should never have reduced him to the necessity of attempting, he freely accepted their sympathies, and though unwillingly, expressed his assent to a change, that they represented in such a light, that both he and his faithful wife, thought would be agreeable. All the while these circumstances were unknown to the Pastor's flock, who were feeding upon rich pastures, while he poor shepherd, was starving to leanness, purely for the love of tending them. Perhaps he would have torn himself away from them, and left them sorrowing over his unwilling departure, without assigning the reason, but absolute necessity precluded him from taking this step, which would have been more grateful to his feelings than to have it known, that he had seen such distress in his favourite field of labour. So he accepted a most noble offer of some of his distant friends, actually to move him to the proposed field of labour. One of these friends accompanied the expedition, and when he approached within a day or so of the residence of the clergyman, he procured many of the necessities of life, in order to make his welcome more joyous. The arrival is announced in the community, but not the peculiar circumstances attending it. On the very next Sunday, this friend being no less than a brother, and himself also a clergyman, was invited to preach. To his surprise, he saw the church surrounded with carriages and other vehicles, all, or most of them, quite dashing, and many horses, for in that part of the world, both ladies and gentlemen, go to church on the out side of their horses, but are not the less respectable from that circumstance. The hour of 12 o'clock arrived, and I venture to affirm, that a better dressed, more elegant, more orderly, serious, and attentive people, never met together in a country church. After the blessing was pronounced, with great unanimity the people pressed around their pastor, as well to congratulate him, as to be introduced to his brother. As the church was not thought to be much of a place for talk, "as the manner of some is," they contented themselves, each one, with offering the hospitalities of his house to the strange clergyman, who was not regarded exactly as a stranger, having been frequently spoken of, before it was ever thought they might see him. As the Rector had now no sermons to write, the whole of that and the next week was taken up with visiting "from house to house." And now such a source of compliments, so many good things prepared, so many handsome dinners, appropriate to feast days, that the brother was both surprised and gratified; but poor fellow he said, "being unaccustomed to such high living in his own parish, it had made him sick." This is just a fact—they have a great abundance and much to spare, with the reputation of being generous hearted too! but for the want of thinking they let that poor man and his family suffer: and run the risk of losing what is not easily obtained—a good Parish Priest. The brothers however, conferred together, and concluded that this parish could not only support a minister, but a school of a high order, and thought of uniting their energies, in supplying the parish, and carrying on at the same time a school; after some other matters should be arranged. With this determination the brother returned to his own family and parish, and the pastor made known to his vestry, that his wants were such as required the immediate payment of his salary. The old senior Warden readily acquiesced, and after many objections, such as "we cannot pay until the crops are sold, bad time for collecting—the merchants, the lawyers, and the doctors can't make their money, nothing can be done any how, until late in the winter," the incorporated body resolved to try and see what could be done towards paying the minister. Two months passed, and the clergyman was so much in need, that he was compelled to call on the treasurer of the parish, who with a great deal of sorrow told him, he "had only collected about ten dollars, but he had not applied to all of them." On the very next Sunday, at the usual time of giving notice, &c., the clergyman announced to his congregation to the great surprise of all, that he would not write another sermon until his salary was paid. As he had a tolerably ready utterance they thought he would preach extempore, and that idea getting out, drew many together, who "delighted," as they said, "to see a man stir up his gifts and move the people." But this was not the intention of our invincible rector, his purpose was to "give them old sermons," the most distasteful of all kinds of preaching among a new people, and with surprising energy he adhered to his determination.

Sunday after Sunday familiar texts were announced and sermons almost as familiar, to a large part of the congregation delivered. So far as the strangers were concerned all were new and fresh to them, but "not caring much about written sermons any way," and "disappointed in not hearing so talented a man preach off hand," or as others said, "shoot on the wing," they could not stand the "second reading," and what was only second to them was no less than the third reading to the regular congregation. Mark you, the clergyman did not preach all of his theology, for that would have afforded rather more variety, than was consistent with his plan or desirable under the circumstances; so he only made use of a selected and limited quantity. He considered indeed, that he was trying a novel and important experiment, in which all of his clerical brethren were, nearly or more remotely interested, and he was not unwilling to become a martyr for their sakes; however unwilling he might be to suffer for himself, or to see his interesting family looking to him in vain—so he kept on preaching, earnestly and faithfully, but all "old sermons," and becoming older still; but my readers, before they passed quite to a fourth reading, one Monday morning early, the treasurer was seen entering in at the gate of the parsonage, and as his eye met the rector's, such a merry laugh as comes only of glad hearts, was heard then and there, in which the whole family united, almost before they knew the occasion, but which was louder, and more joyous made, when the treasurer exclaimed, "well sir, I have got it all at last," and turned a small and well earned bundle of money over into the pastor's hand. O it was a joyous morning, not for the money, for it would never have been thought of, if it had been possible to live without it—but because the people of his care and love, had at last thought of their pastor, and in one way at least, began to appreciate his services. As the good man put the little bundle of money into his wife's hand, to be laid out according to her discretion for the family, the sympathetic tear rolled down his cheek, while with the same hand he motioned the treasurer to stand by a chair near to a table, he and his wife and the children doing likewise, when he asked a blessing, and with cheerful and contented minds they partook together of a frugal but well prepared breakfast. HOSPITALITY TO THE CLERGY.

"Given to hospitality:" Romans xii. 13.

MY DEAR SIR:—

I am a clergyman of the Church, the husband of one wife, and possessed of little of the world's goods; but living, as becometh God's Ministers, by the Altar at which I serve; nor is it seemly that a Minister should have other means of living than the Altar, as the Lord hath ordained that they which preach the gospel should live of the gospel; and therefore I covet not house nor lands, for as strongly as they were forbidden to the Levitical Priesthood so are they forbidden to the Christian Priesthood, with all other entanglements of this world.

Not many weeks since I left my Parish, a small, poor, and worldly one, in a northern Diocese, to remove to one more southerly for the benefit of my health. Armed with my letters dismisy and kind epistles to the Southern Bishop, I bade my parishioners adieu and took the stage for my destination, seven hundred miles distant. What with the expenses of my wife, child, added to my own, and necessary delays in various towns to transfer baggage, (of which I was not overstocked, my sole worldly wealth being contained in two trunks, one of which held my wife's and my clothing, and the other my little and valuable library of Theological books,) by the time I reached the last stage of my journey, my purse became distressingly lank. I had set out with one hundred and seven dollars and thirty-seven cents, and I found myself within sixty miles of my destination on Saturday night with but seven dollars and eighty cents left. If I had kept on with the mail I might have reached my new point with my means; but I could not travel on Sunday. So after consulting our purse, and then faithfully looking up to Him who has said, "the gold and the silver are mine," wife and I concluded to lay over till Monday; and especially as knowing there was an Episcopal church in the town, the Rector of whom we trusted would invite us home, and so save us the necessity of touching our little remnant of traveling money. Early the next morning I inquired my way to the Rector's residence, when I learned that he was boarding at a private house. This did not promise well, but I sought him out, introduced myself as a brother presbyter, and was received with that warmth and cordial affection which characterizes the Clergy of our Church.

Rector. Where are you?

Myself. At the Hotel.

Rector. That's not right. I am boarding, and can't extend hospitality towards you, as I want to do. But my Parish is large, rich, and plenty of families who will receive you; and besides you must remain and rest for two or three days, so I will see some of them this morning. You will preach for me to-day.

I consented. The congregation was, indeed, as he had represented it, large and fashionable. After service no one came to the Vestry to invite me home, and the worthy young Rector hurrying off his surplice, hastened out, saying, "I'll find a house for you."

In a quarter of an hour he came back into the Vestry, looking mortified and vexed.

"These people—they are not holy churchmen! They do not comprehend one of the first and plainest duties of a churchman, to use hospitality without grudging." One lady says, "Dear me, I am painting and papering, for I'm to give a party next week—I'm so sorry it's happened so!" Another gentleman said, he believed his wife was indisposed, but would call on the Rector's lady the next day at the Hotel. A third plead that they were not prepared to entertain a lady, but "if it were a gentleman only they need not put themselves out, you know." Yet all these people are well off, and have room enough in their large houses. "The truth is," added the Rector, "they need to be taught their duty in this matter, and I will teach it to them. I must go to housekeeping at once, for it is a Clergyman's duty to entertain the Clergy. But I can neither entertain you nor get you entertained. My parishioners have made me blush."

They must learn, and shall learn, that it is their privilege to entertain God's servants; and in every parish there should be more than one family who keeps a 'Minister's room.'"

That evening, wife, who is so full of hope always, said she had no doubt some of the good people who could not take us in, would quietly come and pay our bill for us, for she had heard of such deeds. I must confess I had little faith in this charitable left-hand mode of saving our little store from exhaustion. That night our little boy was taken with the croup, and it was five days before we could leave and pursue our journey. By that time our bill had reached twenty-seven dollars, fifty cents, including ten dollars to a Doctor in the Hotel. Wife hoped that it would be paid mysteriously before we left. Several of the Rector's parishioners had called to see me and my wife when they heard the child was sick, but all ended in mere visits, a pot of jelly, an invitation to tea, and one invitation to ride over the town. The hour came that we must leave. With a trembling voice I asked for my bill, and was agast at beholding the amount! If I paid on it the seven dollars wife and I together had, we could not pay our stage fare. I mustered courage and told the landlord my situation, but with burning cheeks, for of all men a Clergyman should avoid putting himself in debt. The landlord, who was, or had been a dissenting elder, looked black, muttered something about "imposition," and bluntly said, "I could leave my baggage and send for it with money to pay the bill from the town I was going to!" I had no alternative! Amid the sneers of the waiters, and the frowns of the host, and the contemptuous looks of the landlady, wife and I stole into the stage, (having first given every penny but a dime for our fare in advance,) and took our seats with heavy hearts and grieved spirits, when we reflected on the want of hospitality of Church people, whereby we had been put to such grievous straits. To tell the truth, I had hoped till the very last, that the Rector might perchance think of us, and appropriate to discharging our bill, a portion of the weekly offertory received on the day I preached, and which I knew from him had amounted to thirty-four dollars and upwards. But no such considerate thought came into his mind; and yet, Mr. Editor, was it not his duty to make such disposition of a portion of the offerings where a brother Clergyman on his travels is compelled to remain at a Hotel?

I do not write this in the spirit of harshness. I write it in order that you may say something upon the great need there is of hospitality in the families of Church people, especially the well-to-do. I write it in hopes that many reading this may take thought of the stranger Minister, (wife or no wife) and use hospitality towards him without grudging bed or board. CLERICUS.

THE BISHOP WHITE MONUMENT. English & American Papers.

MR. EDITOR:—

The following sentiment uttered, some years ago, by a learned and generous dissenter of our city, deserves, we think, at least an occasional remembrance, inasmuch as it presents us with the overflowings of a full heart in reverence to the memory of that "pure spirit," who was a faithful embodiment of the piety of the Church—a burning and a shining light in his generation.

The extract is taken from a published address, by Dr. Bethune.

"If you wish a presentment of venerable piety, holy benevolence and wisdom in meekness, bid the sculptor preserve in undying marble the patriarchal form of him, whom every sect acknowledged 'a Father in God'; and who lingered so long among us, shedding his soft religion around like the mild rays of a summer's sunset, that he seemed like virtue which can never die, though heart and flesh must fail."

It may well be classed with the oft-repeated and well known exclamation of our Quaker Friends, who when they saw the venerable Prelate tottering under the burden of fourscore years, said: 'There goes our good Bishop,' and, 'See! there is our beloved Father William White,' and taught their children to kneel and receive his blessing; or, if you will, it is a worthy parallel with the splendid eulogium of the eminent Presbyterian Albert Barnes: "Many of the purest flames of devotion that rise from the earth, ascend from the altars of the Episcopal Church, and that many of the purest spirits that the earth contains, minister at those altars."

All will hail the day when the more enduring "Monument," the "Monumental Church," consecrated for ever to the glory of the Eternal Trinity, shall attest the faith and piety of this generation, in commemorating the peaceful virtues, and in imitating the living charity of the late RIGHT REVEREND FATHER IN GOD, WILLIAM WHITE.

PREPARATORY SCHOOL FOR BOYS.

AT MANAYUNK.

MR. EDITOR:—

Will you allow me a little space in the Banner, to call the attention of its readers to the advertisement of "Miss Hinshelwood's Preparatory School for Boys." There are doubtless many parents who would be glad to secure for their younger children such advantages as this school is designed to afford, and who yet may not be aware of its existence. Miss Hinshelwood is known to be a lady of very superior accomplishments, and eminently qualified, in every respect, for the difficult and responsible work which she has undertaken, as an instructress and guide of the young. She labours not merely to train the mind, but also to discipline the heart and improve the manners; in short, to impart that complete and thorough education which every thoughtful Christian parent would wish his child to receive. It is perhaps in the moral training of her pupils that Miss H. particularly excels. With none of the foolish partialities of a parent, she manifests that affectionate solicitude for the welfare of the children committed to her care, which is rarely found except among parents themselves.

The great success which has thus far attended her efforts is not surprising to those who have witnessed the fidelity, zeal and untiring assiduity with which her duties are performed. Her heart is in her work. Parents cannot, I am sure, entrust their children to safer hands.

At a meeting of the Standing Committee of the Diocese of Pennsylvania, held on the 1st inst.,

Mr. James Lawson, M. D., late a minister of the Methodist denomination, and Mr. William Huckel, applied to be recommended for admission, as candidates for Holy Orders. Their applications lie over for action at the next meeting.

At the same meeting, testimonials were signed on behalf of the Rev. Archibald Beatty, deacon, applying to be recommended for admission to the Holy Order of Priests; and of Mr. John K. Murphy, candidate, applying to be recommended for admission to the Holy Order of Deacons.

M. A. DE WOLFE HOWE, Secretary.

Philadelphia, May 3d, 1849.

THE CONVENTION OF THE DIOCESE OF PENNSYLVANIA will meet for organization in St. Andrew's Church, at 6 o'clock P. M. on Tuesday next. The opening services will be held, in the same Church, on the following morning.

CLERGYMEN GONE ABROAD.

The Rev. Mr. Newton, and the Rev. Mr. Maxwell, of this city, sailed for Europe in the last Packet, from Philadelphia. The Rev. Mr. Fowles, Rector of the Church of the Epiphany, is to sail in the next steamer. The two former have gone abroad to recruit their impaired health. We wish them all a safe and happy journey, and hope that they may be restored to their friends in perfect health, and with renewed strength.

NEW JERSEY.

ANNUAL CONVENTION.—The sixty-sixth Annual Convention of the diocese, will be held in St. Mary's Church, Burlington, on Wednesday, 30th May. Divine Service at ten o'clock, A. M. The Clergy, with their surplices, are requested to assemble at Riverside, at nine o'clock, A. M.

From Church Papers.

NEW JERSEY.

EPISCOPAL SERVICES.—On Thursday, 12 April, the Bishop consecrated St. Paul's Church, South Trenton. The request to consecrate was read by the Rector, the Rev. Mr. Franklin; morning prayer by the Rev. Mr. Southard, (of the diocese of New York,) assisted in the Lessons, by the Rev. Mr. Mitchell; the sentence of consecration, by the Rev. Mr. Bradin; the Epistle, by the Rev. Mr. Adams. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Mr. Paterson; and the Bishop was assisted in the communion by the Rector. The Rev. Mr. Labagh was present.

On Wednesday, 25 April, (St. Mark's day,) the Bishop instituted the Rev. Charles Woodruff Rankin, into the Rectorship of St. Peter's Church, Morristown. Morning Prayer was read by the Rev. Mr. Clarkson; the Rev. Dr. Ogilby preached the Sermon; the Holy Communion was administered by the newly instituted Rector. The Rev. Mr. Roberts was present.—Missionary.

WESTERN NEW YORK.

BISHOP DE LANCEY'S VISITATION.—On Sunday, April 29th, Bishop De Lancey visited Grace Church, Lyons. In the morning he held an ordination, and admitted Mr. Oran Reed Howard, to the holy order of Deacons.—Prayers were read, and the candidate was presented by the Rev. Mr. Wardwell, the Rector of the church. The Bishop preached and administered the Holy Communion, the Rector assisting in the distribution of the elements. In the afternoon the Bishop preached and confirmed twenty-three persons, to whom he delivered an address. Of the persons confirmed sixteen had been baptized as adults by the present Rector. The Rev. Mr. Howard had been a minister of the Methodist denomination in that village.—Gospel Messenger.

MASSACHUSETTS.

TRINITY CHURCH, PAWTUCKET.—The Bishop of the Diocese made his annual visitation to this parish on Sunday the 22d ult., and preached in the morning, afternoon and evening to large and attentive congregations. In the evening six persons were confirmed, after which the candidates were addressed by the Bishop. The address, we need hardly say, was very appropriate and impressive.

An effort is now making in the parish to obtain subscriptions towards building a Church, and we are happy to state that the effort has thus far been attended with the most gratifying success.—Witness.

GRACE CHURCH, NEW BEDFORD.—The Bishop of the Diocese visited this Church Wednesday evening, 18th. Six persons were confirmed, and three were prevented from attending by illness and on account of the storm, which raged with violence during the services.—Ch. Witness.

MAINE.

The Board of Missions in this Diocese assembled in St. Paul's church, Brunswick, on Tuesday, the 24th of April. Present, the Bishop, and all the clergy having parishes, except the Rev. Mr. Hammond, who was detained by sickness in his family. The Rev. Mr. Pyncheon, of Massachusetts, was also present during a part of the session.

Tuesday evening, a sermon was preached by Rev. J. Pratt. Wednesday morning, addresses were made by the Bishop, Rev. Alexander Burgess and Rev. J. Pratt. In the afternoon a sermon was preached by the Rev. Mr. Pyncheon. In the evening, the Bishop preached and confirmed five persons. Thursday morning, Mr. Durborow preached; after which the holy communion was administered by the Bishop. In the afternoon, the Rev. Mr. Murray preached. A missionary meeting was held in the evening, at which addresses were made by the Rev. Messrs. Gardiner, Durborow, Pratt and the Bishop. And thus ended one of the most interesting and encouraging meetings of the Board of Missions in Maine, that we ever yet attended.

Throughout the services, the congregations were large, and gave us the most gratifying evidence of the gradual increase and prosperity of the parish. And when we remember that our much esteemed brother who has charge of the station, has been for many months past, unable, from an affection of the throat, to discharge the full duties of his office, we were indeed thankful to find the parish so steadily advancing. A good deal of interest, moreover, was imparted to this occasion, by H. R. Gardiner, Esq., a lay member of the Board, who for many years, has stood watching carefully the progress of the Church in this Diocese. He reminded us of the days of darkness and weakness through which he had come with the Church, and compared with which, the present is a day of light and strength. As he spoke of the times when there were but two, and of other times when there was not a single clergyman of our Church in Maine, and then dwelt upon our present condition, our hearts were warmed; and we were led to hope that the time to favor Zion had fully come.

And to confirm this faith and hope, the most encouraging reports were received from the various missionary stations in the Diocese, while from different sources, accounts were received, leading us to believe that the Church might be established at several points, where, as yet it has no organized existence.

On the whole, it was a meeting not soon to be forgotten.

Witness.

Yours,

J. P.
Rev. J. Pratt

VIRGINIA.

CONSECRATION.—The new Church of St. George's, Fredericksburg, was consecrated on Sunday last, by the Rt. Rev. Bishop Meade. A full congregation, including a number of the clergy were present to participate in the services appointed for this occasion and to hear an appropriate address from the Bishop. In the afternoon and evening, Divine service was held, and sermons delivered by the Rev. Mr. Friend, and the Rev. Dr. Sparrow.

The following is a description of this new Church, which has been sent to us for publication:

The architectural "style" in which the building is designed, is that called the Romanesque, being that phase of the Art which prevailed in Italy from the time of Constantine, the first Christian Emperor, up to the introduction of the Pointed or Gothic style in the 11th century: and not only in Italy, but in Germany and France, where this style of building was used in the first churches erected after the conversion of these countries to Christianity. It is distinguished by the semi-circular arch over all the openings, by buttresses of slight projection, steep roofs and other characteristics of detail which mark it as peculiar in its expression.

The building is divided into main body, having nave and aisles; tower and chancel; with vestry room attached in continuation of the latter. The main body of the Church including buttresses, is 54 feet wide by 95 feet 9 inches long, the chancel is 26 feet wide and 22 feet deep, outside of the walls, and the tower is 20 feet square at the base, and is placed in the middle of the front, projecting therefrom 4 feet, making the whole building 122 feet long. The tower forms a middle vestibule, on each side of which is a stair vestibule with stair-case leading up to the gallery. Each vestibule has an entrance door on the front, which thus, with the middle door in the tower, has three doors. The gallery extends only across the entrance end of the Church, and is divided into three portions, the middle one being appropriated to the organ and choir.—S. Churchman.

ILLINOIS.

To the interesting account given in our last, of the formation of a Scandinavian congregation, we append the following letter from the vestry. It breathes the right spirit. We are indebted to the Spirit of Missions for the interesting document.

Chicago, March 8th, 1849.

TO THE RT. REV. PHILANDER CHASE, D. D., BISHOP OF THE PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH OF THE DIOCESE OF ILLINOIS.

Rt. Rev. Father in God:—Deeply sensible that the temporal happiness and freedom, which we have here sought for, far from our native lands, cannot be obtained, secured, and really enjoyed by us, if we do not at the same time seek for that true happiness, which is found only in a life in God, and in a fulfilment of our duties as Christians,—we have met together and daily considered how our Holy Religion, the faith of our fathers, could be best promoted and maintained among us and our children. As foreigners in this land, many of us more or less unacquainted with its language, we are not able fully to enjoy the blessed privileges of the Church, and the benefits of God's public worship. As natives of Sweden and Norway, we are members of a Church, which, after the Lutheran Reformation, adopted as an exposition of her belief the Confession of Augsburg, and other symbols in common with the Evangelic Lutheran Church, whose name she also assumed. Still the Church did not lose her character of an Apostolic Church. She has maintained the order of an Apostolic Ministry, instituted by God, in its true succession of Bishops, and in its Episcopal government, unto this day, by virtue of her Constitution and Canons, as by law established.* Baptized into this Church, and members of the same, we know ourselves to be members of the one holy, Catholic and Apostolic Church; the one Body of the one Lord. In this body we are still desirous to remain. Although now separated from that branch of the universal Church, which is established in our country, we do not wish here to separate ourselves from the Holy Apostolic Church. At the same time we are anxious to preserve among us the faith of our fathers, and the Church ceremonies and mode of worship, unto which we have been accustomed from our infancy, and which have become dear to us. In this how to unite these two things, has been a matter of deep and serious consideration with us.

We have here met with a Lutheran Church, in many respects different from the Church of the same name, established and maintained in our native lands. We see here that denomination divided within itself, and rent into different parties and societies, differing in many religious principles, and in worship, and without coherence or connection with each other, and with a ministry and government different from those of our countries, and which we believe to constitute essential features of the Universal Church. As Scandinavian Lutherans, we do not here recognize among our brethren of the same name that Creed and Church, which were in our fathers' time, and in the old time before them.

* This is a fact not to be disputed as far as the Swedish Church is concerned. With regard to the Church of Norway, we must receive it in good faith. She acknowledges now, at least in practice, a true ministerial order, having Episcopacy, although the true succession might be a matter of great doubt. Still, it is a stated fact, that two or three of the Roman Catholic Bishops in that country, at the Reformation, joined the Reformed Church, and retained their office; but the Government of Denmark, with which kingdom Norway at that time was united, probably filled some of the vacant Sees with merely nominal Bishops, deriving their ordination from Hugenagius. G. U.

Again, we have heard that many of our brethren in this country have united with the Protestant Episcopal Church. We have examined into the Creed and Articles of this Church, and found them to be an exposition of substantially the same faith, into which we have been brought up, and which we still profess. We have looked upon her Holy Sacraments and ordinances, as being those in which, as members of Christ's Church, we are in duty bound to continue faithful and steadfast. We see in her Apostolic Ministry the same order of men, who formerly administered to us the ordinances of the Church. A countryman of ours, Rev. Gutlaf Unonius, ordained Presbyter of the Church in America, and Diocese of Wisconsin, has lately visited us. He has made us further acquainted with the Church of which he is a minister. We have come to the conclusion, that in our present circumstances the only way by which we can secure to ourselves and our children the faith of our fathers, and continue faithful to that Church, in whose bosom we have been received, is to enter into communion with the Protestant Episcopal Church of this country.

We have accordingly met and organized under the name of St. Ansgarii Church, and desire to be received into communion with the Protestant Episcopal Church of this Diocese. We shall, accordingly, with your approbation, apply for admission at the ensuing Annual Convention. Acknowledging you, Right Reverend Father in God, and your successors in office, as our Bishop, we wish to place ourselves under your jurisdiction. We have subscribed and do recognize the authority of the Constitution and Canons of the Protestant Episcopal Church in America, and Diocese of Illinois; but, in consideration of our peculiar position as a congregation of foreigners in this land, not yet able, with advantage and edification, to use the Prayer-Book of this Church, and attend to its public worship, we have found it necessary to form some By-laws, to which we most respectfully ask your sanction and consent. These By-laws, which, in our humble opinion, do not annul or make void the General Constitution and Canons of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America, nor the Constitution and Canons of this Diocese, we here send you in the original. Desirous that you will have the kindness to take notice of the same, and of the Constitution which we have thus adopted for our Parish, we hereby respectfully submit them to your judgment, most earnestly asking you, in consideration of our peculiar situation, to grant us the privileges which we have there specified as most conducive, in our opinion, to the establishment and promotion of the Church and her true Religion among us.

In hope, Right Reverend Father in God, that you will receive us as children of the Church, we remain,

Most Respectfully,

Your faithful Sons and Servants in Christ.

(Signed by the Wardens and Vestry of St. Ansgarii Church, Chicago.)

TENNESSEE.

On Easter Sunday the Rt. Rev. Bishop Otey held confirmation in St. John's church, Maury county, and admitted thirteen to that rite, ten of whom were colored persons. This is the third confirmation held in the rural parish of St. John's within the past ten months. The whole number confirmed has been twenty-nine, of whom twenty were colored.

On the first Sunday after Easter, the Bishop visited St. Paul's parish, Franklin, and confirmed three persons.

The following notice we take from the Spirit of Missions and commend to the attention of our Readers:—

THE TERCENTENARY OF THE PRAYER-BOOK ON WHIT-SUNDAY. —Whit-Sunday next, May 27th, 1849, will be the Three Hundredth Anniversary of the introduction and use of the Book of Common Prayer in all the churches of England. The admirable letter of the Bishop of Gibraltar to the Archbishop of Canterbury, recently published, suggests that the approaching Anniversary of the Prayer-Book and of the English Reformation, shall be made the occasion of a great, simultaneous, and universal effort on the part of the members of the Church of England, for the wider extension of its ministry and services abroad.

It will be remembered that several of the Bishops in this country have recommended that the Tercentenary of the Prayer-Book should here also be commemorated; and have suggested that contributions, in aid of MISSIONS, at HOME and ABROAD; but more particularly for the endowment of a Missionary Bishop for California, and a Missionary Bishop for Africa—be made in all our churches on that day.

A communication has been received from the Missionary Bishop of the North-West, in which he refers to this subject. The suggestion he makes, and its reasons, are so important, that we cannot omit their publication. In doing so, we trust we shall not interfere with any other plan. There are means, enough and to spare, in our churches, for ALL THE OBJECTS CONTEMPLATED; why may not the hearts of ALL the Missionaries have cause for special joy on that day? Perhaps there are many Parishes which may feel their inability to aid a general object—but which ought not to resist the suggestions hereafter made.

In the history of many of the churches in this country it is already recorded, "freely ye have received." Many are now able to do much—may they also "freely give."

The Bishop writes: "I perceive a movement for a general Missionary Collection on Whit-Sunday, in consequence of the letter of the Bishop of Gibraltar. Now, as it is a simple principle of morality to be just before we are generous; and it is somewhere said that he who provides not for his own, &c., is worse than an infidel, I respectfully suggest to the Domestic Committee a circular imploring collections on that day, to enable you to fulfil all your pledges, and thus be entirely out of debt, at the Annual Meeting of the Board."

His words are sent instead. And may they prove of far more efficacy than any "Circular" from the Committee.

"NOT TO MYSELF ALONE."

BY S. W. PARTRIDGE.

"Not to myself alone,"

The little opening flower transported cries;
Not to myself alone I bud and bloom;
With fragrant breath the breezes I perfume,
And gladden all things with my rainbow dyes;
The bee comes sipping every evening tide
His scanty fill;
The butterfly within my cup doth hide
From threatening ill.

"Not to myself alone,"

The heavy-laden bee doth murmuring hum—
Not to myself alone, from flower to flower,
I rove the wood, the garden, and the bower,
And to the hive at evening weary come.
For man, for man, the luscious food I pile
With busy care,
Content if this repay my ceaseless toil—
A scanty share.

"Not to myself alone,"

The soaring bird with lusty pinions sings;
Not to myself alone I raise my song;
I cheer the drooping with my warbling tongue,
And bear the mourner on my viewless wings:
I bid the hymnless churl my anthem learn,
And God adore;
I call the worldling from his dross to turn,
And sing and soar.

"Not to myself alone,"

The circling star with honest pride doth boast;
Not to myself I rise and set;
I write upon night's coronet of jet
His power and skill who form'd our myriad host;
A friendly beacon at heaven's opening gate,
I gem the sky,
That man may ne'er forget, in every fate,
His home on high.

"Not to myself alone,"

O man! forget not thou—earth's honour'd priest!
Its tongue, its soul, its life, its pulse, its heart;
In earth's great chorus to sustain thy part—
Chiefest of guests at love's ungrudging feast,
Play not the niggard, spurn thy native clod,
And self disown:
Live to thy neighbour, live unto thy God,
Not to thyself alone.

NEANDER, THE CHURCH HISTORIAN.

I had the opportunity the other day, of seeing the celebrated Professor NEANDER. I first went in the morning to the University to hear him deliver an exegetical lecture, upon a chapter in the New Testament. His personal appearance was as singular as his mode of addressing his audience was extraordinary.

His forehead, broad and high, was almost wholly covered by his long uncombed black hair, and its base was bounded by a massive ridge, jutting far outwards, and surrounded by thick shaggy eyebrows. His eyes were so deeply sunken, and concealed by his half-closed eye-lids, that neither their color nor their form were discernible. His nose and his mouth were rudely shaped, and his complexion was of that dark, dry, sallow cast, that mark years of intense study and reflection. His form was thin, bent, and loosely knit, and his carriage and attitude the most careless and graceless possible. He had on a white cravat, and a grayish frock coat reaching below his knees. Fancy such a man, standing on a slightly elevated platform, his left arm resting on the corner of a desk four feet high, his left hand shading his eyes from the light, his right hand holding within three or four inches of his face a large-typed Greek Testament, from which he never withdraws his intense look—and further, fancy him with the whole upper half of his person bent over in an angle of nearly forty-five degrees, balancing the desk upon its two back legs, and with his left foot kept constantly crossed over his right, except when occasionally, either through caprice, or to restore the equilibrium of the desk, he suddenly retracts it as if about to take a desperate leap, and as suddenly replaces it—and still further, fancy him perfectly absorbed in his subject, and speaking with a slow monotonous utterance, interrupted only by a pause when he has to ask from one of the students a word which he cannot recognise on account of imperfect sight—and you have a faithful picture of the most philosophical historian and perhaps most profound theologian living, in rapportement with his young disciples.

When his instructions are not exegetical, and do not require a book, you will have to vary the picture by imagining him lecturing extemporaneously, and all the while engaged in pulling to pieces a quill, previously given him by one of his attendants for this special purpose. I mention these things to interest but not to divert you; for it is only a narrow and vulgar mind that can find in the infirmities or eccentricities of a great man matter for ridicule. Notwithstanding all of his peculiarities, the students, of whom there were some 60 or 70 present, seemed to regard him with a reverence approaching to homage, and to catch as treasure every word that fell from his lips.

After dinner, in company with one of the students I called upon NEANDER at his residence. We found him in his study, robed in his study gown, and surrounded with a large library of well-worn books. He received us with the most unaffected kindness and warmth, and directly began to talk with me in my native tongue. He spoke English with tolerable correctness and facility, but as is the case with most foreign scholars, he had a much better command of the Latin than of the Saxon element of our language. He highly commended Prof. ROBINSON'S American work on Palestine, and also our Andover Quarterly, the Bibliotheca Sacra, several numbers of which I noticed in his library. He spoke in terms of high praise of COLERIDGE and DR. ARNOLD, and referred with great satisfaction to the little progress that Pantheism has made in the western world. His whole soul seemed to be wrapped up in the great struggle now going on between faith and unbelief, between supernaturalism and rationalism, a battle, he said, fraught with more momentous consequences than any other of the age. Vast as are this great man's acquirements, and capacious and profound as is his intellect, every word and every movement evinced complete unconsciousness of self, and a perfectly child-like gentleness and simplicity of heart. Uncultivated as are his manners, and odd as are his ways, by his greatness he commands your reverence, and by his goodness he wins your love.

NEANDER is sixty years of age; he is a bachelor, and his sister is housekeeper. Two years ago, he suddenly and without any apparent immediate cause, almost entirely lost his eyesight; he now sees so indistinctly that it is imprudent for him to venture into the street alone. Yet he daily delivers at the University three lectures, each an hour in length, one on Church History, another on Christian Ethics, and the third of an exegetical character. He pursues his studies and researches with the help of a little knot of students he keeps around him, and he dictates all of his written productions to an amanuensis. His Church History, the first part of which has been so admirably translated by Professor TORREY of the University of Vermont, has not yet been brought down later than the fourteenth century. Had his eyes continued good, it would before this time have been fully completed. It is now uncertain, as I was told by the author, when the work in its entire form will be given to the world. NEANDER lives a very retired life in Berlin, and yet he is exceedingly popular. Tobacco pipes bear his likeness, an important street in the city is named after him, and his last birth-day was celebrated by a torch-light procession.

To the Editor of the Banner of the Cross.

REV. AND DEAR BROTHER:—

The enclosed letter I have just had occasion to address to one of my communicants, and, as it may be interesting and satisfactory to others, I send it for publication in the Banner.

Most faithfully your friend and brother,

L. SILLIMAN IVES.

April 25, 1849.

Edenton, April 20th, 1849.

MY DEAR FRIEND:—

For the love I bear you, and for the confidence you have once shown me, allow me to speak to you, and to speak to you as your Bishop and friend. My motive (I think, you will believe me) is no fear of losing influence or popularity. These things I have long since learned to distrust, and to hold in due subordination (I hope) to my duty to Christ. But I have, (and I know I speak from the heart when I say it) too sincere a love, for you as a man, and too deep a solicitude for your salvation as a Christian, to keep silence on so solemn an occasion as the present. We are both acting under vows, both under responsibility to God, according to our stations in the Church; and are soon to meet together at the judgment of CHRIST, when we shall both be judged according to our fidelity to HIM. Ought we not to pause, and very seriously consider before we take a step, to me so perfectly awful as that of separating ourselves from "the communion of His body and blood?"

This step, I hear, you are now taking—and taking on the ground of being compelled to it by the teaching of your Bishop.

But before taking such a step, and passing such a judgment (I will not now question your right to do it) upon him whom Christ hath set over you, ought you not, on every principle of justice to him, and of safety to your own soul, to take every means, which the circumstances can possibly admit, to be informed accurately and thoroughly as to his exact teaching, which is made to you the matter of offence?—Ought you not to presume that your Bishop, with his tremendous and peculiar responsibility, and with his generally admitted fidelity to the Church, would prayerfully consider and most deliberately weigh his instructions before giving them utterance; and hence, that charity, yea, common justice would suggest some misapprehension or undue prejudice, on the part of the hearer, rather than any serious deviation from truth on the part of the Bishop, particularly at this time of blinding excitement and thoughtless denunciation? To come to the point in question, when an affirmative answer was given by your pastor to the question? "Does the Bishop consider it desirable to have private confession and absolution restored to the Church?"—ought you not—even supposing you his rightful judge—to have considered whether he desired this in a way, different from that in which the Prayer Book authorized it, or in a way at all prejudicial to the liberty and welfare of the members of the Church? Now what has your Bishop done? You will certainly allow him, at this time of extravagant and even ludicrous misrepresentation, to answer this question for himself. Under a painful conviction that through the influence of false systems of religion around us, the members of our communion were fast losing sight of the privileges opened to them in their Liturgy, and fast sinking into a most dangerous state of worldliness, he has felt it to be his duty, to save his own soul and theirs—to make a strenuous effort to check this influence, and to awaken in his people a just estimate of their neglected privileges. Among these is the privilege of private confession and absolution. Now will any one take it upon himself to say, that this privilege is not provided and urged in certain cases upon the penitent as desirable, by our portion of the Catholic Church? The language of the communion office by which we are bound is,—“Because it is requisite that no man should come to the Holy Communion, but with a full trust in God’s mercy, and with a quiet conscience, therefore, if there be any of you, who, by this means, cannot quiet his own conscience herein, but requireth further comfort or counsel, let him come to me, or to some discreet and learned minister of God’s word, and open his grief; that, by the ministry of God’s holy word, he may receive the benefit of absolution, together with ghostly counsel and advice, to the quieting of his conscience, and avoiding of all scruple and doubtfulness.” This contains all I have taught either publicly or privately. Surely it is enough to show the desirableness of private confession and absolution in our Church, or at least, that our Church herself thinks them desirable. But you may say, that the word “absolution” is not found in the American Prayer Book. In reply, the following must be satisfactory to an intelligent mind, and hence to yours. In regard to the differences between the American and English Liturgies, the Preface to the former holds this language. “It will appear that this Church is far from intending to depart from the Church of England in any essential point of doctrine, discipline or worship, or further than local circumstances require.” It should be borne in mind, that this language is not only a true exponent of the sense or intention of the framers of our Liturgy; but also was given as a pledge of our consent, to the “doctrine, discipline and worship of the English Church” to the Archbishop of Canterbury, before he would grant us the Episcopacy. Now from this language we find ourselves bound not to depart essentially from the “discipline” set forth in the English Prayer Book. As a part of that “discipline” not only is “private confession” under certain circumstances, but also “private absolution,” recommended. Now, the actual difference, in regard to this point of discipline, between the English and American Prayer Books, is either “essential” or non-essential. If essential, then are we bound by the declared intention of the framers of our Prayer Book, and by our pledge to the English Bishops, to defer to the English Book, and accept this point of discipline as our own.—If not essential, then my asserting it, can be no reasonable ground of objection to my teaching; and hence, no reasonable ground (even on the assumption, to my mind bold and hazardous in the extreme, of your right to decide the question) for your departure from the body of Christ—particularly when the act is one of unjust judgment upon your Bishop, and of injury to your fellow Christians.

But suppose the teaching of your Bishop in this particular, were questionable,—have you been required by him, or by your Priest, to act upon it?—or even to give your assent to it? And has it come to this, that a Bishop impelled by his solemn vows of fidelity to his people, cannot call upon them to open their eyes to their neglected privileges, or cannot assert the desirableness, and in some cases the necessity (a necessity created by their moral state) of their having recourse to these privileges, without being considered so dangerous a teacher, as to make it unsafe, I do not say to follow him, but to remain in communion with him?

But would to God, that I did not feel bound for the love of Christ and unfeigned alarm for your salvation to put the further question, and beg you to answer it to your own conscience in all sincerity—whether a deeper anxiety for your own salvation, and a more intense and earnest pursuit of eternal things would not allay your present apprehensions, and bring you back in broken-hearted penitence to the “communion of Christ’s body and blood?”

Of one thing be assured, my dear friend, that nothing but an anxious desire for your present and eternal good, could have moved me, under the pressure of my arduous and often very painful duties, to address you this letter; and that whatever may be the result of it, I shall not cease to pray that He whose altar of love you have taken it upon yourself to desert, may not desert you in that awful day when the false stimulus of all human passion must fail, and nothing but a conviction of humble and submissive obedience to Christ, can bring peace and strength to our souls.

Very truly and faithfully,

Your friend and servant in Christ,
L. SILLIMAN IVES.

P. S. In regard to the Anglican view of Confession, the following is a pertinent passage from the low Churchman—the Rev. George Stanley Faber, B. D.—“Auricular confession to a Priest, the Church of England allows and in some cases recommends. The Church of Rome not only allows and recommends it, but also as a matter of strict religious obligation imposes and enforces it.” The Bishop of North Carolina has, in no case, sought, either publicly or privately, to “impose or enforce it,” may he not “recommend it”—in certain cases, without being a Romanist?—He became a Romanist in

THE “PRIEST UPON HIS THRONE.”

(AN ASCENSION TOPIC.)

Mr. Editor:—Allow me to offer to your readers, in this and two other articles soon to follow, some reflections on two or three interesting departments of Gospel truth and edification.

One of the results of the death and the exaltation of Christ was His being recognized as the High-priest of the fallen creatures whom He had redeemed. And this lofty function of the Redeemer, not on the earth but in heaven, is vitally important. There are two kinds of priesthood,—the priesthood of Christ, which alone is real,—and the priesthood of men, which, though subordinately beneficial, is no more than a shadow of His. Natural religion would intimate that a human being has in himself the right to approach the Almighty with prayers, and offerings, and a hope of acceptance; but Christianity denies this imaginary privilege, and ordains that we approach first the Son of God, and petition Him to approach the Father in our place,—ourselves being unworthy to do so but through His intervention. Hence, all our supplications, all our worship, are in His Name; our entire hope, for every good thing we need or desire, whether in time or in eternity, rests exclusively on the propitiatory offering He made on the cross. The atoning oblation of Jesus for our sins, and His intercession or pleading on high the virtue of that atonement in our behalf, (the chief topic now before us,) and also, the atonement and the intercession for them having prevailed, His benediction on the faithful, make that branch of the mediatorial office which is the proper priesthood. There is inherent efficacy in the sacerdotal functions of Christ. But the priesthood exercised by men is a mere representation, to our penitent and longing faith, of this mighty work. The patriarchal, the Jewish, and Christian priests stand only in the place of Christ; their office having no efficacy in itself, but deriving all its value, all its subordinate and dependent utility, from the offering, the intercession, and the benediction of the One High-priest in heaven.

The doctrine of a proper priesthood, the principle that this mediation between men and God is essential, belongs not to natural religion, but to the “gospel,” whether before or after Christ. Natural religion, as commonly interpreted, might for convenience or order have its ministers, to conduct the public worship and teaching, and to superintend its administration; and such duties have always been more or less appropriated, by the irregular as well as the regular communities of revealed religion, besides those of false creeds, to members appointed for the work. But the priesthood of Christ is much more than this, being ordained, not for mere convenience or order, but for necessity. Jesus must stand between us and God, or we, sinners, whether at worst or at best, cannot reach His presence and favour. This, the mediatorial procedure, is the only method by which it pleases the Most High, immaculately holy, to deal with our fallen race. Our subject does not involve the distinctive nature and efficacy of the lower and contingent sacerdotal office in men.

In several scriptures the priesthood of the Redeemer is compared to that of Melchisedec, who was both king of Salem and priest of the Most High God, and so doubly His type. Christ was “called [or saluted] of God an High-priest after the order of Melchisedec:” for, though inaugurated at His baptism to part of His sacerdotal function, a higher inauguration awaited Him after rising from the dead, and when ready to sit down at the right hand of God; the former consecration made Him the Priest, the latter the High-priest. The word “called,” alludes to the ceremony of saluting a person, for the first time, by the title of office he has acquired; indeed, it is more than a ceremony, being a solemn recognition, pledge, plighted acknowledgment. Emperors have been made by acclamation or salutation, as of the soldiers or the people; and at this day, in some countries, when rank is conferred, there is a formal salutation by the proper title. So with our Lord. Having, by mortal and peculiar suffering and the mortal surrender, completed the atonement for sin, and then, revived from death, having offered that sacrifice before the Father, He is favourably received; and, as the eternal ratification of the acceptance, He is “saluted” by God as the High-priest, and sits on the right hand of the King Supreme, “a Priest upon His throne.”

Christ’s resurrection and ascension and resuming His throne, bringing thither also His human nature, were not only for His reward, but for our benefit: He there intercedes for us as our Priest,—and He there protects us as our King. In the patriarchal ages, the royal and sacerdotal dignities were often united in one person, though not after the giving of the law; a proof that with the exaltation of the enthroned Priest, announced by Zechariah, (vi. 13.) the Mosaic law would end;—the necessity of mankind required the full and final dispensation for their welfare. We give a few thoughts to each of these functions of the Redeemer,—the royal-sacerdotal function,—and the priestly-regal function,—combined, yet discriminable.

1. It is worthy of our deepest pondering, that, after Christ’s exaltation to a throne incomparably supereminent, after being restored to the infinite glory which He had with the Father before the world existed, He still discharges the priestly office. He made His sacrifice on earth,—in heaven He offers His priestly INTERCESSION. We learn from an apostle, that, as Jesus “died for our sins,” so He “rose again for our justification;” and this is final authority, distinguishing between these two branches of the mediatorial function, between the sacrificial work the Redeemer performed here below, and that further saving office He bears when risen and glorified, which is termed our justification. The atonement was for all men, for the whole world, without an exception; justification, the atonement being accepted and improved by willing hearts, is particular, the pleading of His own death and merits in behalf of these individual saints.—The connecting link between the sacrifice of Jesus, “obtaining the eternal redemption,” and this His exalted interventional function, was His “entering in once into the holy place,”—thither ascending, and there exhibiting His intact crucified body before the Majesty on high.* As the levitical high-priest, going behind the veil of the tabernacle, carried the blood of the great annual victim into the holy of holies, for a testimony of its death for the sins of the people, so Jesus presented His wrecked and wounded frame before the Father in heaven, in attestation of His having “tasted death for every man,”—the payment of that Ransom, and its judicial acceptance being thus indelibly recorded in the celestial chancery. The “blood by which we are justified,” is there established in open view for ever. And the ransom being irrevocably acknowledged, Jesus is complete in His right to bring to heaven each and all who will “stand fast in the liberty wherewith He hath made them free,” complete in the right “by His one offering to perfect for ever them that are sanctified.”

“It is God that justifieth;” not any creature, or any act or sentiment of a creature. It is Christ who procures the justification; in this, His function and His honour are exclusive. And He does this by His higher mediation, by interceding for us with the Father: for the texts are parallel, “who was delivered

* Hence the prohibition at first, “touch me not, for I am not yet ascended to my Father,” and the permission afterwards, “handle me,” “reach hither thy hand, and thrust it into my side.” Forensic accuracy, in presenting at the Throne His body as it was slain and buried, was maintained.—The final ascension of Christ is the one eminently so called, that being His eternal exaltation. It excludes not, however, a previous one, or several, less notable. (See Bishop Horsley and others.)

for our offences; and was raised again for our justification,”—and, “it is Christ that died, yea rather, that is risen again, who is even at the right hand of God, who also maketh intercession for us.” At the right hand of God, Christ is our justifying Intercessor,—the pleader of His atonement and merits in behalf of the godly,—the Intercessor for those who cast away their transgressions, and make them a new heart and a new spirit, and approach and embrace Him with an unmingled reliance on His cross and worth alone. The doctrine of the intercession, profoundly momentous and influential, makes our repentance and faith necessary, as well as the death of Christ,—“He is able to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by Him, seeing He ever liveth to make intercession for them:” for those only maketh He intercession who “come to God” by truly forsaking their sins,—for those only who thus come “by Him,” adding true faith in Christ to their effectual repentance. And such as these may apply to their souls the comfort of St. John’s declaration, “if any man sin, we have an Advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous,” who is thus the efficacious “propitiation for our sins.”

Recurring again to the types: When the high-priest had made the annual sprinkling of blood within the holy of holies, he came forth from behind the veil into public view, and blessed the people who had waited on his atoning service. It was the great typical assurance of God’s complete reconciliation and favour. This priestly function, likewise, appertains to Christ, and will complete the process of our justification; as the apostle declares, alluding to this ceremony at the tabernacle,—“unto them that look for Him, He shall appear the second time, without sin, [relieved of the vicarious burden,] unto salvation.” In the last day, the true Israel of God, both the living and those raised from death, will stand ready for the return of their High-priest from the heavenly tabernacle: and He will come forth to their view, will pronounce their final absolution from sin, and will bid them enter into the holiest place by His blood, there sprinkled to open it for them, to consecrate for them the new and living way through the veil into the inner celestial sanctuary. Thus, where He is, there will His servants be. Thus will His atonement on the cross and His intercession above become their accomplished and perfected justification.

2. We forget not that, having finally and gloriously ascended, our Priest sitteth upon a throne,—that He is likewise our King,—that “God hath exalted Him with His right hand to be a Prince as well as a Saviour.” On His “shoulder is the government” of the whole mediatorial system.—Jesus enthroned is King of the Church, extending its happy rule, not of policy and competition, but of eternal principle and truth, over the world. “The Lord shall send the rod (sceptre) of thy strength out of Zion,” the Church, saith the psalmist: and the preachers of His gospel went into all nations, “beginning at [the central Church] Jerusalem.” Thence, from Zion, went forth the gospel, the priestly sceptre of His strength.—He is King in the hearts of His faithful people, the outward influence of the Church being excelled by the “might in the inner man” enabling them to overcome the depravity that wars against their souls. The weapons of this warfare are not carnal, but mighty through God. And, to furnish these, the dispensation of the Spirit devolves upon our sacerdotal King,—“of His fulness, [from the store of holy aids which He gained for men] all we receive, even grace upon grace:” it is “the supply of the Spirit or Jesus Christ.”—To the Divine King is rendered the homage of the whole intellectual and moral universe: at His mediatorial Name every knee must bow, of things in heaven, and in earth, and under the earth, every tongue confessing that He is Lord to the glory of God the Father. All the angels of God worship Him. And the redeemed in glory swell their mighty anthem “to Him that sitteth upon the throne and to the Lamb.” Thus to “lift up His head,” in united priesthood and dominion, He willingly “drank of the brook by the way.”—That same Jesus, when time shall be no longer, will come to the earth, as King, to pronounce the rewards and punishments of His spiritual government. “Sitting on the throne of His priestly glory,” He will sentence each “according to the works done in the body,” and will have that eternal “judgment executed upon all.”

This mediatorial dominion of the Eternal Son is conferred by the Sovereign Father, as the paternal reward for overcoming the spiritual foe: and thus He is “Heir of all things.” And, as earthly conquerors distribute among their followers the territory and the wealth they acquire, so are the heavenly country and its riches imparted, by the Prince who gained them, to His faithful: and thus they become “joint-heirs,” under His title: and the nature of the mediatorial bounty makes it a priestly as well as a royal benefit. When He “ascended and led captivity captive, He received gifts for men,”—He received of the Father the gifts of grace and glory, of divine help and consolation, and of divine reward, for fallen men; and He bestows the grace upon them all, and the glory on all who improve the grace. It is His double and combined function,—as the High-priest, to plead to the Father that this individual, and this, and this, are obedient to the Spirit and have become faithful and holy,—and, as King, to present to every such individual, from His own abounding inheritance, the reward allowed to each of them through His intercessory prerogative.

The mediatorial government of Christ,—sacerdotal because spiritual, and regal because committed in full sovereignty,—will continue “till the time of restitution of all things;” for, until then, “the heaven,” the supernal holy of holies, “must receive” THE PRIEST: but no longer; for then, at that “time,” God “shall send Jesus Christ” again, for a wholly different work. When “all things shall be restored,” rectified, by the punishment of the wicked, and the reward of the righteous, the Prince Messiah will “deliver up the kingdom to God, even the Father,” terminating thus of course the priestly dominion. He will retain no “gifts” for those who shall not then have received them. For ever will conclude the mediatorial system, pertaining to this earth and its probationers. Salvation will thereafter be unattainable; for there will be no longer our “Priest upon His throne.”

A few REFLECTIONS on the doctrine before us may be added.—It promotes the honour of God, and the lowliness of the sinner,—keeping ever in view the atonement and the merits of Christ. A perpetual intercession (and it is the interceding of King with King) is conducted in the heavenly court, a continual process so described, which attests to all in heaven, and to all on earth who understand the gospel, that "there is none other name than that of Jesus," the divine and human Monarch, whereby we can be saved. Never is that cardinal principle withdrawn from operation or from contemplation.

And unspeakable is the practical utility of the doctrine of the Advocacy on high. It warns us that the sacrifice of Christ is not inevitably efficacious to our salvation, but that we must become fit subjects for His intercession also: and for that, repentance from all sin, and faith in His cross and His righteousness alone, must prove that we come to God by Him. "To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with Me on my throne;" to none others is the grant, and for none others does He ask the Father to place that gift at His disposal. Weighty, overpowering thought! The Redeemer is constantly intent on our personal character, that He may discern whether we are proper subjects for intercession. When, therefore, sin is urgent with its delusions and enchantments, forget we not, before we yield, to ask our better judgment whether the compliance will not be an obstacle to pardon,—whether the gain to be unrighteously secured, or the passion to be indulged, or the promotion to be grasped, will not silence the heavenly Advocate, and defeat the justification He would obtain for us. The judicial trial is, in one view, in continual progress now,—yesterday, and to-day, and to-morrow,—at the bar of God; though the entire catenated scrutiny, and the verdict, and the sentence, are reserved to the day of judgment. Our character is under perpetual investigation; and every deed, the instant it is done, will further or retard, or may altogether null, the benevolence of the Mediator in our behalf.

Replete also with comfort to the penitent is our doctrine.—Do we contemplate the priesthood of the Messiah? He is a merciful High-priest, "touched with the feeling of our infirmities," and who was "tempted in all points as we are, yet without sin,"—one who "knoweth our frame," not by mere omniscient inspection, but by experience, having felt the power of enticement, and knowing the strength required to resist it. He is the all-sufficient High-priest; for, if the blood of animal victims "sanctified to the purifying of the flesh, how much more shall the blood of Christ," the divine Victim, "who through the Eternal Spirit offered Himself without spot unto God, purify our conscience (our heaven-instincted accountability) from dead works to serve the Living God?" He is the prevailing High-priest, giving to every penitent believer the assured and quickening encouragement, "who is he that condemneth, now that Christ maketh intercession for us, and God Himself justifieth?"—Do we contemplate Christ as King? Fearing Him, we fear not His and our enemies,—for with Him is "all power," and the whole authority and strength are on our side. Wiles only and artifice can subdue us; and these the tempter spares not, both within and without. Against these, therefore, let us guard, lest we be rebels to our Sovereign: let us not be in league with our sins, "lest we fight against God!"

In the height of the "heavenly places" sitteth our "Priest upon His throne," and Christians are advanced to "sit together with Him in heavenly places," in the Church,—for the Church, even on earth, is a "heavenly place," being a department of the heavenly tabernacle, its outer court. And the inmost sanctuary above is open to the redeemed; the apostle declaring Christ to be "the Forerunner, who for us is entered within the veil." His exaltation is a pledge of ours. And our honours will be like His,—to be "made kings and priests unto God."

QUIETNESS ASSAILED.

Few editorials, published lately in the Banner, have been more attacked than our brief and unpretending article on "Quietness." This is rather a proof that "quietness" is not very popular, and that there is a restless spirit too much at work among us. This spirit has, we think, been needlessly roused into dangerous activity by "the Calendar" in its articles on "Romanizing." In these stirring times, it seems, "quietness" is looked upon as an object of suspicion. We are therefore obliged to lay it aside for the present. Our object however, is not to excite, but to soothe a needless alarm.

The Protestant Churchman discovers in our "quietness" a deep laid plan to beguile the Calendar "from its ground." Accordingly the following note of warning is given:

"Now, we hope that the Calendar, (like the Protestant Churchman,) will neither suffer itself to be driven from its ground by such language, nor drawn gently from it by the honied accents of the Banner of the Cross, which tries to be as calm as a spring morning under 'this needless disturbance,' as it is called."

The idea seems to be that, afraid of the revelations forthcoming, we desire to try and still the Calendar's cries, with a gentle lullaby. We assure our friend that he is laboring under a great mistake. We would be the last to prevent the Calendar from "making a clean breast of it" if he can. So far from this, we re-echo with all our might the words of the Protestant Churchman, and demand this of the Calendar.

"You have been constrained at last to mount the witness-stand before the Church. Tell now all that you know. Tell the Church what you have told your Bishop. Make a clean breast of it, and let the whole truth come out."

But unless the Calendar can give more positive testimony, than has yet been vouchsafed by it for the satisfaction of the Church, we must still maintain that this Journal has caused a needless disturbance. That our readers may see distinctly, and thus compare for themselves, the assertions made and the proofs attempted, we are constrained to set before them an account of these in the Calendar's own language.

The Calendar will not permit us to be either silent or quiet. Let our readers judge of this by the following remarks upon the article in which we avoided answering his personal reflections.

"The Banner of the Cross has suddenly fallen in love with 'quietness,' and resolves to give itself a nap, till the present calamities be over-past. After resting so soundly in his late visit to Chelsea, (where he declares he never heard or dreamt of anything like Romanizing) we had hoped the editor was waked up for a long day. But as he resolves to sleep again, we wish him comfort of his opiate, and the joy that 'cometh in the morning.'"

With all due respect to the Calendar, we must say that we do not think it necessary to be very wide awake to answer any reasons it has yet given us for its course in this matter. His new friends even do not give him credit for much wakefulness. A correspondent in the last Protestant Churchman says, "I rejoice, Mr. Editor, that Connecticut has at least one eye open to the dangers by which we are beset." "Dreamland's" sweet voice has not yet passed from memory!

Another correspondent in the same paper is still more cruel and says:

"We have reason to thank God for the recent demonstration from Connecticut against Romanism in our Church. I do not myself think there is so very much difference between the Calendar and Mr. Howland. He being only a little more 'developed,' still, the antagonism which is generally inseparable from such contests may cause the Calendar to develop hereafter in the direction of truth."

And now let us place the startling assertions of the Calendar beside the proofs it has furnished. We do this because many right minded churchmen have been alarmed by the assertions, whose fears may at once be allayed by the character of the proofs. In fact the only merit we have discovered in the articles of the Calendar is, that they are so compounded that they unite the qualities of stimulant and opiate. A most intelligent Clergyman, from a quiet country Parish, assured us that he had been greatly disturbed by the first article of the Calendar, but that the succeeding ones had quieted all his fears. He supposed the editor of the Calendar must be possessed of the most undoubted evidence of the truth of his assertions, but he was surprised to see the meagreness of his testimony, the whole weight of it, in fact, being obtained after the startling accusations were made. We must say that we have never yet known such grave charges preferred upon such slight grounds, i. e., so far as the Calendar has yet made these known.

We can know nothing of the proofs which the editor of the Calendar may have in his possession. Nor is the argument in the least affected by the proofs exhibited, in private, to the Bishop of Connecticut. We have only to do with the public proofs exhibited to sustain public charges. In the first place, the Calendar announces the "existence of a Romanizing clique in the city of New York."

In the second place this Romanizing is defined to "mean disaffection to the Nicene Faith, and the adoption of the Tridentine Creed, as necessary to its completion; or, what is the same thing, disloyalty to the Anglican Church, and its standard Theology, and a practical reception of popish standards of discipline and doctrine."

In the third place, Romanizing thus defined is said to be "infecting the neighborhood of our General Theological Seminary, and rendering the labors of its able Professors almost ineffectual, by the ensnaring influence which it exerts through young men, upon young men engaged in the study of divinity."

And now we ask those who have had access to the Calendar, and followed its course, to say whether it has afforded the proofs to satisfy the public mind of the truth of its charges. Its articles have consisted almost entirely of replies to various attacks which itself provoked. We here submit the Calendar's own statement of the proofs on which it rests the allegation of "the existence of a Romanizing clique," and the character of its "Romanizing." We ask our readers to weigh carefully each sentence of the following summing up, by the Calendar of April 28th, of its own evidence:

"ROMANIZING.—In entering upon this sore subject, we could not have expected so soon to accomplish our purpose of arousing the Church to the evil, which however small at present, threatened, if further communicated, to be disseminated through every diocese of the Church. We were resolved therefore to give no uncertain sound. We spoke sharply, with a deliberate intent of drawing out what we knew would court concealment. We meant to challenge such replies as have been given, and which have saved us the disagreeable necessity of designating infected persons and places. But we did not imagine they would come so immediately and show themselves at our call. Mr. Howland's disclosures have betrayed the existence of a clique, for which he is at least the apologist; and deeply as we regret his indiscretion in making himself sponsor for those who share his errors, but not his manliness, in avowing them, we thank him for saving us the long and weary task we had anticipated, in proving to the Church that there was treason at work, and that our alarm was not unnecessary. As to Romanizing then, its existence is no longer doubted, and we have only the duty remaining to insist upon its prosecution at the proper tribunals, if it is not instantly repented of, and given up."

"We spoke sharply, with a deliberate intent of drawing out what we knew would court concealment!" Might this not thus be paraphrased? "We made harsh accusations in order to draw out the evidence we desired." It was with this deliberate intent that men, in other days, were stretched upon the rack! "We meant to challenge such replies!"—"but we did not imagine they would come so immediately!" "Mr. Howland's disclosures have betrayed the existence of a clique!"—"WE THANK HIM FOR SAYING US THE LONG AND WEARY TASK WE HAD ANTICIPATED IN PROVING," &c. "As to Romanizing then, its existence is no longer doubted."

We need say no more about the character of these "disclosures." In our esteem they prove nothing, and no one can say that they prove anything against any one but the writer. But that is not the point. The Calendar declares of itself that it depended for proof of its charges upon evidence of which it had not possession, which it did not imagine would have been so easily produced, and which might have been withheld. The serious charges, made in the first article, are proved to the Church by unexpected letters written after the accusation was made! And we are to take for granted that this is the strongest evidence which can be produced. And this, at best, only implicates an individual. Surely our "quietness" has been needlessly disturbed.

As to the third point, the manner in which this Romanizing has been unjustly connected with the General Theological Seminary, we must add a few words. Having stated it as our opinion, that the whole force of the accusation, made by the Calendar, was improperly turned by other papers against the Seminary, we yet declared that in our judgment the Calendar had "most unwisely and unjustly connected the General Theological Seminary in any measure with this grave charge." The article in the Calendar of April 28th, compels us to retract this charitable supposition, and to think that the clique was only a masked battery, to be opened at the proper time upon the Seminary. We are much pained to see the Calendar, especially as it is "the official organ of Connecticut," opposing itself to the judgment of its Bishop and directly contradicting his expression of general confidence. The Bishop says, "I see no reason to doubt the general soundness of the Institution." The Calendar thus arrays its own opinion against this judgment—"We consider it humiliating to the Church that her General Theological Seminary by no means answers its original purpose and is far from inspiring that kind of confidence," &c.

But if the Calendar is unfortunate in the evidence by which it would betray the existence of a clique, still more unhappy is it in affording proof to show the influence of this clique upon the Seminary. We think the letter appended sufficiently answers its open attack upon the Seminary. With singular infelicity in the selection of arguments, it quotes the fact as an argument, in its favor, that the Dean has caused "Students to withdraw their attendance from the Church of the Holy Apostles." (Some three or four students only, we think, were in the habit of attending this Church.) The true statement is that the students applied to the Dean for advice, he advised them not to attend, and they have all acted according to his advice. This single fact disproves the charge of the Calendar against the Seminary involving both Professors and Students. The charge of the Calendar amounted to an accusation not only of insubordination against the students, but of inefficiency against the Professors as not being able to control the students or counteract the opposing influence of "young men" in "the neighborhood." The prompt obedience of the students to the advice of their Professor is a vindication of both. We are sorry to be compelled to dwell at such length upon this unpleasant matter, and still more do we regret that a sense of duty arrays us thus against "the Calendar." But while its alarms are ringing throughout the Church, and while it can show no stronger evidence to sustain its assertions, we must hold this Journal up as a needless disturber of our peace.

The following is a second letter of the Dean of the Faculty to a Trustee of the Seminary, called forth by an article in the Calendar:—

Chelsea Square, April 30th, 1849.

REV. WM. COOPER MEAD, D. D.:

REVEREND AND DEAR SIR:—Permit me to call your attention to certain errors which are set forth in an editorial review of my letter to you, in the "Calendar" of last week. The same interest as a Trustee, which prompted you to write to me, entitles you to receive from me the supplementary information hereby conveyed.

The attempt to press into the service of the "Calendar" the Matriculation Addresses of my colleague and myself, by perverting the Counsels of a Pastor into the Charges of a Prosecutor, is unfair both to us and the students. If you preach to your people a caution against any sinful tendency, to which there may exist temptations, whether in or around them, whether near or remote, (that of Schism, for example,) do you therefore charge them with being, for the most part, schismatical in fact? Is there no need of confirming faith and obedience? There was that in the experience of the past; and there has been, and probably will be, enough, not only in, but beyond, "the neighborhood of the Seminary," to justify such counsels as those given by Dr. Haight and myself; counsels which ought to be influenced by the spirit of the age, no less than by the circumstances of the parties addressed.

In the paragraph beginning, "We consider it humiliating to the Church," there are several misstatements. The vagueness of most of its charges, admitting neither of proof nor disproof, confirms the feeling of "righteous indignation," which the "Calendar" erroneously regards as evidence of a "hostile tone and temperament," (temper?) and of "loss of temper" on my part. Specific charges, touching individuals, and accompanied by proof, I shall receive, as in duty bound. The plan which the editor professes to follow, of "resting a cause on the general facts, which are verified by men's eyes, without trapping one's self in minute specifications which require forensic proof," has long been the favorite artifice of persecutors and inquisitors in every age; but if, indeed, as is alleged, it be not "unjust," and be not "the scandal of equity," then, surely, reputation and character are wholly at the mercy of the malicious enemies, or of the rash friends (as in the present case,) who may happen to have it in their power to open upon one the fire of a masked battery, from behind the secure defence of an editorial rampart.

In this connection, let me say, that the attempt on my part, to protect the Seminary, on a former occasion, from alleged Romanizing influences, was not "abortive," but effectual; as the editor ought to have known. Discipline was applied, in due measure, to the convicted offenders; and the beneficial effect of that exercise of discipline continues to be felt in the Seminary to this very hour.

But let me indicate the censurable vagueness, and the express misstatements of the paragraph referred to:

"We consider it humiliating to the Church that her General Theological Seminary by no means answers its original purpose, and is far from inspiring that kind of confidence which enables a pastor to recommend it without hesitation, as providing a safe and wholesome preparation for usefulness in the ministry."

Here is the statement of the editor's opinion, in the form of a case, which he proceeds to make out. Then follow particulars: "The painful fact needs no illustrative remark, that not a few have emerged from it, of late, less fitted than when they began, for the very work which they entered the Seminary to learn."

But this alleged "fact" does need "illustrative remark;" or rather, it needs positive, and that "forensic" proof, if the utterance of such a wholesale imputation against the editor's brethren in the Ministry (the reputation of each and every one of whom is as dear to the Church as his own,) is to escape the just award of common defamation. "Who art thou that judgest another man's servant?" Or, is the editor, ex officio, invested with more than Apostolic authority, without the grace of Consecration?

"Year after year has it been whispered, of more than one among the graduates, (and that not by cavilling foes, but by anxious friends,) that their sympathies and views were more or less warped from the truth."

"Whispered!" How does this accord with the Apostolic precept, binding even upon Apostles: "Against an elder receive not an accusation, except before two or three witnesses?" And is not even a deacon, or a candidate, entitled to some share of the benefit of this just and charitable mandate?

"Apostasy has, in some instances, sadly verified such forebodings."

One of the twelve Apostles was an apostate and worse. Has the Seminary suffered in the same ratio? Will the editor presume to carry out his argument?

"And mistakes less fatal, but impairing the early usefulness and the lifelong reputation of others, have been the very general issue of such cases."

And is it to be expected that young men transferred directly from private study, without experience, and almost without guidance, to the public care of souls, should quite escape "mistakes?" The real wonder is, that they make no more.

"Often has the admission of an alumnus to orders been a matter of grave anxiety instead of unaffected joy to pastors who had sent him to the Seminary with a mind unsophisticated, a heart ardently loyal and espoused to the Church, and a piety consecrated to her humble service. How long must such things be? How many of our youth must be sacrificed to a fantastical and mawkish sentimentality which becomes fatal, even while it is despised as feeble and insignificant? Yet the Seminary is still caricatured by examples of this spirit." What precisely is meant by a "mawkish sentimentality," it is hard to say. But, "as feeble and insignificant," it would probably die a natural death, if not nursed into life by being made too much of by others. Is no allowance to be made for the undisciplined, or half-fledged, fancy of the youthful? Although I uniformly discourage singularities, of whatever sort, in young men, I nevertheless deem it indiscreet to seem to confound essentials and non-essentials, by assailing imprudence in the latter with excessive zeal. And I think it equally indiscreet to make young men think themselves too important by noticing their trivial actions too much.

"We are inclined to give great consideration to the certificate of Professor Ogilby, but we are far from regarding the evil as cured."

If the alleged "evil" has been even abated by a quiet process, may it not be cured by the same?

"While unchastised examples of Romanizing are daily placed before the eyes of those whom he strives to guard from such dangers."

And where will you go, to get out of sight of this "Romanizing?" Or, are young men, who can be seduced by it, in spite of all restraints, worth having in the Ministry of the Church?

"While magazines and newspapers with which they are familiar, are allowed to pandor to discontent and sentimentalism."

I grant that the "newspapers" are our great peril. But this enemy would overleap the walls even of the Celestial Empire.

"While a recent graduate of the Seminary sits in the editorial chair of a Romish Journal in New York." The party here referred to is not a "graduate" of the Seminary. Having been put back by the Faculty, at the final examination of his class, he was presently after rusticated by his Bishop, and did not finish his course. But what of it? An alumnus of the Alexandria Seminary "sits in the Editorial chair of a Romish Journal" in Philadelphia! Does this prove the existence of Romanizing tendencies in that Institution?

"While another patronizes flagrant Romanizing in the Church of the Apostles." With this I have nothing to do, having nothing to do with the Diocese of New York, except so far as any disturbing influence from it may invade the Seminary. Then, as Dean, and ex-officio Pastor, I am bound simply to exclude it, by all lawful means. Without passing judgment on the Rector of the Church referred to, I have been compelled, by a recent publication, to advise the students to withdraw from that Church, which they have all done. The next statement, therefore, that "some of the students hear the doctrines there dispensed," is erroneous. And I believe it to be equally untrue, that "some have defended" them. I have heard of but one opinion among the students on the subject.*

* * * "and while the professor has the mortification of knowing that more than one of his late pupils, in his immediate vicinity, are exerting influences directly against him, we cannot but think he might have acted more judiciously than in writing a letter whose tone of defiance and "indignation" absolutely forces us to give prominence to these facts." The bad taste, (to say the least) of the former part of this passage forbids my noticing it. Touching the latter part, I have only to say, of this as of my former letters that, if to require a self-constituted public accuser of the Brethren, to produce his proofs, be to assume "a tone of defiance," I have held, and still maintain that tone; denying, that the allegations, to which "prominence is given" are "facts."

In a later paragraph it is said,—"We have endeavored to account for the fact that a few of the students 'are wiser than all their teachers' by showing the existence of out-door influences; but if Professor Ogilby insists on claiming the whole credit of their reputation for himself and his associates, he is certainly at liberty to retain his own share."

Passing by the sneer in the latter part, let me ask you to compare this expression, that "a few of the students are wiser than all their teachers," with the original assertion, to which you called my attention, that the "Romanizing" in the neighborhood of the Seminary, was "rendering the labors of its able professors almost ineffectual." If only a "few" set up to be "wiser than all their teachers," can it be said that the labors of the professors are "almost ineffectual?" It has been attempted in articles, subsequent to the first, which you quoted in your letter of inquiry, as it is also in parts of that which my former letter to you has called forth, to evade the natural meaning of the general declaration in the first Editorial on "Romanizing." But the whole scope of the Article of last week compels me to hold the Editor to the obvious sense of his first expression, which involved a large portion at least of the students in the charge of unfaithfulness. And this is a main cause of the "righteous indignation," I have expressed; that, while the Editor, whenever he limits himself to particular statements, is obliged to confine his charges to a "few" at most, he nevertheless, when speaking of the state and influence of the Seminary in general, extends his imputations to a large proportion of the students, and compromises the reputation of all.

Whether this is just, not to say charitable, to his brethren, and filial to his Alma Mater, let those whom it concerns, decide. It is surely cruel kindness in a friend to make gratuitously (as I claim the right, and feel bound to maintain, until the contrary is proven,) a desolating inroad upon "the District of Columbia of the Church," because it so happens, that he can find through it the only passable highway (or by-way?) by which he may colorably invade, or get within range of, a particular Diocese, into which he has no right to make a direct incursion. If desolation be reformation, the Editor has certainly made an attempt at the proposed reform of the Seminary.

I remain, Reverend and Dear Sir,

Your's very sincerely,

JOHN D. OGILBY.

THE SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN DISQUIETED.

We are tempted to regret the natural feeling which induced us to boast, a little, about that week of quietness. Some of our brethren seem determined we shall make up for it. Even our usually quiet brother of the Southern Churchman appears a little envious of our good fortune. We hope he will be somewhat mollified when we tell him that this "quietness" was enjoyed in "the Old Dominion," and richly garnished with Virginian hospitality. Surely he will be the last to do away with the happy impression. However, here is what he says, and we must answer him or he may think we do not know our catechism.

"It is only since the issue of our last No. that we have read a publication entitled 'The Priestly Office: a pastoral letter to the Clergy of North Carolina. By their Diocesan the Right Rev. Silliman Ives, D.D.' It has been published in the Banner of the Cross, of April 7th and 14th. Whether the editor of that paper approves of it, we do not know. He also may have overlooked it, for he has just returned, he informs us, from a brief and pleasant sojourn in the country—whose soothing influence has altogether disinclined him to talk of 'Romanizing' or other jarring topics which might disturb his tranquillity. Though not especially addressed, we take in good part the homily on quietness to his brother editors, and shall ever indulge our natural predilections for it, whenever conscience does not pre-

* The only student, of whom the contrary might plausibly be alleged, has not defended the position (much less any "doctrines" at variance with the teaching of the Church) of the party or parties referred to, since the recent development. Before that, he may have been led, by a generous confidence, farther than he was aware, in apologizing for opinions of a doubtful character, not then apparent.

scribe a different course. However much we may value the peace of the Church, it is miserable policy, as well as unfaithfulness in duty, to 'cry peace, peace, when there is no peace.'

"May we take the liberty to ask the editor of the Banner, since he considers the alleged 'Romanizing' in the Church as a subject, respecting which 'ignorance is bliss,' and wisdom 'folly,' what is his view of Romanism? Is there any truth in the opinion of a recent English Magazine, (Fraser's,) that 'the essence of Romanism is the doctrine of Priestly mediation'?" He will not perhaps agree with us that it is so, but let him at least say whether the pastoral letter has his concurrence—and whether he wishes it to be received by his readers as a true exhibition of the doctrine of the Church and the religion of the Bible."

For brevity's sake, we will reduce this to the catechetical form.

S. CHURCHMAN. What is your view of Romanism?

BANNER. It is found in the Prayer Book, thirty-nine articles included.

S. CHURCHMAN. Is there any truth in the opinion of a recent English Magazine, (Fraser's,) that "the essence of Romanism is the doctrine of priestly mediation"?

BANNER. We do not take as authoritative the opinions of Magazines. The Bible teaches as an essential article of Faith "the doctrine of priestly mediation." "For there is one God, and one Mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus." (1 Tim. ii. 5.) "But this man, because he continueth ever, hath an unchangeable priesthood. Wherefore he is able also to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by Him, seeing He ever liveth to make intercession for us."

But the term "mediation" may be used in a common sense to denote "intervention," "interposition," "entreaty for another," and in such meaning we can discover nothing of Romanism in using the phrase "priestly mediation" as denoting the office of those who are appointed Ministers to make known the will of God to man, and to present to God the confessions, the prayers and praises of His people.

S. CHURCHMAN. Why did you not express an opinion of the Pastoral Letter?

BANNER. Because we do not believe in the Archbishopal powers of the editorial office. The Banner has laid it down as a rule not to assume the office of reproving and teaching Bishops, in the discharge of their official duties. They are equally above our praise or our censure. We have acted upon this rule in many cases. And so we will continue to act. As the organ of communication between the Bishop and the Diocese of North Carolina, we published the Pastoral Letter of the Bishop to his Diocese. We would have thought it impertinent presumption to praise or to censure such a document.

One thing we would advise the Southern Churchman, and that is, not to clothe the Bishop's ideas, which seem not to be well understood, in any language, but that given in the Pastoral letter. Theological sense depends much upon the phraseology, and not a little upon the context.

The Southern Churchman need not think that we shrink from expressing our own views. We are ready to express them when properly called for. Only we hope, after we have said our catechism, that we may be permitted to return to "quietness."

NEW CHURCH IN WASHINGTON.

"The Vestry of Trinity Church, Washington, finding their church too small for the wants of the community in the midst of which it is situated, have taken measures to erect a new one. The sum of $15,000 which they can themselves raise, would build a church large enough for the present congregation. As, however, during a portion of the year, a large number of persons from all parts of the Union congregate within the bounds of this parish, and desire to attend the services of this Church, it is very desirable and important that there should be room provided for their accommodation. The Vestry, therefore, invite their brethren abroad to unite with them in the effort to raise a sum sufficient to accomplish this object. In case $10,000 shall be contributed, the Vestry pledge themselves that three hundred sittings shall be set apart, and remain forever free, for the use of strangers and temporary residents."—Prot. Churchman.

We take the above from the Protestant Churchman. We feel bound, at the same time, to correct the wrong impression which this article is calculated, if not designed, to produce. To those unacquainted with the facts, it might seem from the above, that "Trinity," as in New York, was the Parent Church in Washington, and that it rested with this particular Parish to provide for the "large number of persons from all parts of the Union," who congregate at Washington. In fact it might well be inferred from the above that the whole provision for the spiritual instruction of "strangers" (meaning Senators, Members of Congress, Secretaries, Ambassadors, and other officials) depended upon "the Vestry of Trinity Church." Whereas, in fact, there are other churches in Washington, willing to share the responsibility of providing for these poor strangers.

And besides, St. John's Church, of which, the Rev. Smith Pyne, D.D., is Rector, is the Old Parish Church of Washington. In this parish, most of our Presidents have worshipped. President Taylor holds there his family pew, and is, we rejoice to say, to be seen in his place twice on every Lord's day. If therefore any Church in Washington has a right to appeal to our national sympathies, it is St. John's Church. This parish is now, under its able and devoted Rector, in a most flourishing condition. In a late visit there we learned that there was a large demand for pews which could not be satisfied, while every corner of the church is occupied. We do think that this church should be either enlarged or rebuilt so as to present the Church with more attraction to the many strangers who there congregate. And if a movement is made to secure this object, we think that it will be favourably regarded by American Churchmen.

MR. ERBEN'S ORGAN FACTORY, we regret to learn, was seriously damaged by fire on Monday of last week. A number of Instruments were destroyed, and Mr. E. has suffered quite a heavy loss. His well known energy will, we trust, soon be able to repair the injury.

A DEVOTED WIFE.

Every heart must be touched with the devoted zeal manifested by Lady Franklin in her efforts to send relief to her husband. She still hopes, almost against hope, that he is only a prisoner, bound in the icy chains of the Polar Seas. We fear he is detained by stronger fetters. Yet there is a possibility that he and his hardy companions still survive. Humanity demands that every effort should be made until the case is utterly hopeless. And the voice of a devoted wife supplicating help will make this duty heard, and its call obeyed.

We copy the following from the Courier & Enquirer:

SIR JOHN FRANKLIN'S EXPEDITION.

NEW YORK, April 20, 1849.

To the Editors of the Courier and Enquirer:

The accompanying Card was lately sent by Lady FRANKLIN to my friend Dr. ROBERTSON, who has requested me to procure its publication. Will you, gentlemen, be so kind as to publish it—and may I, through your columns, ask the same favor of the several papers in this city, and of the papers of our other seaports? This will, at least, be an expression of sympathy granted to the many sorrowful hearts which now for a long time have been trembling on the verge of despair. Lady FRANKLIN, of course offers this reward, independently of that offered by the Government.

I am, Gentlemen, very respectfully,

Your obedient servant,

ED. Y. HIGBEE.

Three Thousand Pounds, or a proportion thereof, according to the services rendered, offered by Lady FRANKLIN, to such of the Whaling Ships as shall be generously inclined to assist the search for Sir JOHN FRANKLIN and his gallant companions.

With the view of inducing any Whaling Ships which shall resort to Davis's Strait and Baffin's Bay to make special efforts in search of the expedition under the command of Sir JOHN FRANKLIN, I hereby offer the sum of Three Thousand Pounds,* (£3000) or a proportion thereof, according to the services rendered, to such ship or ships as, departing from the usual Fishing Grounds, shall discover, and, if needed, afford effectual relief to, the above expedition, or to any portion of it.

It is proposed that the amount of the reward, according to the efforts made and services performed, shall be determined by the following gentlemen, who have kindly consented to act as referees, viz.:—Rear-Admiral Sir Francis Beaufort, K. C. B., Captain Sir W. Edward Parry, R. N., Thomas Ward, Esq., (Hull.)

In regard to the distribution of the sum awarded, among Owners, Captains, Officers, and Seamen, the amount to each to be adjusted in the same proportions as if similar value of produce from the Fishery had been obtained.

In the event of more than one ship making special efforts to give succor to the expedition, each ship is to receive its proportion of the reward, agreeably to the decision of the Referees.

The attention of Whalers disposed to aid in this service, is particularly directed to the Gulf of Boothia, within Regent's Inlet, or to any of the Inlets or Channels leading out of Barrow's Straits, or the sea beyond, either northward or southward, as also to any Sounds or Inlets in the North and Western sides of Baffin's Bay, above the 75th degree of latitude.

Should it be clearly proved and ascertained that any Whaler has made extraordinary efforts or special researches in quarters remote from the ordinary Fishing Grounds, for the purpose designated, though no success may have attended their endeavors, the case of such Whaler, with a view to reward, will be taken into favorable consideration by the Referees.

For the greater satisfaction of parties claiming Reward, the Owners and Captains shall be authorized, if they desire it, to nominate one additional Referee, who shall act and vote in all respects as the standing Referees in the special case for which they may be nominated. The Referees, being then increased to four, will, according to the usual order of business, choose for themselves, a fifth as umpire.

SIR JOHN FRANKLIN'S EXPEDITION.

To this we add the following from a city paper. The response of the Secretary is honorable to this country and the government.†

LADY FRANKLIN TO THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.—The Intelligencer publishes a long, very eloquent and feeling letter addressed by the wife of Sir John Franklin, the famous navigator, whose last voyage of discovery, it is feared, has proved a fatal one, to President Taylor, invoking his assistance in bringing to the notice of American whalers the large rewards that have been offered by the British Government and by individuals to any ship or ships of any country, or to any exploring party whatever, which shall render efficient assistance to the missing ships, or their crews, or to any portion of them. The lady, in conclusion, apologises, if any apology were needed, for exhibiting the natural feelings of her heart in such a matter, in the following language:

I am not without some misgivings while I thus address you. The intense anxieties of a wife and of a daughter may have led me to press too earnestly on your notice the trial under which we are suffering, (yet not we only, but hundreds of others,) and to presume too much on the sympathy which we are assured is felt beyond the limits of our own land. Yet if you deem this to be the case, you will still find, I am sure, even in that personal intensity of feeling, an excuse for the fearlessness with which I have thrown myself on your generosity, and will pardon the homage I thus pay to your own high character, and to that of the people over whom you have the high distinction to preside.

We are pleased to see that Secretary Clayton has promptly and satisfactorily answered the lady's letter.

To the citizens of the United States, who share so largely in the emotions which agitate the public mind of your own country, the name of Sir John Franklin has been endeared by his heroic virtues, and the sufferings and sacrifices which he has encountered for the benefit of mankind. The appeal of his wife and daughter in their distress has been borne across the waters, asking the assistance of a kindred people to save the brave men who embarked in his unfortunate expedition, and the people of the United States, who have watched with the deepest interest that hazardous enterprise, will now respond to that appeal by the expression of their united wishes that every proper effort may be made by this government for the rescue of your husband and his companions.

To accomplish the object you have in view, the attention of American navigators, and especially of our whalers, will be immediately invoked. All the information in the possession of this government, to enable them to aid in discovering the missing ships, relieving their crews, and restoring them to their families, shall be spread far and wide among our people, and all that the Executive government of the United States, in the exercise of its constitutional powers, can effect to meet this requisition on American enterprise, skill and bravery, will be promptly undertaken.

The hearts of the American people will be deeply touched by your eloquent appeal to their Chief Magistrate, and they will join with you in an earnest prayer to Him whose spirit is on the waters that your husband and his companions may yet be restored to their country and their friends.

Many hearts will join with us in the sorrow caused by the following record. During a long period of years, Mr. Powell was the Proprietor of a large and flourishing school in the vicinity of New York. He is remembered by all his pupils, and by none more truly than the writer of this, as a dear and kind friend as well as a most faithful and successful instructor.

He united most happily the qualities which won their confidence and love, with that decision of character which taught his pupils that he was not to be trifled with where duty was concerned. He did his utmost to make those committed to his care happy, and to rob school of those needless terrors with which it is too often invested. In this important office he has done faithful service in his generation, and his memory should be honored by all, as it is fondly cherished in the hearts of his "dear boys."

The following resolutions express the feelings of his brethren in the ministry and their estimate of his character.

DIED, on the 29th April, at the residence of his brother-in-law, S. Cambreling, in this city, the Rev. WILLIAM POWELL, Rector of St. Peter's Church, Westchester, in the 61st year of his age.

At a meeting of the Clergy of the Protestant Episcopal Church, who had attended the funeral of the Rev. WILLIAM POWELL, late Rector of St. Peter's Church, Westchester, assembled at the house of the Rev. Mr. Jackson, the assistant minister of the same parish, on Monday, the 30th of April, 1849—the Rev. Dr. Barry was called to the chair; and, on motion, a committee of three was appointed to present to the meeting resolutions expressive of the feelings of the Clergy present on the mournful occasion which had brought them together. The Chair nominated as that committee—the Rev. Dr. Taylor, the Rev. Dr. Whitehouse, and the Rev. A. Beach Carter.

The following resolutions were then submitted, and unanimously adopted:—

Whereas it has pleased Almighty God in His wise Providence to remove from the scene of his earthly cares, the Rev. William Powell, late Rector of St. Peter's Church, Westchester, be it therefore

Resolved, That in the very sudden death of our late brother in the ministry of Christ, we recognise the warning voice of God admonishing us most impressively of the awful uncertainty in which we hold the solemn trusts committed to our keeping.

Resolved, That while we bow submissively to this dispensation of God's bereaving providence, we would humbly express our grief for the loss of one whose heart overflowed with the milk of human kindness,—whose charity never failed,—whose tongue spoke evil of no man,—and who, through a long course of ministerial duty, was always the tender, disinterested, and sympathising friend of his flock, in their seasons of adversity and sorrow.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to the surviving sister and children of the deceased, with the assurance of our respectful sympathy under the trial they have been called to sustain; and also that they be published in the Church papers of the city of New York.

On motion, the meeting adjourned.

EDMUND BARRY, D.D., Chairman.

We copy, with pleasure, the following from the PENNSYLVANIA INQUIRER of this city. We have also private information of the correctness of these statements.

ST. MARY'S HALL AND BURLINGTON COLLEGE.

Notwithstanding the impression which has somewhat prevailed, of an interruption in the prosperous course of these schools, we are informed that they have opened for the summer term, with great success. At no previous time in their past history, have they had so large a number of pupils at this early period in the session. They are now placed under the control of Trustees, with an efficient business man to manage their fiscal concerns, while there is no change in their course of instruction.

TRINITY CHURCH, PITTSBURGH.—We regret to learn that this fine edifice was considerably damaged by fire on the afternoon of Sunday, the 15th ult. It caught in the upper part of the tower, which, with the clock and bell, was destroyed, and the rest of the building so much injured as to require some months to repair it. The church was insured for $7000, which, it is thought, will nearly cover the loss. The building is to be enlarged, to meet the increasing demands of the congregation.—Com.

The above accident occurred during our absence from Philadelphia, or it should have received earlier notice. A private letter from the Rector informs us that the fire commenced on Sunday evening during Divine service. The vestry are in doubt whether to repair the old Church, or to build a new one. The latter plan, we understand, finds most favor as we might suppose from the known character of this spirited and liberal congregation. Service is held, for the present, in the morning in the Chapel, and in the afternoon at St. Andrew's Church, tendered for the purpose by its Rector and Vestry.

THE CHURCH REVIEW AND ECCLESIASTICAL REGISTER.

We have already expressed our interest in the success of this able Periodical. The last number shows that it is growing and improving with age. For the credit of the Church we hope it will be sustained. It is indeed a reproach if one "Church Review" cannot find support in our communion.

The soliciting Agent, for the New England and Northern States, Mr. Bradley, will be in attendance, during the session of the Pennsylvania Convention, in the hope of adding to the list of subscribers. He will be found at the bookstore of Mr. Hooker & Co., corner of Chesnut and Eighth streets, during the week.

CORRECTIONS.

In the excellent article of M. Y. on "Macaulay," we regret that a few typographical mistakes occurred to disturb the writer, perhaps, more than the reader. We must justly throw the blame upon the manuscript, not upon the printer. It was by guessing only at the probable intention that both printer and proof reader were guided in some words.

In the 7th paragraph, for 1570, read "1540."

In the 6th paragraph, below for 31 articles, read "31st article."

Just above instead of "any great share," read "any just share."

At end of 6th paragraph, for "passages," read "passage."

CONFESSION AS HELD BY THE ANGLICAN CHURCH: designed chiefly as an antidote to a pamphlet entitled, "VOICE OF THE ANGLICAN CHURCH." Originally published in "The Churchman," April 21. By a Presbyterian of the Diocese of New York.

"Admonetur omnis ætas posse jam fieri, quod jam factum vidimus."

This is the republication, in pamphlet form, of an article on an important topic, from the pen of one of the ablest Presbyters of the Church. The general object of the writer is thus expressed in the Preface. Having shown that the Church has abolished this practice as a general rule, yet allowing exceptions in particular cases, he proceeds thus:—

"The attempt, however, to make this liberty which the Church allows, a cover for the introduction of a practice which she has plainly repudiated; to represent the exception as the rule, and to apply to the latter the commendations which were designed for the former, and thus to hold up the Church and her ablest divines as approving and advocating a system which they have solemnly and deliberately renounced, is a proceeding which, it is believed, may be exposed without danger of the imputation of encroaching on any such liberty as is consistent with truth, honesty, or Christian humility. That such an attempt had been made in 'The Voice of the Anglican Church,' it is not necessary to affirm; it is sufficient to show that such an attempt, if made, would be utterly futile; and could only be made to seem otherwise by a course of deliberate suppressions or flagrant omissions in the citation of testimonies; and this, it is believed, is shown by the comparison which is made in the following pages between the quotations, of the tract just mentioned and their originals."

The writer thus further speaks of his particular design.

"His only object has been to vindicate the Church of England and her divines, from the implied charge of favoring that system; or any such approach to it as makes the confession to a priest of all sorts of sins, and by persons of all conditions and both sexes, to be, as a general thing, desirable or proper. Such sort of confession is considered by them, (with, it is believed, scarcely an exception) to be destitute of divine sanction and primitive precedent, and to have been deservedly abolished at the time of the Reformation, as having been found to be productive of the most flagrant evils. 'This whole topic,' says one who on this subject may speak for them all, 'can only be a prudential consideration, and can no way infer a divine institution; for though it was as convenient before Christ as since, and might have had the same effects upon the public or private good then as now, yet God was not pleased to appoint it in almost forty ages; and we say he hath not done it yet. However, let it be considered, that there being some things which St. Paul says are not to be, 'so much as named,' amongst Christians, it must needs look indecently, that all men and all women should come and make the priest's ears a common sewer to empty all their filthiness, and that which a modest man would blush to hear, he must be used to, and it is the greatest part of his employment to attend to. True it is that a physician must see and handle the impurest ulcers, but it is because the cure does not depend upon the patient, but upon the physician, who, by general advertisement, cannot cure the patient, unless he had a universal medicine which the priest hath: the medicine of repentance, which can indifferently cure all sins, whether the priest know them, or no. And therefore all this filthy communication is intolerable, because it is not necessary; and it not only pollutes the priest's ears, but his tongue too; for lest any circumstance, or any sin, be concealed, he thinks himself obliged to interrogate, and proceed to particular questions in the basest things.'*

* The British Government has offered a reward of £20,000 on similar conditions.

† We are glad to learn that our government intends detaching, forthwith, two of the national ships in search of the lost exploring expedition of Sir John Franklin, in the Arctic seas; one to go east, around Cape Labrador, and through Davis' Straits—the other west, to Behring's Straits.

New York, April, 1849.

The Pamphlet thus begins, and we quote this part of it to call the attention of our readers to the contradiction of the statement that "one of the Bishops of our Church is reputed to be the Editor." We are quite sure that this is a false statement.

"Mr. Editor—I lately received through the Post Office a small pamphlet entitled 'Voice of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States on Confession,' which on examination I found to be intended as a sort of reply or counteractive to another pamphlet entitled 'Voice of the Anglican Church on Confession.' My curiosity being thus excited I was led to procure a copy of the latter pamphlet, and I now propose to offer you some remarks on both. For brevity's sake I shall distinguish the two by calling the former a pamphlet, and the latter a tract.

The pamphlet referring to the tract informs us that "One of the Bishops of our Church is reputed to be the Editor, and it is said to be the precursor of several discourses which are soon to emanate from the same quarter in favor of Auricular Confession." I quote this passage merely to say that I do not believe that the bishop referred to has either edited the tract or made himself anywise responsible for it.

After quoting two of the testimonies from the tract, the writer of the pamphlet says: "Now, granting that the writer of this tract has quoted accurately from the Anglican Book,—supposing besides, (which is a very broad supposition,) that Anglican Divines all speak the same voice, walk by the same rule, and would if they could compass the same thing—auricular confession—we ask, 'what is that to us, Protestant Episcopalians of these United States?'" And the writer then proceeds to set the Anglican Voice on the one side and the American Voice on the other; and to quote the divines of the American Church as an offset to those of the Anglican.

I regret exceedingly to see such a course of argument adopted. It combines, in my judgment, the guilt of parricide and suicide. To say the least it makes the American Church stultify herself; since she has declared, and still declares, that she has been and is "far from intending to depart from the Church of England in any essential point of doctrine, discipline, or worship; or further than local circumstances require."

The tract is so very small an affair that I should not have thought of reviewing it, had it not been for this virtual admission of its correctness, and the use consequent on such admission by the writer of the pamphlet. But under the circumstances I have thought it worth while to examine how far it is a faithful report of the Voice of the Anglican Church, and I now offer you the result of my examination."

The able Author proceeds to compare the quotations in the Tract with the originals, and shows that this pretended "voice of the Anglican Church" is altogether a counterfeit. In every case the quotation is either so garbled or misapplied, as to turn an exception into a general rule. We have never seen work of demolition more complete. One by one, the props by which these false views would be sustained are removed until the "voice of the Anglican Church is reduced to a vox et preterea nihil. We have no space at present for further quotations from this able Pamphlet, we may have future use for them. The writer has done a good work, for many who had it not in their power to confute the apparent authorities by a reference to the originals, were startled to hear in "the voice of the Anglican Church" a defence of the worst features in the Romish system.

The last steamer brings us no Church news of general interest. From the English Churchman we copy the following

SUMMARY OF FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

In France, the people of Paris have lately been employed in entertaining large numbers of Englishmen, of the middle class, who have gone over to that country, for the purpose of confirming the good understanding at present existing between the two nations. Some of our contemporaries have attempted to throw ridicule on this expedition. For our part, we cannot see why the middle classes of the two countries should not have their re-unions as well as the aristocracy. Besides, anything that is likely to re-establish the entente cordiale between France and England, ought to be encouraged. A French expedition has left Toulon, under the command of General Oudinot. Its destination is said to be Civita Vecchia; and its object, the restoration of the Pope. It is reported that the Duke of Bordeaux is seriously ill.

The Danes are blockading the German ports, and have taken many merchant vessels belonging to Germany. The German troops are marching towards Jutland; the Danes having evacuated nearly the whole of Schleswig, except the island of Alsens. Hopes are entertained of a pacification.

The German Empire is still a dream. It seems as if the Northern States, which are Protestant, will join Prussia; whilst the Southern States, which are Roman Catholic, will adhere to Austria. The Austrian Deputies have been ordered to leave Frankfurt; but this is perhaps only a ruse.

In Hungary, Comorn still holds out, and the Magyars are advancing towards Pesth. A decisive battle will soon be fought. It is said that Bem's object is to unite Hungary and Poland, and make them one kingdom.

The Russians are augmenting their forces, and have sent an ultimatum to the Turks, desiring them to withdraw their troops from the Principalities, and to reduce their army to the peace establishment; otherwise the Russians will turn (not cross) the Balkan, and march upon Constantinople. The Turks, of course, will do no such thing, if they are properly supported by England and France; but we fear Lord Palmerston will play the game of Russia, as he did before.

Genoa has surrendered to General La Marmora; and so the Revolutionary party, who first urged the King of Sardinia to fight against the Austrians, and then deserted him, and fought against him, have failed in their object of establishing a Republic. We are glad of this, for we should have been grieved to see ingratitude successful.

The Conde de Montemolin has been prevented from entering Spain by the French police, and has returned to England. He has been treated better by the Republic, than his father was by Louis Philippe.

Obituary.

For the Banner of the Cross.

DEPARTED this life, near Memphis, Tennessee, on the 3d of April, 1849, Capt. THOMAS BOOTH, a native of Sussex Co., Va., in the 76th year of his age.

The deceased was admitted to holy baptism by the Rev. Devereux Janat, a name identified with the early history of the Church in Virginia. Though for some years of his life he was connected with the society of Wesleyan Methodists, yet the genius of our ecclesiastical system seemed ever to approve itself to his judgment, to influence his estimate of christian character, and to shape his course of action. And when at length circumstances conspired with the bent of his mind, to lead him back to the Church of his fathers, he availed himself of the opening thus providentially afforded, and continued to the last, one of the most ardent of her friends, and faithful and frank of her adherents. Inflexible in his principles, sincere in his friendships, urbane in his deportment, he conciliated respect at once and love; and was gathered to his fathers, having the testimony of a good conscience, in the communion of the Catholic Church, in the confidence of a certain faith, in the comfort of a reasonable, religious, and holy hope.

DIED, at the residence of her son, in New York, on the 18th April, in the 73d year of her age, Mrs. MARIA McILVAINE, relict of the Hon. Joseph McIlvaine, a Senator of the United States, and mother of the Bishop of Ohio. She was buried in St. Mary's Church yard, in this city, the Bishop of New Jersey performing the funeral service. In the departure of this venerable woman, almost the last of her generation is taken from among us. She left among her papers, the prayer, that it might please God, to take her to Himself "by a sweet, and short passage." And her prayer was granted. "She fell asleep, in Jesus." "Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of His saints."—Missionary

by J. P. Doane

The following is the sad record of the death of a former fellow student. The faithfulness and zeal, which distinguished his early life, continued unabated to the end. (EDITOR OF BANNER.)

DEATH OF A MISSIONARY.

The Albany Journal publishes from a letter of the Rev. Richard Cole, missionary at Hong Kong, under date of January 26th, 1849, the particulars of the death by drowning, of the Rev. William J. Pohlman.

He was on his return from Hong Kong to Amoy, in the schooner "Omega," having accompanied his sister to the former place for the benefit of her health. On the night of the 5th of January, about 2, A.M., off Breakers' Point, about half way between Hong Kong and Amoy, distant from the shore about a quarter of a mile, the vessel struck upon the rocks. The wind was blowing fresh and the sea running high. By the advice of Mr. Pohlman they all remained upon the vessel until daylight, for the weather was thick and hazy, when they attempted to get a rope on shore by one of the men, who was a good swimmer, but owing to the high and strong waves, and the breakers on the beach, they could not succeed. As soon as it was light the wreck was discovered by some Chinamen on shore. They gave the alarm, and it was not long before there were hundreds collected on the beach. The vessel was fast going to pieces and filling with water. Some of the Chinamen, to the number of twelve or more, swam from the shore to the wreck, and commenced pilfering whatever they could lay their hands upon. In this dreadful situation, the waves breaking over the vessel, the cabin having filled with water, and the trunks and boxes having floated out, the hatches being washed open and the decks cleared of every thing, Mr. Pohlman told the Chinese, with the consent of the captain, that they could have every thing. The only thing they, the crew, wished for, was to preserve their lives. In this situation they remained until the captain judged it to be low tide, which was about 12, M. when they lowered the boat, (in doing which it was slightly stove,) and the captain, first and second mates, Mr. Pohlman, and about a dozen of the crew, who said they could not swim, got into it; leaving all who could swim, except the gunner and steward, upon the wreck. When the boat shored off from the vessel the captain ordered those left behind to jump into the water and swim ashore.—They did jump into the water, but instead of swimming to the shore, they caught hold of the sides of the boat in such numbers as to swamp her, and she immediately went down. Of all that were in her Captain Anderson, the second mate, the gunner, and the steward, were the only ones who succeeded in getting to shore. All the rest were drowned. The crew consisted of thirty-seven. Twelve were drowned and twenty-five were saved. Six of the crew were Chinamen; three of these were drowned. As soon as the boat sunk, and they were all thrown into the water, Mr. Hutchinson, the first mate, caught hold of the legs of the gunner, who was a good swimmer. The gunner disengaged himself and turned round to look after Mr. Hutchinson, when he saw him sinking. At the same moment he saw Mr. Pohlman, with his face under water, and struggling with his hands above the surface. This was the last that was seen of Mr. Pohlman. Every thing in the vessel was lost. The Chinese from the shore waded up to their waists in water to meet those who were struggling to get on shore. As soon as they could lay their hands upon them, they stripped them of their clothing; in doing which they murdered Captain Anderson, by holding his head under water until he was drowned.—Those who reached the shore alive had to make their escape without clothes, and so travel to Cup-Chee, a village about twelve or fifteen miles distant from the wreck, where the people were kind enough to give them a few rags to cover themselves with, and something to eat. From this village they travelled on by slow stages as well as they could, subsisting upon the charity of the Chinese Mandarins in the different villages through which they passed, until they reached Canton on the 8th of January. On one occasion they were all locked up in a jail during the night without any food.—The next morning the Mandarin released them, and gave them each forty cash (about three cents) and sent them on their way.

The motive for Captain Anderson's murder was, doubtless, that he had more and better clothing on than any of his crew. It is altogether likely, that had Mr. Pohlman succeeded in getting to shore, the cupidity of the Chinese, and their anxiety and haste to possess his clothing, would have led them to violent hands upon him also. Mr. Thomson, the second mate from whom these particulars were obtained, and who was in the boat with Mr. Pohlman, says that he was quite calm and self-possessed. He was prepared for any event. He was a most excellent labourer, in connection with the Reformed Dutch Church. He is the first missionary of the Board who has been lost at sea. Death to him was but the entrance into life. The Chinamen, in contending for the property of the wreck, killed each other to the number of fifty or sixty.

CHURCH CHOIRS.

The following admirable resolutions, on this subject, were adopted at the meeting of the Ev. Luth. Synod of Maryland, at its last session in Cumberland. They deserve a general circulation throughout the Church, and we would bespeak for them the respectful attention of the choirs in our churches:

1. Resolved, That the design of Choirs in churches is not to monopolize this delightful part of divine worship, but to direct the devotions of the congregation.

2. Resolved, That the members, and especially the leader, should be members of the church, whose deportment, especially in the house of God, should be discreet and Christian.

3. Resolved, That we disapprove of the introduction of so many new tunes, especially all light and frivolous ones, into the singing of our Churches, which often destroys instead of promotes a spirit of devotion, and prevents the congregation from joining in the exercises.

4. Resolved, That we recommend to the pastors of our churches to preach on the subject of devotional singing, and to make all proper efforts to have this interesting part of public worship so conducted that the whole congregation may join in the exercise, and as to be characterized by proper solemnity and decorum.—Lutheran Standard.

WESTERN NEW YORK.

BISHOP DE LANCEY'S VISITATION.

On Sunday, May 6th, Bishop De Lancey visited St. Mark's Church, Penn Yan. In the morning he preached and administered the Holy Communion. In the afternoon the Bishop preached. The Parish having been vacant from Christmas to Easter, and the present Rector having just commenced his labors there, no confirmation was administered.

PASTORAL LETTER.

To the Clergy and Congregations of the Diocese of Western New York.

DEAR BRETHREN:—On Whitsunday, May 27th, will occur the three hundredth Anniversary of the Book of Common Prayer, as authorized by the Church of England, when, guided by the Divine Head of the Church, she arose in the majesty of truth, threw off the yoke of the Papacy, restored public worship from an unknown language to the vernacular tongue, and reinstated gospel truth, order, and holiness in the faith, affections, and practice of the people of God.

By an obvious propriety, which will at once strike the minds of all of you, the day should be gratefully commemorated by us, who are experiencing the rich blessings which in God's gracious Providence, have resulted from the English Reformation, and enjoying in this far off land, then a howling wilderness, not only the spiritual freedom then won, but that Prayer Book which the Church then adopted.

I need hardly remind you that no books, beside the Holy Bible on which it rests, has vindicated itself to the sober, devout, and christian piety of intelligent minds so triumphantly as the Book of Common Prayer—none has exerted so powerful an influence in the maintenance of the doctrinal, sacramental, and devotional truths of divine revelation, which the reformers treading in the steps of the Primitive Church, adopted as their guide and hope; and for which, many of them shed their blood. This book has won its way by the side of the Christian Church, as its faithful handmaid. It is used in public service by millions in England, Ireland, Scotland, and the British Colonies. It has carried its sound Protestantism to some extent, into all quarters of the globe. In Europe, Asia, Africa, and America its voice is heard.

For three hundred years, it has successfully maintained through various trials and depressions its principles, its creeds, its sacraments, and its devotion.

No modification of its essential truths and forms have taken place in adapting it to different countries and governments.

Since 1789, for more than half a century, it has been the authorized guide of truth, devotion, to our portion of the Church of Christ; winning almost daily, conquests over ignorance, prejudice, and opposition.

It was adopted, Oct. 16, 1789, by a general convention, consisting of two Bishops, about seventeen clergymen, and twelve laymen, and by its authority, became obligatory on the Clergy and Church, Oct. 1, 1790.

The whole P. E. Church, then consisted of four Bishops, about 180 Clergymen, and 200 Churches. It now comprehends 29 Bishops, about 1500 Clergymen, and 1500 congregations, who, with the fervency of spiritual devotion, the conviction of intelligent minds, and the holy affection of hearts consecrated to God by the Holy Ghost, will we trust ever cling to it unchanged, as next to the Bible, the sheet anchor of the faith and hope of the Church.

It has already been suggested, that the best celebration of this three hundredth anniversary of the Prayer Book, would be by a humble offering to God, in a contribution to the cause of Christian Missions to be equally divided between Diocesan, Domestic, and Foreign Missions.

I very cordially recommend to my brethren of the Clergy in this Diocese, to bring the subject before their respective flocks, by sermons or addresses as they shall think proper, on the day above named, Whitsunday, May 27th, and to make on that day the collection above specified, for Diocesan, Domestic, and Foreign Missions. All departments of the Missionary work stand urgently in need of aid. From all, the most pressing solicitations come. With grateful hearts and open hands let us on this occasion respond to the appeal, adding to our alms, our prayers that God would make his ways known unto men, his saving health unto all nations, and that his holy Church universal, may be so guided and governed by His good Spirit, that all who profess and call themselves christians, may be led into the way of truth, and hold the faith in unity of spirit, in the bond of peace, and in righteousness of life.

Commending you all to the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, the love of God, and the fellowship of the Holy Ghost, I subscribe myself, affectionately your friend and Bishop,

WILLIAM H. DELANCEY,

Geneva, W. N. Y., May 1, 1849.

OPENING OF ST. BARTHOLOMEW'S CHURCH, LEETOWN.—The following interesting sketch of the services on this occasion is from the Free Press, of Charlestown, Jefferson county. It is with much satisfaction that we record such events, indicating the growth of religion and the extension of its blessings through our State. How much more of real, positive good is to be found in a simple incident like this,—how much that may be expected to tell in the happy annals of eternity than the record of victories won, governments overthrown or nations convulsed. How much more than controversies in the Church, however important or necessary. Alas, that the Prince of Peace should have to say, 'I came not to send peace but a sword.' Let us be thankful that amidst all the evils of the world, there are also indications of good. Such reflections have arisen since this sketch of the opening services of this little "Greenwood Church" has been lying before us, and although not more appropriate to this than any other similar occasion, we let them stand as our preface. The blessing of Heaven be upon our Churches both in town and country, and may the Spirit of God descend and give spirituality to their devotions, and efficacy to the preaching and hearing of the Gospel among them:—

"Last Sabbath week this beautiful edifice was occupied for the first time in the solemn worship of Almighty God. The day was fair and beautiful; a very respectable and intelligent congregation was assembled, and the exercises were solemn and impressive. As the evening services progressed, every heart seemed animated, and every countenance manifested unwonted joy and grateful esteem. The Rev. Mr. Brown delivered an able and eloquent discourse from the words, 'This is none other than the house of God and the gate of heaven.' He described in glowing colors the patriarch casting his wearied head on the pillow of stone, while in his vision he beheld the angels of God ascending on the ladder, at the top of which the Son of man was standing; and glanced at the chequered scenes of Jacob's life. He showed how this was the house of God: it was in a temple dedicated to Jehovah he had promised to manifest himself to his waiting people. That prayer, and praise and preaching of the word would bring down the Divine blessing; that the gates of heaven would there be opened, as there was always an inseparable connexion between the end and the means. With touching pathos, which brought tears to many eyes, he referred to the untiring zeal and labors of the Rev. B. Allen, who more than 30 years since had preached in a humble cabin, then in view of the speaker, and in his own experience he felt that in that very house he had witnessed the presence of the Holy Spirit, and the efficacy of the divine word. Through the whole of this charming discourse, the most profound attention reigned.

Then came the hymn 'And wilt thou, Oh, Eternal God,' &c., sung to the tune of Old Hundred. Never can I forget the impression. The music was excellent, because the hearts of the people were animated with the inspiring scene. Thousands and tens of thousands of congregations, in various parts of the world, have for centuries united in singing this solemn tune, and yet it retains all its pristine grandeur and sublimity. All seemed delighted and happy with this effort to sustain and promote true religion in this vicinity, and it is hoped that a great and glorious change will be effected in the hearts of the people in this quarter of the country, by the influence of the Divine Spirit on the faithful services of the pious Rector of St. Bartholomew's Church at Leetown."

INDIANA.

We understand that Bishop Kemper, being desirous of attending the sessions of the Conventions of both Wisconsin and Indiana, has, after consultation with the Standing Committee of the last mentioned Diocese, resolved to change the day which had been fixed upon for the meeting of the next Convention thereof. The Convention of Indiana will, Providence permitting, meet in Christ Church, Indianapolis, on Thursday, the 28th day of June, 1849.

RHODE ISLAND.

The Bishop of Rhode Island has addressed a Pastoral Letter to his Diocese, appointing the approaching Holy Festival of Whitsunday as the occasion for a collection in all the churches of Rhode Island in behalf of Diocesan Missions. The following is the conclusion of this admirable letter:

"The approaching festival of Whitsunday will bring with it associations scarcely less interesting and important to our branch of the Church of Christ, than were those of Pentecost to the infant Church in Judea. On Whitsunday, 1549, the Book of Common Prayer, compiled from the earliest Liturgies, and purified from the errors of Popery, was first used in the Reformed Church of England. A Book combining the wisdom and piety of all the preceding centuries of our religion; embodying all that is valuable in the tradition of the Church Catholic; instinct with the spirit of the Bible, and furnishing the best commentary upon its teachings. How thankful should we be in this age of false doctrine and heresy, for a volume which teaches us to confess Christ in the use of those creeds in which confessors and martyrs of every age announced 'the faith once delivered to the saints!' In this day of wildness and fanaticism, how thankful should we be for a fixed formulary of devotion in which we may offer to Almighty God worship at once spiritual and rational! And in this age of agitation, when the most earnest efforts are made, and the most insidious arts employed to restore to its dominion that spiritual despotism which our forefathers cast off; when many of the young and imaginative, blinded and bewildered by the sorceries of Rome, are in danger of being lured into her embrace,—how warmly should we adhere to that venerable Liturgy which provides for the administration of Christ's sacraments and discipline in their primitive purity and simplicity, freed from the deadly errors and the silly superstitions of the mediæval ages!

I affectionately invite you, therefore, to unite with me, on the approaching three hundredth anniversary of the publication of the Book of Common Prayer, in offering thanks to Almighty God for the blessings of the glorious Reformation, which restored to the Anglican branch of the Church of Christ the doctrines, discipline and sacraments of the Gospel in their original simplicity and integrity; and at the same time to unite with me in fervent prayer that the precious deposit received through our forefathers, may be faithfully preserved by us, and be transmitted uncorrupted and unimpaired to those who shall come after us.

"The Lord God be with us as He was with our fathers!" Let our "alms go up with our devotions as a memorial before God." Let the sincerity of our thanksgivings and our prayers be manifested by our liberal contributions to extend the services and institutions of our Reformed Apostolic Church, for the benefit of our contemporaries, and to hand them down as a most valuable inheritance to our children and our children's children, to the latest generations.

Commending you to God and to the word of his grace, which is able to build you up and to give you an inheritance among all those who are sanctified by faith in Christ Jesus, I remain, dear brethren,

Your affectionate friend and Pastor,

J. P. K. HENSHAW,
Bishop of Rhode Island.

Providence, May 7, 1849."

The Bishop has also set forth a Form of Thanksgiving and Prayer to be used in the Diocese of Rhode Island, immediately before the General Thanksgiving at Morning and Evening Prayer, on the Tercentenary of the publication of the Book of Common Prayer, Whitsunday, 1849.

EPISCOPAL ACTS.—The Bishop preached in the Church of the Ascension, Wakefield, April 30th.

May 2d, in St. Luke's church, East Greenwich, eleven persons were confirmed. Sermon and address by the Bishop.

May 3d, in St. Philip's church, Crompton, the Bishop preached, confirmed two persons, and delivered an address.

May 6th, fourth Sunday after Easter, ten persons were confirmed in St. Stephen's church, Providence. Sermon and address by the Bishop.—Witness.

CONNECTICUT.

CONSECRATION OF TRINITY CHURCH.

Nichols' Farms, Trumbull, Fairfield county, Conn.

On Monday, April 30th, being the day appointed by the Bishop of the Diocese, this neat and beautiful edifice was consecrated to the worship of the Triune God, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, by the Rt. Rev. T. C. Brownell. A large number of the Clergy and laity evinced by their presence and deportment a lively interest in the solemn services of the day. Evening prayer was offered by Rev. N. E. Cornwall, of Southport, assisted in the Lessons by Rev. Charles Todd, of Huntington. The Sentence of Consecration was read by Rev. Enoch Huntington, Rector of the church. An appropriate discourse was delivered by the Rev. Gurdon T. Coit, of Bridgeport. At the close of the services several came forward to renew their baptismal vows in confirmation. Rev. Messrs. Scott, Gardiner, and Carter were present, in addition to those above mentioned. The church is early Gothic. Its shape is cruciform. The plan was furnished by Mr. Wiley, of New York.

The ladies of the parish have displayed much taste in furnishing this temple of the Most High. The carrying out of Mr. Wiley's plan without any admixture or confounding of different orders of architecture, is to be attributed to the skill and care of the Messrs. Hotchkiss, of Birmingham, the enterprising builders, under the superintendence of a committee of the parish, several of whom were not only men of taste, but practically acquainted with the business over which they were appointed. The general opinion of all who have seen this building is, that it is a model of a church built in church style, for a parish of moderate means, who desire a place where the offices of the church can be performed with solemnity and propriety.

The Bishop of the Diocese held his visitation of St. George's church, Milford, on St. Philip and St. James' day. Morning prayer was said by the Rev. Dr. Meade, Rector of Norwalk, assisted in the lessons by the Rev. Mr. Walker, Rector of Humphreysville. The ante-communion service was said by the Bishop; the Rev. Mr. Putnam, Rector of Derby, reading the Epistle, and the Rev. Mr. Coit, Rector of Bridgeport, the Gospel. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Mr. Cornwall, Rector of Southport. The Bishop confirmed nine persons.

Without dismissing the congregation after Confirmation, a procession was formed, consisting of the Bishop and Rector, the clergy in attendance, the Wardens and Vestrymen, and all other persons in attendance; which moved to the site of the new church, where the corner stone was laid by the Bishop, assisted in the service by the Rector and the Rev. Dr. Mead. An address was delivered by the Rector. The Clergymen present, besides those already mentioned, were the Rev. Messrs. Huntington, Scott and Tomlinson. The attendance on these services was large, and an abiding impression appeared to be made. By the appointment of the Bishop, the office used at the laying of the corner stone was that set forth in the diocese of New York for such occasions.

The old church, erected about 80 years ago, having gone very much to decay, it was lately taken down; and the parish, though one of the feeblest in the diocese, is making great exertions towards building a small new one, simple and unpretending in character, but of permanent materials.—Calendar.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

EXTRACTS FROM THE BISHOP'S JOURNAL.

March 4th.—At St. Philip's Church, this being one of the "stated days" for Ordination, James Habersham Elliott was admitted to the Order of Deacons; presented by Rev. J. B. Campbell, the Sermon by the Bishop.

April 1st.—Palm Sunday.—I visited the Congregation of "Calvary Church." After "Evening prayer" by the Minister, Rev. P. Trapier, I administered the holy rite of Confirmation to one white person and six of color, and then made an Address. It was gratifying to notice the progress of this benevolent undertaking, more especially for the spiritual welfare of the black population.

April 3d.—Tuesday, in Passion Week, at Grace Church, Charleston, I preached, and administered the holy rite of Confirmation to thirteen white persons, and one person of color.

April 11th.—At Georgetown, I preached and administered Confirmation to four persons.

April 15th.—1st Sunday after Easter.—In All-Saints' Parish, at the Chapel on the plantation of Mr. John H. Tucker, I said "Morning prayer," commencing at half past 8 o'clock, and heard a very appropriate Sermon from the Rector, (Rev. A. Glennie), in which the blacks were catechised. There were present about twelve white and eighty black persons. The chanting was specially interesting, and the whole service edifying. It was indeed "good to be there." At 11 o'clock, at the Parish Church, "Morning prayer" and the "Ante-communion" were said, by the Rector, and after my Sermon, Confirmation was administered to three whites and four blacks. The Congregation consisted of about fifty white and one hundred and fifty black persons, who nearly filled the gallery. At "Laurel Hill," the seat of F. M. Weston, Esq., seven miles from the Parish Church, there was "Evening prayer" said by the Rev. G. Platt, a Deacon; the Lessons were read by the Rector, and after an Address, I confirmed twenty-three servants of Mr. Weston. There were present about sixty persons—a snow storm prevented the attendance of a larger number, and of several candidates for Confirmation. The Chapel recently built is a neat edifice, capable of containing about three hundred persons. It is suitably furnished, and in all respects more convenient, and more respectable in appearance, than many of the Churches and Chapels in the Diocese. It must be an efficacious means of civilizing, and, under the favor of God, of Christianizing the class for whose special benefit it was erected by its worthy proprietor, and the example will not be without good results.

Clerical Changes.

The Rev. Thomas R. Pyncheon has taken charge of St. Paul's church, Stockbridge, where his letters and papers may be directed.

The Rev. George C. Foot having removed from Auburn to Moravia, in consequence of his being appointed Missionary at Moravia and McLean, requests letters and papers to be sent accordingly.

The Rev. P. M. Stryker has resigned the rectorship of Zion church, East Bloomfield, and accepted a call to St. Mark's church, Penn Yan, and requests that letters and papers be addressed accordingly.

The Rev. James H. Carpenter has resigned the rectorship of the church of the Ascension, Wakefield, R. I., and for the present his letters and papers may be directed to the same place.

Selections.

REST IN JESUS.

Broken-hearted! weep no more;
Hear what comfort He hath spoken,
Smoking flax, Who ne'er hath quenched,
Bruised reed, Who ne'er hath broken:
Ye who wander here below,
Heavy laden as you go,
Come, with grief, with sin oppress'd:
Come to Me, and be at rest.

Lamb of Jesu's blood-bought flock,
Brought again from sin and straying,
Hear the Shepherd's gentle voice,
'Tis a true and faithful saying:
Greater love how can there be,
Than to yield up life for thee?
Bought with pang, and tear, and sigh,
Turn and live! Why will ye die?

Broken-hearted! weep no more,
Far from consolation flying:
He who calls, hath felt thy wound,
Seen thy weeping, heard thy sighing:
Bring thy broken heart to Me,
Welcome offering shall it be;
Streaming tears, and burning eyes,
Mine accepted sacrifice.

NINEVEH AND ITS REMAINS.

Meanwhile, the fugitive Arab had posted full speed to Mosul, and rushing breathless into the bazaars, announced to every one he met that "Nimrod had appeared." The sensation was immense. The Cadi, "who had no distinct idea whether the bones of the mighty hunter, or only his image, had been discovered, protested to the Pasha," who accordingly sent a message to Mr. Layard, that the mysterious remains should be treated with respect, and that he wished the excavations to be stopped at once. In consequence, the greater number of the workmen were suspended, and only two allowed to dig leisurely, and continue the research. Soon after, the winged lions were discovered.

"I used," says Mr. Layard, "to contemplate for hours those mysterious emblems, and muse over their intent and history. What more noble forms could have ushered the people into the temple of their gods? What more sublime images could have been borrowed from nature, by men who sought, unaided by the light of revealed religion, to embody their conception of the wisdom, power, and ubiquity of a Supreme Being. . . . They had awed and instructed races which flourished 3000 years ago. Through the portals which they guarded, kings, priests, and warriors, had borne sacrifices to their altars, long before the wisdom of the East had penetrated to Greece, and had furnished its mythology with symbols long recognised by the Assyrian votaries. They may have been buried, and their existence may have been unknown, before the foundation of the Eternal City. But how changed was the scene around them. The luxury and civilization of a mighty nation had given place to the wretchedness and ignorance of a few half-barbarous tribes. The wealth of temples, and the riches of great cities had been succeeded by ruins and shapeless heaps of earth. Above the spacious hall in which they stood, the plough has passed, and the corn now waved. Egypt has monuments no less ancient and no less wonderful; but they have stood forth for ages to testify her early power and renown, whilst those before me had but now appeared to bear witness, in the words of the prophet, that once 'the Assyrian was a cedar in Lebanon, with fair branches, and with a shadowing shroud of a high stature, and his top was among the thick boughs—his height was exalted above all the trees of the field, and his boughs were multiplied, and his branches became long, because of the multitude of waters, when he shot forth. . . . And now is Nineveh a desolation and dry like a wilderness, and flocks lie down in the midst of her: all the beasts of the nations, both the cormorant and the bittern, lodge in the upper lintels of it: their voice sings in the windows, and desolation is in the thresholds.'"

The fame of Mr. Layard had now spread abroad, and he received frequent visits from the neighbouring Arabs. A Sheikh and a dozen of his attendants were generally installed in his hut, while their mares were tied at every door. It was no easy matter to get rid of them. One of these importunate guests had brought him, as a token of friendship, a skin of honey, and cheese, a Kurdish carpet, and some horse trappings, in the confident expectation of a goodly recompense. Many hints were dropped as to the propriety of some return on the part of the "English Bey," but he was provokingly deaf to them. At length, on the second evening, the Sheikh's secretary asked for an interview. "The Mullah Effendi," said he, "will leave your lordship's abode to-morrow. Praise be to God, the most disinterested and sincere friendship has been established between you, and it is suitable that your lordship should take this opportunity of giving a public testimony of your regard for his reverence. Not that he desires to accept anything from you, but it would be highly gratifying to him to prove to his tribe that he has met with a friendly reception from so distinguished a person, and to spread through the mountains reports of your generosity." "I regret," answered I, "that the trifling differences in matters of religion should preclude the possibility of the Effendi's accepting anything from me." "Although," rejoined the secretary, "there might, perhaps, be some difficulty, yet it could be, I hope, overcome. Moreover, there are his attendants; they are not so particular as he is, and, thank God! we are all one. To each of them you might give a pair of yellow boots and a silk dress—besides, if you chance to have any pistols or daggers, they would be satisfied with them." After proposing for himself white linen for a turban and a pair of breeches, the worthy secretary hinted that the religious scruples of his master did not extend to the acceptance of a case of razors, as they did not absorb moisture upon being touched by a Christian hand, and thus could not contaminate a Mussulman. "Besides," said he, "he would feel obliged by the loan of a small sum—five purses, for instance (Wallah! Billah! Tillah! he would do the same for you at any time), for which he would give you a note of hand." Mr. Layard replied, that it was very unfortunate that there was no bazaar in the village—that two days must elapse before he could procure the desired articles from Mosul. "I could not think of taking up so much of the valuable time of the Mullah Effendi, whose absence must already have been sorely felt by his tribe. With regard to the money, (for which God forbid that I should think of taking any note of hand—praise be to God! we are on too good terms for such formalities,) and to the razors, I think it would give more convincing proof of my esteem for the Effendi, if I were myself to return his welcome visit and be the bearer of suitable presents." The secretary retired quite crestfallen, and henceforth Mr. Layard was no more troubled with visits from Kurdish chiefs.

"A new change had now come over the face of the plain of Nimroud. The middle of March in Mesopotamia is the brightest epoch of spring. . . . The plain, far as the eye could reach, was studded with the white pavilions of the Hytas and the black tents of the Arabs; picketed around them were innumerable horses in gay trappings, struggling to relieve themselves from their bonds, which restrained them from ranging over the green pastures. Flowers of every hue enamelled the meadows; not thinly scattered over the grass as in northern climes, but in such thick and gathering clusters that the whole plain seemed a patchwork of many colours. The dogs, as they returned from hunting, issued from the long grass dyed red, yellow, or blue, according to the flowers through which they had forced their way. . . . When I returned in the evening after the labour of the day, I often sat at the door of my tent, and giving myself up to the full enjoyment of that calm and repose which are imparted to the senses by such scenes as these, I gazed listlessly on the varied groups before me. As the sun went down behind the low hills which separate the river from the desert—even their rocky sides had striven to emulate the verdant clothing of the plain—its receding rays were gradually withdrawn, like a transparent veil of light, from the landscape. Over the pure cloudless sky was the glow of the last light. The great mound threw its dark shadow far across the plain. In the distance, and beyond the Zab Keshaf, another venerable ruin, rose indistinctly into the evening mist. Still more distant, and still more indistinct, was a solitary hill overlooking the ancient city of Arbela. The Kurdish mountains, whose snowy summits cherished the dying sunbeams, yet struggled with the twilight. The bleating of sheep and lowing of cattle, at first faint, became louder as the flocks returned from their pastures and wandered amongst the tents. Girls hurried over the greensward to seek their father's cattle, or crouched down to milk those which had returned alone to their well-remembered folds. Some were coming from the river, bearing the replenished pitcher on their heads, or shoulders: others, no less graceful in form and erect in their carriage, were carrying the heavy load of long grass which they had cut in the meadows. Sometimes a party of horsemen might have been seen in the distance, slowly crossing the plain, the tufts of ostrich feathers which topped their long spears showing darkly against the evening sky. They would ride up to my tent, and give me the usual salutation, 'Peace be with you, O Bey,' or 'Allah aienak, God help you.' Then driving the end of their lances into the ground, they would spring from their mares, and fasten their horses to the still quivering weapons. Seating themselves on the grass, they related deeds of war and plunder, speculated on the site of the tents of Sofrell, until the moon rose, when they vaulted into their saddles and took the way of the desert. The plain now glittered with innumerable fires. As the night advanced, they vanished one by one, until the landscape was wrapped in darkness and in silence, only disturbed by the barking of the Arab dog."

Strongly tempted as we are to extract such passages as these, which bring before us a perfect picture of the scenery of Assyrian plains, we must not forget the limits to which we are unavoidably confined. For this reason we shall not enter into Mr. Layard's visit to the neighbouring nomadic tribes, which, however, abounds with beautiful incidents of Arab life most graphically placed before the reader. With the summer we find him again at Nimroud, and eagerly awaiting the promised firman from Sir Stratford Canning. The plain now wore a totally different aspect.

"The heat was almost intolerable. Violent whirlwinds occasionally swept over the face of the country; they could be seen as they advanced from the desert, carrying with them clouds of sand and dust. Almost utter darkness prevailed during their passage, which lasted generally about an hour, and nothing could resist their fury. On returning home one afternoon, I found no traces of my dwelling; the tents had disappeared, and my furniture was scattered over the plain. When on the mound, my only secure place of refuge was beneath the fallen lion, where I could defy the fury of the whirlwind; the Arabs ceased from their work, and crouched in the trenches, almost suffocated and blinded by the dense cloud of fire-dust and sand, which nothing could exclude."

It was in one of these hurricanes that an English steamboat was sunk in the Euphrates. Meanwhile the excavations were steadily going on, and fresh objects of interest almost daily discovered. At length arrived the wished-for letter. Mr. Layard was sleeping in the tent of Sheik Abd-ur-rahman, when an Arab messenger awoke him, and by the light of a small camel-dung fire he read the document which secured to the British nation the records of Nineveh and a collection of the earliest monuments of Assyrian art.

Our enterprising explorer now determined to enlarge his field of operations, and to turn his attention to the great mound of Kouyunjik, opposite Mosul. Here, too, his researches were destined to be richly rewarded. Chamber after chamber was successfully opened, the walls of which glowed with singular and splendid sculptures.

"The colours still adhere to the sandals, brows, hair, and eyes; the sculptures are in the best state of preservation; the most delicate carvings are still distinct; and the outline of the figures retains its original sharpness. At every fresh discovery the Arabs were so excited, that they would strip themselves almost naked, throw the handkerchief from their heads, and, letting their matted hair stream in the wind, rush like madmen into the trenches, and carry off the baskets of earth, shouting at the same time the war-cry of their tribe."

AN OLD IRISH COUNTRY PARSON.

In the ancient and secluded burial-ground of Kilcaven (properly Kyle Kevin, or the Church of St. Kevin), parish of Bannow, county Wexford, is a plain, substantial grave-stone, marking the resting place of the mortal remains of the Rev. James King, who, having lived a curate, "passing rich on forty pounds a year," died at a mature age some seventy or eighty years since. As in his days land was let at from half-a-crown to five shillings an acre, and agricultural produce, in the more remote districts, was sold at prices surpassing belief—even in the market of New Ross, a sea-port town, prime beef and mutton only averaging from one penny to three half-pence per pound—he easily, being a confirmed bachelor, obtained board and lodging at a respectable farm-house for twelve pounds a year, including the stabling and keeping of his pony. Eight pounds a year sufficed for clothes and pocket money; and the remaining twenty pounds of his scanty income he gave to the poor, without distinction of their creed. He had brothers and kinsmen in affluent circumstances, ut tempora tum erant, but so far from trespassing on their finances, "Uncle James's" periodical visits to their houses were always hailed with pleasure by the juvenile members of their families, because he always gave them a shilling a-piece when leaving. There was even a tradition—but I cannot vouch for its truth—that, having been bequeathed two hundred guineas by one of his brothers, he brought the legacy in an old leather bag to a married brother, saying he did not want it himself. This, however, is certain, that, about the age of fifty, he was presented to a living in the north of Ireland, through the influence of a lady of some rank, who admired his simplicity of character; but he respectfully, although firmly, refused this promotion. "My dear," said he to his benefactress, "I have now lived half-a-century in my native place; I am too old to form new friendships; and as I have as much as I want, I cannot think of leaving all my old friends and parishioners, to end my days among strangers."

His death was sudden, and was attended with one of those circumstances which mock investigation. His brother, Mr. Richard King, of Barristown (which has now been two hundred years inhabited by one branch of the family), standing at his bed-room window, believed he saw him riding slowly down a sort of avenue or long drive, along a gentle declivity, which led to the house. He immediately put on his hat, and went out to meet him, when he suddenly lost sight of his visitor. He supposed, however, that "the parson" had—for he loved a joke—turned his pony suddenly through a gate into the back premises; but, on making search, he could nowhere be found; and next day tidings arrived that he had been called hence, just about the time when this strange delusion passed through Mr. R. King's mind. In my early days—for I am a junior member of the family myself—I have often heard the story told by various members of the family, who remembered the occurrence, and all told it alike.

His sister-in-law, the late Mrs. R. King, of Barristown, died at a good old age, A.D. 1813; and, although a decided Protestant of "the Black North"—for her grandfather, the Rev. Mr. Knox, was shut up in Derry during the siege—was so beloved by the Roman Catholic peasantry, for her bounty, that her remains were followed to her grave by a funeral procession which covered two miles of the road, the last of the train only leaving the avenue-gate as the corpse reached the gate of the cemetery.

Her father was an Englishman, the Rev. Mr. Shudell, who was many years rector of Duncormac, county Wexford, introduced the English spinning-wheel into the district, where he found only the distaff in use when he entered on his pastoral charge. In the same district, in the year 1821, the Rev. Wm. Hickey, well known as the writer of various works on agriculture &c., under the name of Martin Doyle, founded an agricultural school when vicar of Bannow. So much for the Protestant clergy, who are represented as mere cultivators of the soil, and enemies of the people of Ireland! I know, indeed, that in the county of Wicklow, not many years ago, a Protestant curate gave away £6,000, in a short period, out of £7,000, his whole private property, to alleviate the distress around him, and I also was acquainted with a clergyman who resigned a valuable living in the county of Cork, because after giving away the whole of his tithes, he could not bear to witness the unrelieved misery that existed around him.

"I do not know that any pagan writer ever mentions or recommends, what Christ calls the first and great commandment: viz. the love of God. And yet this is the grand duty of man to his Maker; the basis and essence of virtue; and the grand means of happiness. When this is wanting, all our performances, how specious soever, are not only uncomfortable and unacceptable, but sinful."

LITERARY MEN OF GERMANY.

THOLUCK, THE HALLE PROFESSOR.

While in Halle, I spent an hour or two with Professor THOLUCK. On a bright spring morning I found him wrapped in his overcoat, and walking in the long sheltered promenade that bounded one side of his garden. Returning my letters of introduction unopened, he at once received me with that unceremonious familiarity that German scholars so uniformly exhibit towards strangers. He spoke with interest of the many dear friends he had in America, and soon showed himself very conversant with our national institutions and characteristics. He remarked that during the late political disturbances he long expected to be obliged to take refuge in the United States or England, from revolutionary violence. He thought the revolutionary party of Germany unworthy of confidence or sympathy, believing that it was generally made up of infidels and socialists, and that it was actuated not so much by hostility to any particular form of government as by opposition to every reasonable kind of government whatever. He feared that its success would result in the destruction of the Universities, and in the prostration of every thing religious and redeeming in the land. The complete divorce of the Church from the State, established by the new Constitution, he had no doubt, by destroying Protestant unity, and affording free scope to Roman Catholic proselytism, would redound greatly to the advantage of the Church of Rome. It was his opinion that metaphysical speculation had for the present at least pretty much exhausted itself in Germany; for the last two or three years Hegelianism had made no progress, nor in fact any other ism, except indifferentism. The so-called Reformed German Catholics were fast diminishing and would soon disappear, some becoming Protestant Lutherans, but most rationalists and infidels. Ronge himself had cut loose from all religious and moral restraints, and was now living the life of an abandoned libertine. DOVIAT, the coadjutor of Ronge, had been imprisoned for sedition, and had lately published an avowal that he and his party had only made religion a mask under which they might work out their political schemes; and CZERSKE, though a good man, was weak and wavering. I mention these things because I believe that upon these important matters the views of a man so calm and discerning, and occupying so commanding a position as Professor THOLUCK are entitled to great respect, if not implicit confidence. To inquiries respecting his health he replied that it had been greatly injured by his labours at the meeting of the Evangelical Alliance in London. He observed that it did not become the earnest but inefficient Germans to complain of the business-like mechanical mode of conducting such meetings in England, but yet if the convention had had more spontaneity and less machinery, if it had been more a reunion and less a parliament, it would have been more agreeable to the delegates from Germany. Like Neander, he expressed great admiration of COLERIDGE; and yet he lauded the English and Americans for their practical disposition and habits. Speaking of the various English translations of his works, he remarked that he liked the translation of some of his sermons by Prof. PARK, of Andover, better than the original—the English dress seemed to give additional power and majesty to the ideas. Before we parted, he invited me to repair to his study and record my name in his book. As my eye fell when I entered, upon a touching Ecce Homo on one side of the room, and the countenance of MARTIN LUTHER, that never quailed before mortal man on the other, I could not but recognize the spirit of the man in his "outward environments." Of his own accord he gave me notes of introduction to other eminent scholars resident elsewhere. I can hardly help being surprised at the interest and kindness which this distinguished man manifested towards a young unknown American. Since I have been in Europe, I have witnessed terrible scenes, that have been branded as with fire upon my soul; but these will be worn away long before my interviews with Wordsworth, Neander and Tholuck cease to be green in my memory.

Professor THOLUCK is a small, well-built man, with chestnut hair, light eyes, a somewhat wrinkled face, and a mild, thoughtful cast of features. He is about fifty years of age—is very near sighted, and yet, like Neander, does not use spectacles. He has almost entirely relinquished writing; his labors now are chiefly confined to the delivery of two lectures daily, at the University. He speaks English with great readiness and propriety, and yet as he told me, it is with difficulty that he comprehends SHAKESPEARE in the original. The number of theological students now at Halle, is about 400; the catalogue has very considerably decreased since last year's political disturbances.

SCHELLING AND VON HUMBOLDT.

SCHELLING still lives in Berlin, a hale, vigorous, silver-headed patriarchal-looking octogenarian. He yet occasionally lectures at the University, and is doing something to repair the mischief of his former speculations by now defending the cause of revealed truth. Baron VON HUMBOLDT continues to reside at Potsdam, his birth-place, the intimate friend and adviser of the King, and full of years as he is of scientific honors.

SIGMA.

A PRAYER.

Let thy well-beloved Son, the Lord Jesus Christ our Saviour, be the refuge and stay of our souls, and the ground of our confidence towards thee; that whenever our guilty consciences rise up against us, and the sense of our vileness terrifies us, we may be kept from despair and delivered from all our fears, by a steadfast faith in thy mercy and by looking to the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world. Prepare us, we beseech thee, to receive him in repentance and faith, and with an earnest desire of his blessings; that knowing the grace and power of his first coming, in the forgiveness of our sins, and the purity of our lives, we may behold him with joy unspeakable in the glory of his second coming, and be received into thy everlasting kingdom in heaven, through the same Jesus Christ, our only Saviour and Redeemer. Amen.—REV. THOMAS ADAM.

Liking and esteeming others merely for their agreement with us in religious opinion, and manner of living, is only a less offensive kind of self-adoration.

At the Baptism of Infants, the Church teaches us to pray that all "carnal (or fleshy) affections may die in the Child, and that all things belonging to the Spirit may live and grow in him." If we refer to St. Paul's Epistle to the Galatians, we find the enumeration of the Works of the Flesh, and the Fruits of the Spirit.

Here, then, we see very plainly what things must be avoided, and what things must be cultivated, by those who desire to fulfil the obligations which their Baptism has laid upon them. Our duty towards Baptized Children is most plain and clear; and our Affection, our Example, our Authority, our Discipline, and our Prayers, must be constantly, regularly, and systematically employed, in training them to avoid and forsake the Work of the Flesh, and to bring forth the Fruits of the Spirit. We must bear in mind that we have not to train any Child to live for itself, nor for ourselves, but for the Service of God the Father who created him, of God the Son who Redeemed, and will Judge him (and us), and of God the Holy Ghost who has Regenerated and Sanctified him.

Such, then, is the Practical application of the Church's Doctrine of Baptismal Regeneration. It is plainly a Doctrine of deep, solemn, and lasting Responsibility, Encouragement and Consolation, both to the Child, and to those Christians who have the training or teaching of it, or who have any influence over it. It is the only sure Foundation of a truly Christian Education.

1. It shows the Child what he was by Nature, as the offspring of Adam, and what he has been made by Grace, through Christ, in his Baptism. It tells him that he may be, and should be, Holy, for he has received the Means of Holiness—even the Gift of the Holy Spirit, to sanctify every Thought, Word, and Deed, for God's Service. "Freely ye have received, freely give."

2. It forbids Carelessness in the Child, by teaching him that as he has received the Holy Spirit, so he must always diligently bring forth the Fruits of the Spirit, and walk in God's Holy Will, and Commandments, all the days of his Life, or his Baptism may profit him nothing, but rather bring upon him greater condemnation at the Judgment Day.

3. It forbids presumptuous Confidence, or self-Righteousness, by teaching him that he owes every Blessing, every Privilege, and every Grace, to the Mercy of God, through our Lord Jesus Christ, Who died on the Cross to Redeem and Save him; and that, although he has been Regenerated by Water and the Holy Ghost, at his Baptism, yet he must, to his Life's end, work out his Salvation with fear and trembling—that the Devil is ever on the watch to tempt him to sin, and unless he humbly obeys the Voice of the Holy Spirit, speaking to his Conscience, he will certainly fall into Temptation and Sin, and thus may forfeit the Blessings of his Baptismal Regeneration: for the Holy Spirit, finding that His gracious and merciful warnings are neglected, may, in time, think fit to leave the soul to itself, and to Satan, and cease to Sanctify, Enlighten, and Guide it. Even St. Paul, blessed as he was by the Holy Spirit, tells us that he was constantly bringing his body into subjection, lest when he had preached to others, he himself should be a cast-away. "Be not high-minded, but fear."

4. It forbids Despair, by teaching the Child that though a Sinful Nature still clings to him, and the power of the Devil is great, yet that God the Holy Ghost is with him, to Guide, Support, and Deliver him, in all his Temptations and Trials, and will remain with him so long as he is faithful and obedient to the Heavenly Voice—so long as he earnestly endeavours to fulfil the solemn Vows, Promises, and Professions, which his Baptism has laid upon him—so long as he remains a Faithful, Dutiful, and Obedient Member of the Church. And that even should he fall into Temptation and Sin, if he timely and heartily Repent, God will, for Christ's sake, pardon him, and "renew the Holy Spirit within him," so that he may be enabled to forsake his Sins, and amend his Life. The Child is also taught that when the season of Childhood is passing away, and his dangers multiply, the Bishop's hands will be laid upon him, to Confirm and increase the Gift of the Holy Spirit within him; and that then he will be admitted, from time to time, to the Holy Sacra-† Supposing a father to send forth his two sons into the world. To the first he gives a sum of money as capital, with a promise that if he makes a proper use of it, any loss which may occur shall be made up at the end of a certain number of years, and that if his general good conduct continues, all future and accidental losses, as well as all requisite additions, shall be regularly and constantly supplied from time to time. To the second son he gives no capital, nor any promises. At the end of several years, both these sons return to their father's house, both are utterly penniless, and deeply in debt. Would not every reasonable person blame the first son far more than the second? They might, indeed, with justice, censure the latter, for not having applied to his father for assistance, but they would consider the first son as entirely without excuse.

Again, would any one attempt to prove, that because the first son was now penniless, and as badly off as his brother, therefore he could not have received anything from his father? Yet this is what they do who argue that a person could not have been Regenerated in Baptism, because he afterwards falls into sin.

This example may be further used, to illustrate the conduct of those who attempt to train up Baptized persons without constant and systematic reference to the grace and gift of the Holy Spirit conferred upon them in Baptism. For instance, what would be thought of the first son, and of his advisers, if in all his plans, difficulties, and responsibilities, they took no notice whatever of the capital which his father had placed at his disposal, nor of the promise to make up any losses, and to supply additional funds when required? Would it not be thought very strange, inconsistent, and delusive, if they kept continually advising him to procure capital, instead of reminding him of that which he already possessed, and urging him to make a proper use of it? Would any sensible man of business, who had to enter into financial arrangements for these two sons, regard them in the same light, and in the same position as each other, and overlook the fact that one had ample capital, and the other had none at all?

ment of the Lord's Supper, "for the continual strengthening and refreshing of his soul, by the Body and Blood of Christ."

Now, I would ask any Christian man, or woman, who has read the foregoing pages—Is this doctrine of BAPTISMAL REGENERATION difficult to understand? Is it of small importance? Does it not, rather, concern most deeply, every Baptized man, woman, and child—the young and the old—the high and the low—the rich and the poor—the learned and the unlearned—those who teach, and those who are taught? "How shall we escape if we neglect so great a salvation?" It is, indeed, at the peril of our souls that we neglect it. As Members of the Church, we cannot build upon any other foundation than this, without involving ourselves in inconsistencies, and casting difficulties and perplexities in the way of those whom we are training, or teaching. If we tell a Baptized person of the corrupt nature with which we are all born, and say nothing of the Remedy which God has, through Christ, mercifully provided for all in Holy Baptism, he, or she, may be tempted, not only to despair, but even to complain against God, as though He required good fruit from a corrupt tree. It is because God has given His Grace in Baptism, that He requires Baptized persons to be Holy. We cannot begin to do any part of a Christian's duty, until God's Holy Spirit has been given to us: and therefore it is, that at the very moment we are made Christians, (which is at our Baptism) we receive the Holy Spirit, and we may lead a Holy Life if we follow His guidance, and make a diligent and faithful use of those Means of Grace which God has appointed for us in His Church.

Reader! When you have read, and put aside this Tract, I earnestly and affectionately entreat you—I solemnly adjure you—for your own soul's sake, and for the sake of those lambs of Christ's Fold, entrusted by Him, and for Him, to your care or influence—that you will not put aside, and neglect, the Doctrine, and the Practice, which this Tract is intended to explain and enforce. Let the eye of Faith read upon the Baptized brow:—"REGENERATE—THE TEMPLE OF THE HOLY GHOST;" and according as that Inscription appears distinct, or faint, so let your Efforts, your Example, and your Prayers, be carefully employed to preserve or restore it: and may "the God of Hope fill you with all Joy, and Peace, in Believing, that ye may abound in Hope, through the power of the Holy Ghost."

GOSPEL TRUTH, AND PRIMITIVE ECCLESIASTICAL ORDER.

SATURDAY, MAY 19, 1849.

SIXTY-FIFTH CONVENTION OF THE DIOCESE OF PENNSYLVANIA.

—The Convention was called to order by the Bishop at 5 o'clock. After the certificates of the Lay Delegates had been examined by the Secretaries, the roll was called. Fifty-three of the clergy answered to their names. Eighty-six delegates were present.

The Bishop announced that the election of Secretary was now in order, and if only one candidate was nominated, the question would be decided without a ballot.

The Rev. Dr. Ducachet nominated Mr. G. M. Wharton, and he was unanimously elected. The Rev. Mr. Odenheimer was nominated and unanimously elected Assistant Secretary.

The rules of order were then read by the Secretary, who also made the usual motions in reference to the time of meeting on each day, also inviting Clergy of other Dioceses and candidates for Holy Orders, to seats in this Convention. The Bishop then appointed the following committees:

COMMITTEE ON CHARTERS.—Rev. Dr. Bowman, Rev. Messrs. Stem and Montgomery, Judge Stroud, Judge Church, and Mr. Little.

COMMITTEE ON UNFINISHED BUSINESS.—Rev. Dr. Morgan, Rev. Messrs. Weld and Rogers.

COMMITTEE ON ELECTIONS.—Messrs. Ingersoll, Conyngham, and F. Wagner.

COMMITTEE ON THE RIGHT OF THE CLERGY TO SEATS.—Rev. Drs. Hare and Carmichael, and Rev. Mr. Nevill.

Judge Stroud presented a petition from the Lay Delegates of the Church of the Crucifixion asking for a seat, as their names had been omitted by the Secretary. The Secretary explained that he had acted in accordance with the 8th Revised Regulation, in reference to congregations of this description.

On motion of the Rev. Dr. Coleman, this petition was referred to a special committee. The motion being carried, the following committee was appointed by the Bishop,—Rev. Drs. Coleman and Morgan, and Rev. Mr. Lightner, Judge Stroud and Mr. H. Cope. On motion of Mr. E. O. Parry, the right of Mr. E. N. Lightner to a seat in the Convention, was referred to the committee on the claims of the Clergy.

The Convention adjourned to meet on Wednesday at 10 o'clock, A. M. for divine service.

WEDNESDAY MORNING.—After morning prayer, read by the Rev. Dr. Stevens, the Lessons by the Rev. Mr. Buchanan, the Bishop delivered a charge to the Clergy, the first since his consecration. The Bishop chose as the subject of his charge, Ministerial self-culture in all its branches. The foundation of this culture was stated to be SELF-KNOWLEDGE, including a just estimate of the character and position of the Minister. This able charge, which was listened to throughout with deep attention, discussed its important subject in the following aspects.

SELF-CULTURE incumbent on those who are, 1. Ministers. 2. Ministers of Religion. 3. Ministers of the Christian Religion. 4. Ministers of the Protestant Episcopal Church. 5. Ministers of this Church in the nineteenth century. 6. Ministers in the United States of America.

After the charge, the Bishop proceeded to admit the Rev. A. Beatty and the Rev. J. J. Elsegood, Deacons, to the Holy Order of the Priesthood. The former was presented by the Rev. Mr. Van Pelt, and the latter by the Rev. Mr. Stem. The Rev. Drs. Stevens and Morgan, and Messrs. Van Pelt and Stem, united in the imposition of hands.

After the administration of the Holy Communion, the Convention was called to order.

The roll was called and the minutes of the last meeting read and approved.

The Rev. Dr. Clay moved that the Committee on the claims of Clergy to seats, be instructed to report to the Convention the grounds on which the names of Messrs. B. J. Douglass, W. L. Suddards, and J. L. Kerr, were placed on the roll of Clergy entitled to seats in this Convention.

The committee appointed to consider the case of the Church of the Crucifixion, made three reports. Judge Stroud in behalf of the majority, reported in favor of admitting the Delegates of this church. The Rev. Dr. Coleman, the Chairman, reported that the admission of this church to the Convention, was contrary to the 8th Revised Regulation; he therefore appended to his report a resolution to the effect that the resolution admitting the church of the Crucifixion to union with this Convention, be hereby rescinded. The Rev. Mr. Lightner, of the same committee, made a report that, as he did not understand admission to a union with the Convention in this case gave a right to send delegates, he offered in place of Dr. Coleman's resolution one to the effect that the Delegates from the church of the Crucifixion should not be admitted to seats in this Convention.

Judge Stroud's resolution was then taken up, and pending the consideration of this the Convention adjourned.

Afternoon Session.—After the usual preliminary business, the Bishop delivered his annual Address, from which the following statistics are gleaned:

Of the whole number of Parishes in the Diocese (120) he has since the last Convention officiated in all except 13, and visited every county in the State except 7. He has also visited various other points at which there were no Parishes in connection with the Convention. He has preached at 197 different points, baptized 8 infants, solemnized 4 marriages, confirmed 737 persons, admitted 12 candidates to holy orders, ordained 10 clergymen, received 12 clergymen from other dioceses, dismissed 7 clergymen to other dioceses, and displaced 1. The whole number of clergymen in the diocese is 144; and parishes 124. Of this number 3 are without edifices, 3 others are building in connection with other denominations, 3 have unfinished buildings, and 6 are worshipping in edifices not yet consecrated. The corner stones of 4 churches had been laid by him, and 5 had been consecrated.

St. James' Church, Derry, was admitted into connection with the Convention; the Committee on Charters having reported in its favor.

The committee on Unfinished Business, made a report.

The majority and minority of the committee on the claims of clergymen, made separate reports in relation to the claim of the Rev. Edward N. Lightner, Pastor of Christ Church, Upper Merion, to a seat in the convention.

Mr. Edward Owen Parry, submitted a resolution to admit the Rev. Mr. Lightner, which he advocated.

A debate ensued, after which the resolution was negatived.

On motion the Convention then adjourned to meet at half past 8 o'clock this morning, when the appropriate services for Ascension Day will take place—after which the regular business will be proceeded with.

THE PRAYER BOOK.

The approaching festival of Whitsunday, the memorial Day of those promised gifts bestowed upon men by their ascended Lord, will bring to our minds a most precious gift with which the Church was first enriched on this day three hundred years ago. The Prayer Book, as we now have it almost unchanged, was first used in all the churches of England, A. D. 1549.

One striking fact in connection with this memorable event is the wonderful manner in which this book has passed unchanged through all the changes of so many generations. Manners, customs, laws, governments, the views and opinions of men on every subject of human thought—all these have been subject to revolutions and changes, but the Prayer Book is still the same. Many changes have been attempted, more have been suggested, but none have been accomplished. Does it not seem as if the Holy Spirit, sent to guide men into all truth, had surrounded with a rampart of fire, this rich treasure of the Church, and from its first Whitsunday publication had guarded it with ceaseless vigilance? And when we think of the many changes of opinion in Theology which have been unable to destroy or alter our sacred ritual, have we not in this a hope for the present and a promise for the future? No harm can happen to the Church as long as she holds fast to the Prayer Book. What ever may be the speculative views or the secret desires of her members practically, they must own, before God and man, the pure, primitive, scriptural teachings of the Prayer Book, or they must forsake the altars around which this incense of Prayer and Praise is offered up. All extremes must meet here, and if men only catch the spirit of this blessed book, over all their differences shall be poured the calming influence of Peace and good will.

Various plans have been suggested for improving the approaching anniversary. Pastoral letters from two of our Bishops, on this subject will be found in our columns. In our grateful offerings at this time, we should not forget to provide for the distribution of the Prayer Book itself. We have received from New York the following excellent circular:

WHITSUNDAY.

OUR BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER.

"A new commission was now addressed to the same Divines, directing them to prepare a complete collection of Divine Offices for public worship. This Commission met at Windsor, in May, 1548, and drew up a Book of Common Prayer, which was approved by convocation, and finally ratified by Act of Parliament in the ensuing January, (1549.) It was enjoined to be used for all Divine Offices from the Feast of Whitsunday following. This Prayer Book was substantially the same with that we now have, though several additions were made to it, and some parts of it altered, in succeeding revisions."—Edward Berens' History of the Prayer Book.

So then, Dear Mr. Editor, the Festival of Whitsunday of this year of our Redemption, 1849, will be the 300th Anniversary of the Book of Common Prayer. What an excellent opportunity is offered us to celebrate in a becoming manner the true Reformation from Romish bondage!

The First Book of Edward the VIth, was the first publication of a Book of Common Prayer, in which the good people of our fatherland could read the prayer of their Holy Church, every man in the tongue wherein he was born. May I ask your aid in calling upon our clergy, to prepare themselves specially for this glorious tercentennial anniversary; and as a manifestation of our devout thanksgiving to God for this excellent gift, let them propose that the offerings for that holy day be appropriated to the printing and distribution of our own Prayer Book? Especially let all New York Churchmen, and all others who recognise its claims, remember our own Bible and Common Prayer Book Society on that day.

Such an occasion, Dear Mr. Editor, will not occur again to the men of this generation. While we have opportunity let us do good, especially to them who are of the Household of Faith.

The Churchmen of Pennsylvania have societies for this good purpose which need and demand their charitable help. This will appear from the following circular.

BISHOP WHITE PRAYER BOOK SOCIETY.

The approaching Anniversary of the Bishop White Prayer Book Society, falls on the Three Hundredth Anniversary of the introduction of the first Prayer Book, in the English tongue, into the worship of the English churches.

It is an obvious duty to signalize such a commemoration, by some worthy offering. It is therefore proposed that an earnest and united effort be made by the Church and churchmen of this city, to secure such a contribution on the occasion of this Anniversary, as will make it a day long to be remembered.

The undersigned, a committee, call the attention of their brethren to the accompanying resolution, adopted at the last meeting of the Board, and they fondly hope, that on Whitsunday, the attention of all our congregations may be especially called to the collection which it is proposed to take up on the evening of Whitsun Monday, at St. Andrew's Church.

At a meeting of the Board of Managers of the Bishop White Prayer Book Society, held on the evening of the 14th inst., it was

Resolved, That if the collection to be made at the ensuing Anniversary of the Society, on Whitsun Monday, shall be sufficient to justify the expenditure, this Board will appropriate one thousand copies of the Prayer Book to each Bishop in the United States, for distribution in his Diocese."

A. POTTER,

JAMES S. NEWBOLD,

JAMES M. AERTSEN,

WM. H. NEWBOLD, Committee.

We are glad that the Board of Managers has made this appropriate change in the time of celebrating the anniversary meeting. We hope that the noble resolution of the Board to make a donation of Prayer Books to every Bishop in the Church, as a devout and grateful offering on the 300th Anniversary of the publication of the Prayer Book, will be sustained by the liberality of the Church. Let those members of the Church who cannot be present, send in their offerings for this noble purpose. And let all who are within reach come to the meeting, and let none come, on such an occasion, empty handed.

GOWNS AND SURPLICES.—The attention of the clergy is directed to the advertisement of the Misses Clark, who are, we are assured, well qualified to make gowns and surplices, and who will also perform the work on the most economical terms.

MISREPRESENTATIONS CORRECTED.

We are sorry to trouble our readers again with a subject of which we know they are weary, but as our silence only encourages further misrepresentation, we are compelled to speak once more in reply to the Calendar.

In some remarks upon the second letter of the Dean of the Faculty, (published in last week's Banner) the Calendar thus begins:—

"In reluctantly entering upon a review of this second letter of Prof. Ogilby, we must again call attention to the fact that this discussion is no choice of ours. We are dragged into this side issue, by the Professor, on a charge which the Banner of the Cross pronounced unjust to us, when it was casually made by the Episcopal Recorder."

The Calendar must either have a poor opinion of the intelligence of its readers, or it must suppose it is addressing "dream-land folk," if it supposes these assertions will be taken for truth. How the Calendar can say "this discussion is no choice of ours" we cannot imagine, unless its Editor takes a Calvinistic view of the impulses which govern his course of action.

What was the "charge" which the Calendar says dragged it into these bitter recriminations? We must quote the words of Professor Ogilby, as they seem to have passed from the convenient memory of the editor of the Calendar.

"I must add, therefore, that I have largely shared in the feeling, not only of surprise and regret, but of righteous indignation, which prevails among the students, on account of the injustice of the assumption, to which you refer in your query; that, because there is, or is supposed to be, (with this question, as irrelevant, I have nothing to do,) a 'Romanizing clique' in the neighborhood of our General Theological Seminary, therefore the students of the Seminary are so infected by it, that the labors of its able professors are rendered almost ineffectual."—[Letter to Dr. Mead.]

When did the Banner say that this charge was unjust? We here take issue with the acting editor of the Calendar upon a question easily settled. He says we said so and so. We say, we did not. And fortunately what we did say is in print and on record, and does not depend upon treacherous memory. We said it was unjust to change the title of the Calendar's article and put, instead of "Romanizing," "the General Theological Seminary." This was the injustice we found fault with in the first place. We said again (see Banner of April 14th,) "we considered it unjust to the Calendar that other papers should so pervert its meaning as to direct the whole force of its article against the Seminary." And because the editor of the Banner said thus, a Professor of the Seminary, in no way bound by our opinions, had no right, in replying to a Trustee, to charge the Calendar with saying his own words! The charge of which the Calendar so bitterly complains is quoted entirely from his own article!

While the Calendar rests all its proof upon after developments, it thinks that the Banner has no right to alter its views to accord with the changes made in this strange progress. The turn which the Calendar gave to the whole matter, as shown in our last two papers, proves that we judged too charitably of its intentions towards the Seminary. We now admit that those saw more of the real drift of his first article who gave its whole force this direction.

In the other six columns we see nothing to claim our notice but the following. The Calendar passes this judgment upon the statements of the Banner.

"If its whole course of statement were thrown into a syllogistic form, it would read somewhat in this way. If there is Romanizing it ought to be known—but the Calendar has brought out the fact that there is—therefore there is no clique, and we have been unnecessarily disturbed!"

The Calendar would adorn his triumphs in logic with trophies won by syllogistic skill. His victories may be acknowledged by all who have not read the Banner. On the other hand, how would the Calendar's statements sound in the "syllogistic form." If there is "Romanizing" it is "infecting the neighborhood of our General Theological Seminary and rendering the labors of its able Professors almost ineffectual"—But Mr. Howland's letters prove that there is "Romanizing"—Therefore Professor Ogilby is very unjust in saying that the Calendar made any direct charges against the Seminary. The Calendar goes on to say—

"Again, the Banner some time ago, concluded, that 'had it read Mr. Howland's letter before it presented its first article, it would have left the neighborhood of the Seminary to take care of itself.' This week it discovers that the letters 'betray' nobody but 'the writer,' and not him either, for that matter, and are of 'no great consequence to anybody.'"

Those who are not too near-sighted, and know the difference between singular and plural, will discover that the first opinion concerns a "letter," while the second relates to "letters."

In conclusion, we have only to state distinctly the objects we have kept steadily in view in all our articles on this unpleasant topic. Our first object has been to vindicate the General Theological Seminary of the Church against false and injurious accusations. Our second object has been to clear the Church, if possible, from a serious charge, unproved as yet, in whose truth none but her worst enemies could rejoice. On the other hand, if the Calendar can make good its accusations, we are ready to accord to it all the credit due to success in the office it has assumed.

NEWS FOR THE CHURCH.

The Pennsylvania Enquirer, in a report of the proceedings of the American Tract Society, favors us with the following information.

"Bishop Mead, (who said it was the first time he had ever attended such a meeting) Mr. Raymond, of Madison University, Rev. J. M. Stevenson, of Ohio, Dr. Poor of Ceylon, and Dr. Tyng were the speakers. Dr. T. playfully remarked that Bishop Mead was the first of the successors of St. Peter that had ever appeared on this stand, before this society, and soon he believed that the house of Bishops would pass resolutions in favor of the American Tract Society."

We take the following announcement from the last Gospel Messenger.

To serve the Church in whatever station the providence of God may place him, is the duty of each one of her members. Regretting the necessity which compels the withdrawal of the worthy brother, who has of late conducted the Messenger,—without seeking an office of so much responsibility and care,—and, actuated we trust only by the desire of being useful in the cause of Christ, we yield to the request of the friends of this paper, and accept the charge of its editorial department.

Existing arrangements, do not at present require the announcement of our views, nor make it necessary to give our name to the public.—Suffice it to say that we shall endeavor by God's help, faithfully to maintain the principles of our branch of the Church Catholic, praying that while acting as Editor, we may never forget the vows we made as Presbyter, "to be ready with all faithful diligence, to banish and drive away from the Church all erroneous and strange doctrines contrary to God's holy word," and to "maintain and set forward as much as lieth in us, quietness, peace, and love among all Christian people."

CONFESSION AS HELD BY THE ANGLICAN CHURCH, &c.—We regret that, owing to a press of matter, our editorial notice of this able pamphlet had to be set up in smaller type than usual. As this fact has led some of our readers to think that this was not an editorial article, we desire to correct such impression by stating the cause of its not appearing in the usual editorial form.

SITUATION WANTED.—Two ladies from abroad, who have for several years conducted successfully a Young Ladies' School, are anxious to obtain employment in teaching. They are willing to engage, either as governesses in a private family, or as instructors in a school. The most satisfactory Testimonials can be given. Address the Editor of the Banner.

New Publications.

LAUS DEO: A PLAIN SERVICE FOR THE EASTER AND TRINITY SEASONS.—No. 1. Published under the sanction of the Maryland Society for the improvement of Church Architecture and Music. New York: D. Appleton & Co. Philadelphia: Geo. S. Appleton.

This is a well printed and judiciously selected collection, intended to improve the solemn worship of the Church. The idea of providing music appropriate to the holy seasons of the Church is most proper. We like also the name of a "Plain Service." As our organs and choirs are put over the heads of the congregation, so the great ambition seems to be to find such varied and difficult music that the people of God cannot praise Him in the sanctuary unless they have been trained to the Opera. It is little short of ludicrous to hear a trained Choir expressing, in some tune filled with most difficult passages, the devout wish, "Let the people praise Thee, O God, yea, let all the people praise Thee."

We rejoice to see every attempt made to reform the abuses, neither few nor small, in this part of worship. The object of the present publication is so well expressed in the Preface, that we cannot do better than give this to our readers.

PREFACE.—This first number of a Series of Plain Services, undertaken at the request of "The Society for the Promotion of Architecture and Church Music in the Diocese of Maryland," is respectfully offered to the consideration of parish ministers and others interested in the subject, in the hope that it may satisfy, to some extent, a want long felt, of a uniform and congruous Service-Book, simple in its character, and yet church-like, and adapted to the public worship of Almighty God. With several festival modifications, we have two divisions of the year in which there should be the greatest diversity in the character of the music; viz. from Ash Wednesday to Easter, and from Easter again to Lent, with the exception of the Advent Season, in which it should coincide with that of Lent. The character of the music of the Church, it will not be denied, should correspond with the tone of thought suggested by each season; and even if the Canticles are the same, still the one great idea of the season should make itself felt through the vehicle which carries it and gives it utterance. If this be not so, then our Lenten service is a discordant mixture of the jubilant and despondent, which fails to embody the feelings awakened in the soul by the contemplation of the great deeds enacted or represented at that period. Yet there are few but have heard the deprecatory notes of "Deus misereatur" on Trinity Sunday, and even on Easter-day; and, on the contrary, "Venite exultemus" shouted with loud acclaim to Boyce's chant in D on Ash-Wednesday.

Yet the Church gives full authority to the minister to order the music to be used in the congregation under his charge: and that the mal-adaptation above adverted to is common, is proof that he has delegated his power to those who are incompetent to its proper discharge. In fact, very many of our choirs are composed of those who prefer full, jubilant music to the proprieties of the sacred seasons, and who would sing "Benedic, anima mea" in Lent, because the music appended to it is more pleasing to their taste than that of plaintive "Deus misereatur."

Now it is the object of this publication, by simple and appropriate music, to mark sufficiently the change of the seasons in our Ecclesiastical Year: and the regular hearing and singing, each in its proper time, of these old church tunes, it is hoped, may bring back that which has been culpably lost—congregational singing. It is proposed to complete this work in four numbers; viz. one for Advent and Lent; a second for the Nativity; and a third for Easter and Trinity. For large congregations, where music has been more cultivated, a fourth number will be added, containing an Anthem Service for high-days, with Versicles, Litany, and Communion services complete. And thus, from a simple yet regular and devotional service we can rise to the full capacity of the art; and furnish a mode in which all, both cultivated and uncultivated, can worship God "in the beauty of holiness."

The music of this first number, with the exception of that of the Te Deum, is selected from well-known English Chants, some of which have been used in the Church for more than two centuries. But one tune has been appended to each Canticle, because one was considered sufficient for the season; and because the frequent change of the music has, as it ever will, prevent the congregation from joining in that part of the service which is theirs by right. With these remarks, the compiler commits this number to the judgment of those for whose use it was prepared.

REMAINS OF WILLIAM S. GRAHAM. WITH A MEMOIR. Edited by GEORGE ALLEN, Professor of Languages in the University of Pennsylvania. Philadelphia: J. W. Moore, 193 Chesnut street. 1849.

This is a most attractive book in outward form, and the interest of its contents, in our esteem, does justice to its external appearance. It is the fresh wreath which love and friendship have intertwined to hang over the early grave of genius. It is not the mere record of a bright and sparkling mind, whose light has expired, but it is the memorial also of a warm heart, earnest in its devotion to the service of God and the good of man.

Mr. Graham's life, though brief, was a useful one, and we think the Memoir not only most interesting, but most profitable. It is written in a pure and simple style, and shows that a classic taste has, at least, carefully revised it. We think this Memoir affords a most useful example to young men. Mr. Graham, although gifted with a highly imaginative and speculative mind, devoted all its energies to practical uses, and fulfilled, with singular faithfulness, all the duties of life. The few Remains given of his poetry glow with the light and warmth of the purest affections. And they show no common order of genius. Yet he gave himself up to the great work of instruction, and was a most laborious and successful teacher.

There are several passages in the Memoir we would like to quote—at present we must content ourselves with the following. The depth of his religious feeling was not suspected, until his father, an eminent Presbyterian Minister, "going into the stable one morning, found hid in the rack the following paper."

RULES TO GOVERN MY CONDUCT.—In the morning when I awake, having silently returned thanks to the Lord for my preservation through the night, and asked him in mercy to keep me from all evil through the day, I will rise, and having washed myself and done my work, I will return to my room and read a chapter in the Bible, and contemplate the truths therein contained; then kneeling down I will pray to my Father who seeth in secret, believing that I shall be rewarded openly.

I will then address myself to my lesson, and endeavour never to go to school in the morning until I know it perfectly, and having eaten my breakfast, I will go to school.

In the evening, when I return from school, I will immediately attend to my work and then retire to my room, where, if it be light enough, I will read a chapter in the Testament, (and if not, omit it,) and having considered its meaning, I will think over all I have done this day, and pray for pardon wherein I have erred, and grace to enable me to do so no more. Having finished my prayer, I will join my studies. If supper be ready when I come home, I will defer these duties, or rather privileges, until after it.

At noon—I will read a chapter in the Testament, and if an opportunity offers, I will kneel down to prayer, but if not, I must be content to pray in my heart.

Towards my teachers and fellow-scholars, I will endeavour to be kind and obliging—obeying the former—assisting the latter. As to stealing—never to take the least that is not my own without permission.

As to lying—never to deceive in any way.

As to fighting, to yield rather than quarrel, and to forgive a injury.

As to respect to superiors—to obey without murmuring.
Finally—to avoid all known sin—to perform all known duty—having sinned, to pray for pardon, and resolve to be more cautious in future.

May God enable me to perform each of these resolutions for Christ's sake. When circumstances will not permit their literal fulfilment, I will ask myself how God would have me do, and act accordingly.

These rules were written by him when a school-boy. Agreeing with these, we have the following incident:

A short period after the date of these "Rules," in company with a younger brother, William applied for admission as a member of the church of which his father was pastor. The occurrence is thus related by his uncle. "The elder Mr. Graham being absent, the Session, after the usual form, propounded several questions to the youths before them, in reference to their religious impressions and experience, which were answered clearly and definitely. Objection being made, however, upon the score of their extreme youth, they were informed that their admission was postponed for a year, as they were then too young. With a timid glance and faltering voice William inquired, 'Are we too young to die?' 'No,' was the reply. 'If, then,' he rejoined, 'within the next twelve months we are called to appear before the bar of God, and the question is asked, Have you partaken of the body and blood of the Lord? upon whom shall the blame be laid?' There was no response to the query, but pleased with the spirit and thoughtfulness evinced, after further deliberation the Session admitted them."

We need only add that his brief but useful life, and his early but happy death, were such as we might expect from one who carried out the principles here laid down.

From English Church Papers.

The papers received by the last steamer are chiefly occupied with questions of local interest. We copy from the English Churchman the following

SUMMARY OF GENERAL INTELLIGENCE.

The French are busy electioneering. Some think there will be a Republican majority; others that the new election will strengthen the Legitimists. Most likely it is a leap in the dark. At all events the present mongrel system cannot last.

The French expedition sailed from Marseilles on Sunday last for Civita Vecchia. The Envoy of the Roman Republic protested against it. It is certainly strange for a Republican Government to restore a Monarch to his throne. What would be said if England were to seize upon Calais, and attempt to restore Louis Philippe? Yet it would be difficult to show that we have not as much right to do that as the French Republic has to seize upon Civita Vecchia, and restore the Pope. To add to our surprise, M. Golovine, a Russian Refugee, who had always remained unmolested by Louis Philippe, has been ordered to leave France by the President. This looks as if France and Russia were not on the worst possible terms, and bodes no good to Turkey. The treaty of Tilsit may be acted over again.

The Danes are blockading the German ports, and seizing the German merchant vessels. The Germans, on their part, are sending large masses of troops into the Duchies, and will no doubt take possession of Jutland. Yet the war is not popular, and it is to be hoped that a pacification will soon be effected.

Twenty-eight of the smaller German States have agreed that the King of Prussia shall be Emperor of Germany. It is said that Frederick William will accept the Imperial Crown, on condition that the Constitution shall be suspended till after its revision.

The Austrians have been defeated at Pesth by the Hungarians, who have also taken the stronghold of St. Thomas, in Servia. The Austrian fleet, which was preparing to blockade Venice, is itself blockaded in Pirano by the Sardinian fleet, commanded by Admiral Albini.

The Austrians demand from Piedmont 8,000,000 sterling as an indemnity for the expenses of the late war, and the occupation of Alessandria until the money is paid. This will lead to disputes; and the French are already preparing to interfere.

It is said that the Grand Duke of Tuscany has been restored, and that the Sicilians have retaken Catania.

In Spain, the Government troops have captured Marsal, but Cabrera still keeps the field.

Russia is now going to take possession of European Turkey. With Prussia involved in the Danish war, Austria hampered with the Hungarians, and France involved in Italy, what is to prevent the Czar from accomplishing his long-cherished schemes? Clearly not England, with my Lord Palmerston at the Foreign Office. The Turks are evidently preparing for their last struggle; and, most likely, Palæologus and Mahomet the Second will be acted over again the reverse way. The only chance for the Turks is an insurrection in Poland, which would keep the Russians employed at home.

IRELAND.

Dublin, April 24th.—The deaths by starvation are hourly increasing, and there is a lamentable want of preparation to meet the next two months. The private accounts from the west are most harrowing, and the misery of the lower classes is shown by the number of paupers that assail a person for alms in the neighbourhood even of this city. The famished look of these beggars, and their wretched rags, tell too plain a tale of abject wretchedness. In this state of things men are most anxious to have the Rate in Aid Act passed as soon as possible, now that the principle has been affirmed by the House of Commons.

If I aim at the real spiritual improvement of those with whom I converse, I shall never say anything to irritate or vex them, but keep a constant guard upon myself; and if it shall please God to work mightily upon this passionate, haughty spirit of mine, be gentle towards all men, notwithstanding the greatest provocations.

MISSIONARY COLLECTIONS ON WHITSUNDAY.

MR. EDITOR:

Some time since it was suggested to the Anglican Church by one of its bishops, to make, on the approaching tercentenary anniversary of the establishment of the Prayer Book, a grand Missionary effort. To signify our gratitude to Almighty God for this great work, and to have a just acknowledgment of His mercy, how could we do it better than in making a general and united effort for the further spreading of His gospel, in the yet numerous and desolate wilds of heathenism abroad and infidelity at home. And if the Mother Church expresses her feelings on the occasion, why cannot the Daughter Church? Are we not the same in all "essential points of doctrine, discipline, and worship," and have we not the same attachment to the Prayer Book? Is not the obligation to praise God as much on us as on the Church of England? The duty rests upon us, individually as well as publicly, and as yet nothing has been done by us to obey it. It is not too late.

It has been proposed to raise a collection all over our land for California Missions, it is true, but that is only for one part; why is there not a proposition for the whole? Our missions and missionaries are suffering; unless an undivided effort is made they will suffer still more, if not to utter loss. Our Church has been singularly lethargic in the matter; we must make up for lost time, and let us do it now on this great occasion. Both the Foreign and Domestic Committees are very backward in their payments; they have appealed over and over again, and they can get only a temporary release from their difficulties; the reason evidently is owing (at least in a great measure) to their having been left to do the work alone and without much aid, from those who should give them assistance in the work of demand on the charities of Churchmen; and now is the "occasion to make a great, simultaneous, and universal effort" for deliverance from their difficulties, and to place their operations on a firm and solid foundation.

The Board of Missions proposes the foundation of two bishoprics, one in Africa, the other in California; but increasing liabilities is not helping old ones; and we had much better take the advice of Bishop Kemper, who suggests a circular from the Board "imploping collections on that day, to enable you to fulfil all your pledges, and thus be entirely out of debt, at the Annual meeting." I repeat again, it is not too late; let us unite and do what we can in this cause for the glory of Him who gives us the opportunity.

Respectfully, yours,

M. H. T.

REV. AND DEAR MR. EDITOR:

The annexed communication may perhaps not inappropriately follow the lines entitled "Burial on Easter Even," which have just been received in the "Banner." Although somewhat out of date, the subject can never be untimely.

EASTER EVEN THOUGHTS.

"That through death he might . . . deliver them, who through fear of death were all their lifetime subject to bondage." Heb. ii. 14th and 15th.

And still through lack of faith we refuse to avail ourselves of this deliverance, and remain subject to this bondage. Still the very mention of the "grave and gate of death"—the portal which leads to "our joyful resurrection"—too often brings a shadow even to the Christian's brow. The whole scope of our lives, the whole tenor of our phraseology, indicate that this fear is yet unconquered—that the soul yet trembles under this bondage.

That it is "a dread, an awful thing to die," is a truth too deeply engraven in the heart to be denied; and he is far more to be pitied than to be envied, who regards death with indifference, on any other ground than faith in Him who has robbed it of its sting and "brought life and immortality to light." And as for this faith, it would be vain perhaps to attempt in this connection to reason with, or to condemn, the manifestation (but one amongst many) of its weakness in those by whom it is received and professed. Yet it may be that false views of life and eternity—it may be that mistaken efforts to soothe and console—may sometimes tend to aid even the imperfection of faith. It may be that the attempt to reconcile the spirit to the loss of life by representing it in darker colours than truth demands, or experience confirms, may seem hollow and unreal, especially at a time, when all that was harsh seems softened and all that was fair seems brightened, as life itself recedes from possession. It may be that vague and unauthorized conceptions of heavenly joys, as something entirely distinct and apart—not only in their extent, but in their essence and character—from all human experience;—as if human affections, human sympathies, human tastes, however purified and hallowed by religion, should perish with the body, to bear no part in its joyful resurrection;—it may be that these may rob the soul of some portion of the light of hope, by leaving it to struggle with the fear of a lost identity.

But we pause in reverence at the threshold of the sacred theme. It is not for the vision of eyes that see "through a glass" darkened with the breath of earthly cares and earthly affections, to transcend these holy portals: and we dare not theorize on those unspeakable things, "which it is not lawful for a man to utter." Yet he who has enjoyed the privilege (and a most inestimable privilege it may be) of entering as it were into the very "valley of the shadow of death"—of lying for weeks, or months, in daily expectation of the Master's call—with the mind unimpaired and active amidst corporeal decay and helplessness—such a one will naturally bend a more earnest, if not a clearer gaze, towards the unfathomable mysteries of immortality. If aught can tend to heighten the intensity of such views at such a time, it is to lie far from home and friends, in a foreign and heathen land, with no familiar sight or sound, to win back the heart or divert the mind by the associations of earth. It was under such influences that the following fragment was dictated—a faint and poor attempt to give expression to the deep and glowing thoughts that prompted it. The hand that traced the words, at the bidding of lips almost too feeble to give them utterance, has long rested from its labours. The gentle spirit, who amidst the cares and duties of the life of a missionary and a wife, then sympathized with the sufferings and cheered the solitude of a prostrate and seemingly dying stranger, has gone as we humbly trust, to realize for herself the joyous truths of immortality. To the writer, the lines that follow possess an added interest from their association with her memory. If they tend to fling one ray of cheerful light upon any spirit shadowed by the "fear of death," it will fully accomplish his present purpose and wish.

"This bright—this beautiful—this joy-giving world."

Beautiful indeed. Beautiful is the green and fragrant earth—the vast and solemn sea—the deep mysterious sky.

Beautiful is Nature, with all her genial influences:—the song of birds—the perfume of flowers—the gush of glad waters—the breath of the summer air—the hues of sunset—the sighing of Autumn winds through groves of fine old trees.

Beautiful is life, with all its cherished associations. Sweet is the social circle—pleasant the kindly greeting of an old familiar face—dear the treasured memory of mutual joy.

Beautiful are the inspirations of genius: the breathing thoughts of eloquence—the bright dreams of poetry.

And dearer than all to the heart of youth is the light of Love, Love, which gives new lustre to the spirit within—new loveliness to the world without. Love, which imparts to the voiceless and inanimate things of Nature a music and a life, that murmurs in every wave, trembles in every leaf, and glows in every star.

O yes—this is indeed 'a bright, a beautiful, a joy-giving world.'

If then this world and this life—deformed, defiled, embittered, as they are, by sin and by sorrow—be still so fair and so sweet—what must it be to drink the pure water of the river of Life, in that world where sin and sorrow are unknown, where no unclean thing has ever entered, and where dwell none but pure and purified spirits?

If the glimpses of truth and beauty revealed in the bright flashes of human genius, beclouded and bedimmed as it is by the mists of sense, be still so glorious—what must it be to enter within the veil, that shrouds those sacred and sublime mysteries, which no eye hath seen, no ear hath heard, no imagination hath conceived?

If the love of an earthly object can invest the hues of human life with such enchantment—O think what bliss may be bestowed by that love, which is without height, or depth, or length, or breadth—which knows no change—no chill—no end!

DUTIES OF A DEACON.

REV. MR. EDITOR:—

It is a duty of a Deacon "to read Holy Scriptures in the Church." Should not then the Deacon be the only reader of the Lessons, when he is attached to a Parish, and when present at Divine Service?

It is another duty of a Deacon "to instruct the youth in the Catechism." Is it right then that this important duty should be omitted?

By inserting these suggestions you will oblige,

M. Y.

May 10th, 1849.

[To the above we have only to answer, that it is the duty of a Deacon, when "attached to a Parish" which has a Rector, to discharge such duties as may be desired by his Rector. The Church gives her Deacons liberty, not authority, to read Holy Scriptures. Surely no Rector would desire the aid of a Deacon if his presence took from the Presbyter the privileges of reading Holy Scripture to his people and of "instructing the youth in the Catechism." A Deacon has always the power to detach himself from a Parish in which his privileges are not duly regarded.]

For the Banner of the Cross.

MR. EDITOR:—

As it would appear from a minute of the House of Bishops of 1808, (composed of Bishops White and Clagget, and other canonists of note,) that the 141 Canons of the English Church, are binding on the daughter Church, excepting where Political changes may have cancelled some of their provisions; as it regards the Church in this country, permit me to inculcate through your columns, a more respectful and devotional manner in Church by quoting "the 18th canon of 1603, in the Church of England," in these words:

"In the time of divine service and of every part thereof, all due reverence is to be used; for it is according to the Apostle's rule. Let all things be done decently and according to order; answerable to which decency and order, we judge these our directions following: No man shall cover his head in the church or chapel in the time of Divine service, except he have some infirmity; in which case, let him wear a night cap or wig. All persons then present shall severally kneel on their knees, when the general Confession, Litany, and other prayers are read; and shall stand up in the saying of the Belief, according to the rules in that behalf prescribed in the Book of Common Prayer; and likewise when in time of divine service, the Lord Jesus shall be mentioned, due and lowly reverence shall be made by all persons present, as it hath been accustomed; testifying by these outward ceremonies and gestures, their inward humility, Christian resolution, and due acknowledgment that the Lord Jesus Christ, the Eternal Son of God, is the only Saviour of the world, in whom alone all the mercies, graces and promises of God, to mankind, for this life, and the life to come, are fully and wholly comprised. None, either man, woman or child, of what calling soever, shall be otherwise at such times busied in the church, than in quiet attendance to hear, mark, and understand, that which is read, preached or ministered: saying in their due places audibly, with the minister, the Confession, the Lord's Prayer and the Creed; and make such other answers to the public prayers, as are appointed in the Book of Common Prayer; neither shall they disturb the service, or sermon, by walking or talking or any other way; nor depart out of the church during the time of service or sermon, without some urgent or reasonable cause."

CONSTANTINOPLE.

REPORT OF RT. REV. HORATIO SOUTHGATE.

EXTRACTS FROM JOURNAL.

July 31st.—It has often been my lot to be concerned in efforts for rescuing Mohammedans, who, from force or other sinister influences, had abandoned Christianity, and wished to be released from the false religion which they had ostensibly, but not in heart, embraced. Some time ago, while walking through the city, a young man of very prepossessing appearance, accosted me, and asked me if I remembered him. I did not,—he was an entire stranger to me. He then reminded me of one "John," whom I had rescued from Mohammedanism several years before, and whom, to avoid the search made for him, I had sent out of the country. He was the man,—then, at the time of his escape, but a boy, whom no one would suspect of being the same with the manly, open-faced youth, who now stood before me. I was delighted to see him, for I had not heard a word from him since the dark night when I put into his hand a few dollars, collected chiefly from friends who aided in the matter, and sent him on board the brig whose captain had promised to receive him. I was glad to hear that his life had been prosperous, and that, after various wanderings, by land and by sea, he had returned home in safety, having heard that those who had abandoned Mohammedanism now, did so with impunity. His safety, however, rested more in his change of appearance than in the famous concession made to England and France in 1844; for that concession, however sincerely made by the Turkish Government, and especially by the Sultan, whose private sentiments were undoubtedly justly represented by it, was yet too obviously opposed to Mohammedan laws to allow of its being carried out faithfully, and in all instances. It was, however, a concession which can be made binding whenever insisted upon, and has been effectual in several cases, in which I have since been interested. It reflects great honor upon the governments which demanded it, and especially upon the ambassadors, by whose skilful management it was finally obtained. It will be of use in all time to come, and may yet be the turning-point of a complete revolution in Mohammedan law on the subject of secessions.

I have been led to these thoughts by an event which occurred to-day. A man from the city came to see me with letters from a friend, representing that he was in danger on account of a member of his family having become a Mussulman, and another being demanded of him. The case was this: An Armenian, poor, but of decent position, and so far as I could learn, of good character, had an abandoned son of about 18, who had some two months before become a Mussulman, apparently without any motive beyond his hope of improving his condition, which it was said he had done. He had married, a few months previously, with a girl of 16. Immediately upon his conversion to Mohammedanism, he went to his father's house and demanded his wife; they had been living there together. But it had so happened that upon the very day of his conversion, while he was confined at a certain Mosque with the effects of his circumcision, she had been taken away by her friends, to save her from following his example, as she might, by affection or fear, be led to do. The young man demanded her of his father, with whom he had left her; but he knew nothing of her, further than she had quit his house. The son complained to the authorities: they brought the man before them, and demanded the girl; he could not, of course, bring her forward; he declined to be responsible for her; but they told him that they held him so, and gave him four days in which to find her. The son had already given the father so much annoyance that for fifty days he had been afraid to go to his daily work, and his family were suffering in consequence. He now came to me, having been to his Patriarch, who recommended that course, and who procured for him letters to me, from one of the principal laymen of the nation, representing the case.

It was now ascertained that the girl was in a certain house, in a village, near the city, having been secreted there by her friends. I was assured that she had no desire to follow her husband; but that being young, if she were brought before the Mohammedan authorities, she might, by intimidation, be induced to do so. I therefore proposed that she should be brought to my house, for the purpose of ascertaining her wishes upon the subject. If she desired to become a Mohammedan, no force could be used to prevent her. If she wished to remain a Christian, no force should be allowed to compel her otherwise.

This is the arrangement I made with the father; and for himself it was added, that as soon as his daughter-in-law should reach my house, he might inform the authorities where she was, and I would negotiate the matter with them. The business succeeded thus far; but the difficulty was to induce the friends of the girl to give her up. This they refused to do, though I obtained the agency of one of the most influential men of her nation, who sent his carriage to convey her privately to my house. Where she now was, was an asylum no longer than it might be kept secret from her husband; but in my house she would be safe, at least from all compulsory measures. Her friends, however, depended upon keeping her out of sight, and the poor father-in-law was obliged to bear the indignities offered by his son, and the demands of the authorities, without being able to rescue himself. He might, indeed, have done this at once, by telling where his daughter now was, but this he steadily refused to do, saying that the consequence might be that she would be intimidated or allured into Islamism, and this would be a sin which he would not lay upon his soul.

to suffer. Many other things relating to the matter transpired, which it is unnecessary here to relate; but after two or three weeks from the date of the present extract, the wife of the afflicted man appeared at my house, and besought me with many tears, to rescue him; informing me that, while at church that morning, some officers of justice were at the door, waiting to arrest him, and that he had escaped by a back passage; that he was now in his house, which he had not dared to leave, (excepting to steal to church in the morning,) for many days; that his family were suffering from want of food and clothing; and that they would be utterly ruined unless some relief were found for him, that he might return to his daily work. She brought testimony to the truth of her story, from the lay-superintendent of her church, and from one who accompanied her to my house. After reflecting upon the state of the case, it seemed to me that an act of moral courage was necessary from the man; that, as he had not been arrested, it was difficult to prove that any evil intentions existed against him; there had been, as yet, no formal ground of complaint; the man had been threatened, but had not been seized. I advised him, therefore, to go freely forth to his work, and, if he were molested, I would do all in my power for his rescue. I wrote in the same sense to the principal men of the quarter where he lived, and allowed him and them to say, if his seizure were attempted, that there would be interference for his release. Happily this was not necessary. The man took the advice; the matter was abandoned by those who had troubled him, his family were restored to their quiet, and he to his work, without any farther molestation; but the girl remained, and may remain for years, secreted from her husband; from this I fear there is no relief which will effectually secure her from being tampered with, and intimidated into a following of her husband's example. The social state here allows many private evils, which are never known in public, and which are ordinarily beyond the reach of political concessions and diplomatic investigations.

Such was one which is at this moment in my mind, and of which I was last winter an eye-witness. A poor Christian was engaged in some humble occupation connected with the building of a house, near to which was a stable containing the horses of one of the principal Turks of the Empire. He had occasion, one night about ten o'clock, to go into the stable to light a candle. The hostlers, who were all Mussulmans, were fast asleep. He lighted his candle, and was about withdrawing, when one of the hostlers awoke, and wanted to know who he was. He told the reason of his coming in, but the man was not satisfied. The others awoke, and set upon the poor fellow, charging him with a design to steal. It was in vain that he expostulated and begged. They tied him to a post, and beat him so unmercifully that he was left as dead. He remained there in the filth of the stable during the night. The next morning, they took him up, carried him to an out-house, and there threw him down on the cold, damp ground. The building was open to the outer air, the weather was cold, the season was winter. He lay there six days unnoticed by any one, excepting some humble companions of his, of the same class with himself. They brought him food of the coarsest kind, unfit for a man in his state; but the best they had to offer. He was unable to sit up, from some terrible wound inflicted upon his back. On the seventh day I was near the spot, and one said to me that a man was dying in that out-house. I went in, and found him apparently in his last agonies. His hands were clenched, his teeth firmly set together, his eyes fixed and glassy, his whole person covered with filth and almost naked, his mouth and nostrils filled with the dung, in the midst of which he lay. I asked him some questions, but he could give me no answer; and seemed not to notice me. After inquiring of his comrades, I determined to give him some brandy, in hope of reviving him. We did so by forcing open his mouth, and pouring it down his throat. He revived a little, his arm moved, and his head slightly turned. The only hope of saving him seemed to be in sending him to the hospital. We obtained a carriage in which he could lie at full length, prepared a bed for him in it, wrapped a comforter around him, and laid him in. He was taken to the hospital, where every attention was shown him, but he died in two days.

On inquiring of the people around who attended him, and who were all poor Christians, why the case had not been made known, and why the crime had not been complained of, they said that they were afraid to speak of it, for the perpetrators were Mussulmans, and their masterful. Whether he would, or not, in this instance, have visited his servants with the punishment that they deserved, I cannot say. But that this want of justice towards Christians, because they are Christians, is too frequent, my own eyes have often and painfully witnessed. That it is difficult to procure justice against a Mussulman, the accuser being a Christian, is true all over the country. Otherwise these poor people would not have shrunk from making the matter known. Nay, they feared being maltreated if they should attempt it; and it was in deference to their wishes, that I myself said nothing about it. They feared lest some greater evil should come upon them, though a show of justice, at least, could have been obtained upon any respectable interference. But in all probability it would have stopped there, and I do not believe it would have been possible to have obtained real justice, and its real execution, in this case. At least, it has not been in numberless instances with which I have been conversant. The evil is not in the central government—certainly not in the designs of the present Sultan, who is undoubtedly sincere in his wish to abate such inequalities of justice; but in long habits of difference, in Mohammedan institutions, in the very laws, which no Sultan can forcibly change without overturning the foundation of the religion, and, with that, the foundation of his own throne, which is inseparably connected with the religion.

But though the thought, that God is love, and has his eye always upon us for good, has happiness in it far beyond any other, or any different schemes and imaginations of our own, still in the main, it is but a glimpse of it. And it must also be acknowledged, that such a disposition of acquiescence and complacency in the divine disposals is not easy to attain; especially, as the corrupt state we are in, necessarily requires that it should be penal or corrective; and in order to that end, that we should receive evil from the hands of God as well as good. If this difficulty seems great to us, and keeps our minds in suspense concerning the universal goodness of providence, we have help at hand. There is one instance in which the love of God shines forth in all its glory, cannot possibly be mistaken, and is a full solution of all our difficulties: what I mean, is the gift of his Son, and the grace of redemption by Jesus Christ.—REV. THOMAS ADAM.

PSALM XXII. 28th verse. "For the kingdom is the Lord's; and he is the governor among the people."

The state mentioned in the text, is that in which the soul, knowing itself to be the creature of God, and subject to his universal dominion and sovereignty; consents to receive a law from him, and submit to his government; in the belief and acknowledgment, that as he has an absolute right to govern us, so he cannot but do it in the best manner for his glory and our own good.

And when this becomes the ruling habit and temper of our minds, and the settled purpose of our hearts, our obedience will likewise be full and unreserved; and for the same reason that we obey God at one time, or in one instance, we shall think ourselves bound to obey him at all times and in every thing he has commanded, or we know is agreeable to his will. There must be no exceptions to it, and the obedient man makes none. Whatever God is pleased to order for him in the course of his providence, whether it be prosperity or adversity, sickness or health, life or death; whatever he enjoins in his word, and however contrary it may be to his inclinations, sense, or opinions, he is set down in this belief once for all, that God's will must take place, and therefore frames himself to a quiet, cheerful submission to it. For if we should object to any thing he does to us, or commands us to do, and plead difficulties when we should be resigned and obedient; what would this be but prescribing a law to him, instead of receiving one at his hands, choosing for ourselves, and, upon the whole, withdrawing ourselves from his government? Not but that in most cases, our duty is so plain and evident to ourselves, that we cannot act against it without being knowingly false to our own interest and doing violence to our reason and conscience. But let this be as it may, whenever the will of God is made known to us, our road is before us with a clear light shining upon it from heaven; our duty is bound upon us, our obedience is demanded, the kingdom is the Lord's, the heart of man must submit.—REV. THOMAS ADAM.

Obituary.

DIED, at Vicksburg, Mississippi, on Sunday morning, April 1st, Miss LUCY S. CLARK, of Talbot County, Maryland, in the 21st year of her age.

The circumstances attending the decease of this young lady have excited a very general interest in the community among whom she died. She left her native place last fall, to spend the winter in the South with some near relatives who reside there. At that time she was thought to be in perfect health, although her strength and spirits had been severely taxed by long attendance on her mother who had recently been taken away by consumption. But the seeds of death were no doubt lurking in the daughter. She took a slight cold on her journey, and was never quite well afterwards. Those who became acquainted with her when in comparative health, were much struck with her interesting face, her quiet good sense, and her gentle manners. But it was only on the bed of sickness that all the beauty and fortitude of that young Christian's character were brought to light. Wasting away by a rapid consumption, she was never known to utter a complaint. She was always fearful of giving trouble, and grateful for the slightest service. It was the power of Faith that sustained her in that sweet composure. Her piety was of such a character as we rarely see beyond the limits of the Church. It was deep, yet calm; confident, but not exulting. She was indeed full of "a reasonable, religious and holy hope." Though not disposed to make her religious feelings the subject of conversation with all persons, she spoke most fully and freely to the clergymen who saw her, of her trust in the Lord Jesus only. She asked often for the Church's Prayers, and shortly before her death received the Holy Communion from the Rev. Mr. Patterson, the Rector of the Parish, myself assisting. Partly perhaps from self-distrust, and partly from want of opportunity, she had not partaken of the Eucharist before; but she had been confirmed last spring by Bp. Whittingham, and long enjoyed the sound teaching of Dr. Mason at her home in Easton.

The writer of this notice first saw the deceased on the 16th of March, the day after he had followed to the grave a beloved child whom Christ had taken, under circumstances so similar in many points to those of Miss C. that his heart was touched by the resemblance.

Although Mr. Patterson had before visited her, she sent for me, because she wished to see a clergyman from Maryland. My coming seemed to revive strongly in her the thoughts of home. She spoke feelingly of her departed mother, of her church, her pastor, and her bishop. I saw her and had prayers with her daily until she was too weak to bear it. Her fondness for the Lord's Prayer was very striking. She repeated it always, slowly yet distinctly, when her voice was almost too feeble to be heard; and in her last agonies, when she could not speak, her attendants could see from the movement of her lips that she was occupied with its blessed words. A large concourse attended her funeral, and listened with deep interest to some very appropriate remarks from the Rev. Mr. Patterson. She was buried on a bright April morning, and I saw the earth heaped over her quiet grave in the same burial-ground where my own children await the Resurrection. The grass and flowers of a Southern Spring are now far advanced there. I love the spot for its natural beauties, and because it contains the ashes of my own dead; but a new interest is added to its associations derived from the memory of that Christian maiden who now sleeps there in a stranger's grave.

Wednesday, 30th, Milford, (Convention.)

PENNSYLVANIA.

At the request of the Bishop we republish the following prayer to be used in the congregations of this diocese, while the disease called Asiatic Cholera is impending, and which is put forth in conformity with Canon XLVII, of 1832, of the General Convention of the P. E. Church in the United States.

PRAYER.

O God, with whom are the issues of life and death, to whom it justly belongeth to punish sinners, and to be merciful to them that truly repent; save us, we humbly beseech thee, from the ravages of that pestilence with which we are threatened. We have provoked thy righteous judgments by our manifold transgressions and hardness of heart, and though we should utterly perish, our punishment would be less than our sins deserve. But, O God, who desirest not the death of a sinner, but rather that he should turn from his wickedness and live, have pity upon us, thy unworthy creatures, and grant that we, repenting of our iniquities and forsaking our sins, may experience thy forgiving and protecting grace. As thou didst deliver thy people of old when they turned to thee from their rebellion, and didst cause thy destroying angel to cease from punishing, so turn thine anger from us, who meekly acknowledge our vileness, and truly repent us of our sins. Spare those who are now suffering from this grievous sickness, restore the voice of joy and health to their dwellings; and grant that all who shall taste thy forbearing mercy may devote their souls and bodies a living sacrifice to thee, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

NEW JERSEY.

On the Ascension Day, 17th May, the Bishop consecrated the Church of the Ascension, in Gloucester city. The request to consecrate was read by the Minister, the Rev. Mr. Labagh, Morning Prayer by the Rev. Messrs. Harrold and Boggs, and the Sentence of Consecration by the Rev. Mr. Mackie. The Bishop preached, and administered the Holy Communion.

From Church Papers.

NEW YORK.

THE CHURCH OF THE TRANSFIGURATION, NEW YORK.—It is with the sincerest pleasure that we have to record the formation of another parish, under very promising auspices, in the upper part of this rapidly growing city. A brief statement of the facts will not, we trust, be unacceptable to our readers.

With the view of organizing this parish, the regular services were commenced on the first Sunday, afternoon, of October, 1848, in a room on 24th Street, between Lexington and Fourth Avenues.

On Monday, February 12th, 1849, agreeably to the usual notice provided in such cases, the male persons of full age of the congregation, which had been collected, met for the purpose of incorporating themselves, and electing two Church Wardens and eight Vestrymen.

At a vestry meeting, held February 26th, 1849, the Rev. George H. Houghton, by whom the services had been conducted from the beginning, was unanimously elected Rector of the Church.

Within a few weeks, the Vestry have purchased three lots of ground in Twenty-ninth Street, between Madison and Fifth Avenues, for the location of the Church building. The situation, in a few years, cannot but become one of the most desirable and pleasant in the city. It is central, easy of access, lying near the Harlem rail-road; at a considerable distance from other churches, the "Holy Apostles" being situated in the 9th Avenue, and "St. John the Baptist" on 38th Street and Lexington Avenue, and will be surrounded chiefly by private residences, and that at no distant day.

The vestry have contracted for the immediate erection of a temporary chapel, from a plan furnished by Frank Wills, Esq., Architect. It will consist of a Nave and Chancel, 76 feet in length, by about 30 in width; and will accommodate nearly four hundred persons.

The number of communicants, who consider themselves as members of the parish, is twenty.

Mr. Houghton also designs the establishing, in the fall, of a Classical and English School in connection with the parish. The school will be under his constant and immediate supervision.

It is always a gratification to hear of the growth of the Church in accordance with the principles set forth in the Book of Common Prayer, and we have the fullest confidence that this rising parish will have the care of a faithful and wise shepherd, who will train up those committed to his charge in sound doctrine and in practical piety. Our best wishes are tendered to him and his vestry, in their most laudable and beneficial enterprise.

MASSACHUSETTS.

ANNUAL CONVENTION.

We have received the Christian Witness at such a late hour, that we can only give a brief abstract of the proceedings of this Convention.

The Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church, of this diocese, met in Trinity Church, on Wednesday morning.

Morning Prayer was read by Rev. John Wayland, D.D., rector of St. James' Church, Roxbury. The Ante-Communion service was read by the Bishop, assisted by the Rev. Dr. Edson, of Lowell, and Rev. Messrs. D. G. Wright, of Otis, and S. B. Shaw, of Lanesborough. The Bishop then delivered a Charge in place of Convention sermon, after which, a collection was made at the offertory in behalf of the Society for the relief of the Widows and Orphans of deceased Clergymen of the Diocese. The Holy Communion was then administered by the Bishop, assisted by Rev. Dr. Edson, Rev. S. B. Shaw, and Rev. D. G. Wright.

The congregation having retired, the Bishop took the chair, and the list of such of the clergy as were entitled to seats was then called. About fifty answered to their names. The certificates of Lay Delegates were then read.

The following persons were elected Standing Committee:—The Rev. Dr. Vinton, Rev. Geo. M. Randall, Rev. John Woart, Messrs. O. Daniel and G. M. Dexter.

There being one vacancy in the lay portion, Rev. Mr. Ballard moved that a further balloting be dispensed with, and that the gentleman who has the highest number of votes be elected. Carried, and accordingly William Raymond Lee, Esq., was declared elected.

The Convention proceeded to ballot for a clerical delegate to the General Convention.

The Tellers reported that there was no election.

On motion, it was voted that the person having the highest number of votes be declared elected; the Rev. William Crosswell, D. D., having the highest number, was accordingly declared elected.

The Rev. Dr. Eaton was unanimously elected Treasurer of the Convention.

CONSECRATION.

The consecration of St. James' Church, at Greenfield, by the Rt. Rev. Bishop Eastburn, took place on Thursday, May the 10th. The day was unusually pleasant, and a large congregation assembled to witness and join in the solemn and interesting services of the occasion. There were present, besides the Bishop, thirteen of the clergy, the most of whom assisted in the appointed exercises. The Instrument of Donation was read by the Rector of the parish, now in the 36th year of his ministry in the same place.

The church is a beautiful and imposing structure of stone, built upon a solid foundation of rock. The style is that of the 13th century; the roof high and open; the chancel spacious and elevated; the windows of stained glass, by Gibson of New York, and all the appurtenances, furniture and decorations, of the richest and most appropriate kind. The dimensions of the church are 83 feet in length, by 50 in breadth. The architect was Mr. Sikes, of Springfield, who has executed his work with great skill and science. A splendid organ, adapted, in its external architecture, to that of the church, from the manufactory of Hook, in Boston, has been placed, at an expense of $1800, in the gallery. The ladies of the Society have furnished a carpet, at the cost of $300, and a beautiful marble font, made in New York, has been presented by Mrs. H. W. Clapp.

The entire cost of the church, exclusive of the land and stone, exceeds eleven thousand dollars, of which Henry W. Clapp, Esq., of Greenfield, has generously contributed more than eight thousand. The sanctuary is thus completed, and all that is wanting, is the continued presence of God, with devout and holy worshippers.

CONNECTICUT.

CONFIRMATION.—Bishop Brownell administered the holy rite of Confirmation to twenty-seven persons, at St. Paul's Church, New Haven, on Sunday afternoon, April 29th.

FOREIGN.

Our readers will regret to learn that an accident, which might have been serious, occurred to the Bishop of Calcutta. In the course of a metropolitan visitation to Ceylon, his lordship fell through the hatchway of a ship, but happily the consequence was only a little temporary inconvenience. We have seen the Annual Report of the Calcutta Diocesan Committee of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel. It records, as the most important occurrences of the past year, the completion of St. Saviour's Church, belonging to the Hindustani mission, and the consecration of the same on last Michaelmas day.

From Australia we have intelligence of Confirmations held on September 21 and 22, by the Bishop of Sydney, in the episcopal town, at which 450 persons were admitted to the sacred rite. The Bishop also laid the first stone of the Church of St. Mark, Alexandria, on September 4th. In the diocese of Melbourne, the first meeting of the Church Society took place on September 12. It was numerously attended, and the Bishop's speech seems to have given much satisfaction. In Adelaide also there was an anniversary meeting of the South Australian Church Society, on October 3d, under the presidency of the Lieutenant-Governor, Sir H. E. F. Young. The Report, which was read by the Rev. W. J. Woodcock, stated the year's receipts at £221 11s.: the falling off in this department was attributed to the very general undertaking of the Society's objects by the inhabitants of different localities. The educational institutions of the Church were stated to be in a particularly prosperous condition. Mention was made of two munificent donations to the Collegiate School, from Captains Ellis and Allen. The Report also suggested that steps should be taken for the establishment of parochial libraries, and for endowing in some degree the new churches. We regret that we have not room to insert the eloquent and interesting address with which the Bishop moved the first resolution, which was ably seconded by Judge Cooper. In Tasmania there was a meeting at Hobart Town, on August 29, of a similar Society, at which the Bishop entered into an animated statement of the kind encouragement which he received during his late visit to England, and of the sums which have been sent to Tasmania, during the last five years, for missionary purposes. He then exhorted his hearers to fresh exertions for the Christian education of the community, dwelling particularly on the subject of Sunday Schools.

NEWFOUNDLAND.—Consecration of St. Mark's Church, Smith's Parish, Bermuda.—On February 13, the Bishop consecrated this new edifice. The old Church of St. Mark was built probably before the year 1620, but was blown down by a violent storm in 1846. A grant for a new church was procured from the legislature, liberal contributions were made by the parishioners, and a more commodious site was presented by F. Peniston, Esq. The new edifice presents internally a far more ecclesiastical aspect than has been usual, until within the last few years, in country churches in the Colonies. No one can fail to be gratified by the appearance of the building on entering by the western door. The open seats, alike for all, whether rich or poor, with their simple yet appropriate heads, the triple east window, and the space round the Holy Table, bespeak the care which has been exercised, even with very limited means, to erect and furnish not a house, but a church.

CAPTOWN.—Recent letters have been received from the Bishop of Capetown.—In the course of a single year he had added fourteen Clergymen and ten Catechists to the number of labourers in that portion of the Lord's vineyard. Several more have since been engaged in England, and will shortly sail for the Cape. The Bishop seems ready to give both himself and all that he has for the spiritual benefit of the Diocese over which he has been appointed an overseer. Such generous devotion in such a cause deserves, surely, all the support that can be afforded him. He had at the last dates just embarked on board a steamer, most liberally placed at his disposal by the Governor, for a visitation of the Island of St. Helena.

CHINA.—Dr. Smith, the Bishop-designate of Victoria, has issued a prospectus of Missionary plans for the benefit of the Chinese. He proposes to avail himself of the aid of Native Evangelists, and to employ the press for Christian purposes. His present object is chiefly to collect £5,000, in order to complete a College which is already begun at Hong Kong, and to set it in operation.

CONSECRATION OF COLONIAL BISHOPS AT CANTERBURY.—We have reason to believe that the Consecration which had been fixed for Ascension-day, has been postponed—probably till the Tuesday in Whitsun-week, May 29th.

Clerical Changes.

The Rev. William Alfred Jenks has resigned the rectorship of St. Paul's Church, Glen Cove, Queen's county. Until further notice, he will continue to reside in his late parish.

The Rev. N. A. Camp has taken charge of Christ Church, New Orleans, and requests papers and letters to be directed accordingly.

Selections.

For the Banner of the Cross.

MR. EDITOR:

I beg leave to send you the enclosed beautiful Lyric, from the pen of one whose effusions in former days often graced the columns of the Banner. It originally appeared in a Boston paper, the editor of which was once Senior Warden of the church alluded to. By reason of its being inserted in a secular print, perhaps few of those who would be most interested in the matter have ever read the piece; and I think that its poetical merit, with the singular facts it contains, render it worthy of insertion in your paper.

ECCLESIA IN FAVILLA.

At the second conflagration of Nantucket, on the island of the same name, in July, 1846, the beautiful edifice of Trinity Church perished in the flames. It was consumed when the raging element had completed the work of destruction elsewhere, and it had long stood as an observer of the ruin around. But "last (tho' not least" in the hearts of some) its own turn came. The Gothic turrets and the noble tower sent up their smoke to heaven, and soon all that remained of this much-loved and much-persecuted sanctuary, was—a heap of ashes! Singular as it may seem, it is nevertheless well attested by many, that the valuable and sweet-toned organ, when the loft which contained it fell, gave from every pipe a wild and piercing sound—a death-like shriek, which was heard at a great distance on the island.

The church can never be re-built, owing to the embarrassed state of the financial concerns of the parish; and even the old corporation has of necessity been dissolved. Truly, then, Trinity Church is no more: except, that it will ever live in the fond-est remembrance of those who have worshipped at its holy altar, and who know that it was once to them indeed "the house of God and the gate of heaven."

Thou art no more, thy turrets fair
The sailor seeks in vain:
His last look on the isle was there,
When gliding to the main:—
Now homeward-bound from distant land,
When nearing to his native strand,
He sees thee not again.

From street to street, the rushing flame
Illum'd the port once more,
Devouring, as it onward came,
The remnant left before:
And long amid that waste alone,
The church in solemn grandeur shone,
Above the burning shore.

But naught could save it from the blast:
The smoke and lurid glare,
With glowing embers, thick and fast,
Came on the midnight air.—
The fairest victim and the last,
Of all the conflagration vast,
Was that sweet "House of Prayer."

Of all the consecrated place,
The chancel, tower and nave,
A relic scarce the eye can trace
Within that fiery grave.
Nor as the Phoenix will it rise,
Again to greet the azure skies,
And look upon the wave.

Now silent is the organ's note,
Whose melodies divine,
At morn and eve were wont to float,
To THEE, ALMIGHTY TRINE!
Far borne upon the ocean gale,
In death was heard its piercing wail,
Amid the blazing shrine.

The altar now in ashes lies,
Its rites forever done,—
The prayer, the hymn, the sacrifice,
By holy Priests begun,
Its vesper lights no more shall burn,
Nor willing footsteps to it turn,
Before the rising sun.

For all the scenes of former years,
With many a charm to me;
The festive joys, and Lenten tears,
Blest be thy memory!
But still unchanged, beyond the sky,
There is a better "house" on high,
Of immortality.

Farewell, dear Island-Church, once more,
A last farewell to thee,
The music of the ocean's roar
Thy requiem shall be,
At calm of noon, at dead of night;
The waters dark,—the billows bright;
O, shrine amid the sea!

NINEVEH AND ITS REMAINS.

Mr. Layard now became anxious to send home some of the sculptured slabs. The small English steamer on the Tigris being out of trim, the slabs were first sawed into convenient pieces, and dragged by means of levers out of the trenches, then packed in felts and matting, and sewed in roughly-made cases; and being got upon a raft, formed of inflated skins and beams of poplar wood, were floated down the river to Bagdad, and thence by boats to Busrah, from which place they were to be sent to England, as the first-fruits of the energy and enterprise directed to this new and interesting field of research.

As the health of Mr. Layard now required recruiting, he visited the Tiyari mountains, inhabited by the Chaldean Christians, intending to return to Mosul in September, when the heats would have abated. Our limits will not allow us to follow him through this very pleasing portion of his volume. His adventures among the Nestorian Christians are very interesting, and his accounts of their social and religious condition highly valuable. More remarkable is his visit to the Yezidi, a people whose tenets and practices have been misrepresented as resembling those of the Ansyrri of Syria; certain midnight orgies being falsely ascribed to them which have earned them the epithet of the "Extinguishers of Lights." The peculiarity of the religion of the Yezidi is their worship of the Evil Principle, whom they dread and propitiate as the most powerful of subordinate beings. "There is in their creed," says Mr. Layard, "a strange mixture of Sabeanism, Christianity and Mahommedanism, with a tincture of the doctrines of the Gnostics and Manichæans." Nothing can be more thrilling than the account he gives of the scenes of their extraordinary nocturnal festival. Indeed, his journey was destined to be full of every sort of adventure. At Singar, where the Pasha was receiving the chiefs of the mountains, the people, fearing a renewal of the oppressive proceedings of his predecessor, determined to resist. A few troops and an officer were sent to reassure them, whom Mr. Layard accompanied. As they entered the village, they were received by a general discharge of fire-arms, and two horsemen who had pushed in advance fell dead at his feet; and for some days he found himself in the midst of a petty war.

On his return to Mosul, letters were received from Sir S. Caning, with a small grant of funds from the British Museum; and we cannot but admire the perseverance and good management of Mr. Layard, who contrived to accomplish so much with means so very inadequate. He now proceeded to organize a regular force, who encamped at Nimroud, and formed a little community over which he presided with an authority quite patriarchal, reconciling their little disputes, and by mingled kindness and firmness maintaining the best feeling among them. The excavations were now carried on on a larger scale, and the results were of corresponding magnitude and interest. Besides the numerous ranges of apartments and sculptured tablets, was found the very singular obelisk now in the British Museum.

The sculptures on this ornament seemed to commemorate the conquest of India, or some country far to the east of Assyria, as the elephant, the rhinoceros, the Bactrian or two-humped camel, the lion, &c. are represented upon them; a very singular sphynx was also discovered. The impressions created by the scene of these extraordinary discoveries are well described in a letter by Mr. Longworth.

"I should begin," he says, "by stating that they are all under ground. To get at them, Mr. Layard has excavated the earth to the depth of from twelve to fifteen feet, where he has come to a building composed of slabs of marble. In this place, which forms the north-west angle of the mound, he has fallen upon the interior of a large palace, consisting of a labyrinth of halls, chambers, and galleries, the walls of which are covered with bas-reliefs and inscriptions in the cuneiform character, all in excellent preservation. The upper part of the walls, which was of brick, painted with flowers, &c. in the brightest colours, and the roofs, which were of wood, have fallen; but fragments of them are strewn about in every direction. The time of day when I first descended into them happened to be towards evening, the shades of which, no doubt, added to the awe and mystery of the surrounding objects. It was, of course, with no little excitement that I suddenly found myself in the magnificent abode of the old Assyrian kings, where, moreover, it needed not the slightest effort of imagination to conjure up visions of their long-departed power and greatness. There they were in their Oriental pomp of richly-embroidered robes and quaintly-artificial coiffure. There also were portrayed their deeds in peace and war, their audiences, battles, sieges, lion-hunts, &c. My mind was overpowered by the contemplation of so many strange objects; and some of them, the portly forms of kings and viziers, were so life-like, and carved in such fine relief, that they might almost be imagined to be stepping from the walls to question the rash intruder on their privacy. Then mingled with them were other monstrous shapes—the old Assyrian deities, with human bodies, long drooping wings, and the head and beaks of eagles; or, still faithfully guarding the portals of the deserted halls, the colossal forms of winged lions and bulls, with gigantic human faces. All these figures, the idols of a religion long since dead and buried like themselves, seemed actually in the twilight to be raising their desecrated heads from the sleep of centuries. Certainly, the feeling of awe which they inspired me with must have been something akin to that experienced by their heathen votaries of old.

By the middle of December a second cargo of sculptures was ready to be sent to Bagdad.

"On Christmas day," says Mr. Layard, "I had the satisfaction of seeing a raft bearing twenty-three cases, in one of which was the obelisk floating down the river. I watched them till out of sight, and then galloped into Mosul to celebrate the festivities of the season, with the few Europeans whom duty or business had collected in this remote corner of the globe."

It would be impossible to give in an article any idea of the extent and results of the excavations, which were still continued as vigorously as the means would permit. Every step, however, of their progress is described in the work, and is rendered intelligible and interesting by maps and wood-cuts in outline of the principal objects. The removal of the heavier objects had not been originally contemplated, but Mr. Layard determined to attempt it. The winged bulls, the heaviest of all, offered, of course, the most serious obstacles, over all which, however, skill and perseverance obtained the victory. After all had been arranged for its removal by ropes, pulleys, and blocks,—

"The men being ready," says Mr. Layard, "and all my preparations complete, I stationed myself on the top of the high bank of earth, and ordered the wedges to be struck out. Still, however, it remained firmly in its place. A rope having been passed round it, six or seven men easily tilted it over. The thick, ill-made cable stretched with the strain, and almost buried itself in the earth in which it was coiled. The ropes held well. The mass descended gradually, the Chaldeans propping it up firmly with the beams. It was a moment of great anxiety. The drums and shrill pipes of the Kurdish musicians increased the din and confusion caused by the war-cry of the Arabs, who were half frantic with excitement. They had thrown off nearly all their garments, their long hair floated in the wind, and they indulged in the wildest postures and gesticulations as they clung to the ropes. The women had congregated on the sides of the trenches, and by their incessant screams, and by the ear-piercing talehl, added to the enthusiasm of the men. The bull once in motion, it was impossible to obtain a hearing. The loudest cries I could produce were buried in the heap of discordant sounds. Neither the hippopotamus-hide whips of the Cawasses, nor the bricks and clods of earth with which I endeavored to draw attention from some of the most noisy of the group, were of any avail. Away went the bull, steady enough as long as supported by the props behind; but as it came nearer the rollers, the beams could no longer be used. The cable and ropes stretched more and more. Dry from the climate, as they felt the strain they creaked and threw out dust. Water was thrown over them, but in vain, for they all broke together when the sculpture was within five feet of the rollers. The bull was precipitated to the ground. Those who held the ropes, thus suddenly released, followed its example, and were rolling one over the other in the dust. A sudden silence succeeded to the clamour. I rushed into the trenches, prepared to find the bull in many pieces. It would be difficult to describe my satisfaction when I saw it lying precisely where I had wished to place it, and uninjured! The Arabs no sooner got on their legs again, than, seeing the result of the accident, they darted out of the trenches, and seizing by the hands the women who were looking on, formed a large circle, and yelling the war-cry, commenced a most mad dance. The musicians exerted themselves to the utmost, but their music was drowned by the cries of the dancers."

After an infinity of trouble, the bull and other sculptures were deposited upon the raft, and floated slowly down the stream.

"After adorning the palaces of the Assyrian kings, the objects of the wonder and, may-be, worship of thousands, they had been buried unknown centuries beneath a soil trodden by Persians under Cyrus, by Greeks under Alexander, and by Arabs under the first descendants of their prophets. They were now to visit India, to cross the most distant seas of a southern hemisphere, and to be finally placed in a British museum. Who can venture to foretell how their strange career may end?"

Mr. Layard's labours at length drew to a close, the funds granted to him being exhausted. It is a most gratifying fact, and highly honourable to himself, that he appears to have been entirely successful in stimulating the activity and conciliating the good will of his Arabs. Before leaving the scene of their mutual labours, he tells us that he gave them a parting feast, on which occasion Sheik Khelaf, "a very worthy man," was spokesman for the rest of his fellow-labourers.

"They had lived," he said, "under my shadow, and, God be praised, no one had cause to complain. Now that I was leaving, they should leave also, and seek the distant banks of the Khabour, where at least they would be far from the authorities, and be able to enjoy the little they had saved. All they wanted was each man a "teskere," or note to certify that they had been in my service. This would not only be some protection to them, but they would show my writing to their children, and would tell them of the days they had passed at Nimroud."

We have been so carried away by the narrative part of Mr. Layard's volumes, and have indulged in such frequent quotations, that we have room but for a very brief glance at what is nevertheless the most important portion of them—his dissertation upon the antiquity of monuments he has brought to light, the people by whom they were built, their place in history, their connexion with other nations, their religion, arts, and manners. On all these points, he says, we are as yet confessedly without adequate means to pronounce very confidently: the field of research has but been partially opened; other unexplored monuments exist; nor have there as yet been discovered any tombs, which have proved so important a mine of research for the investigators of Egyptian antiquities. Mr. Layard is of opinion that no portion of the monuments, which are of different dates, can be later than the Persian destruction of Nineveh, while for the more ancient he claims, upon various grounds, a far higher antiquity.

"There is no reason," he observes, "why we should not assign to Assyria the same remote antiquity we claim for Egypt. The monuments of Egypt prove that she did not stand alone in civilization and power. At the earliest period" (and this argument appears to us conclusive) "we find her contending with enemies already, nearly if not fully as powerful as herself, and amongst the spoil from Asia, and the articles of tribute brought by subdued nations from the north-east, are vases as elegant in shape, stuffs as rich in texture, and chariots as well adapted to war, as her own."

It is even believed that the name of Nineveh occurs on a monument of the reign of Thothmes III., about 1490 years before Christ.

There are curious traces brought forward in these volumes of relations between the two countries at some remote period; and doubtless, as the monuments are more explored, and others are discovered, and the cuneiform character more fully understood, much new and important light will be thrown upon the history of early civilization, and the connexion between different Asiatic nations, with their influence upon the western world.

Mr. Layard has no doubt about the identity of Nimroud with Nineveh, which, like Thebes, was gradually formed, succeeding monarchs adding to the original building other groups of palaces and temples, till the city attained the immense size—sixty miles in circuit, or three days' journey—mentioned in the book of Jonah, who visited it at the period when, as he thinks, it acquired its greatest extent, in the time of the kings of his second supposed dynasty; that is, of the kings mentioned in Scripture. The palaces of Nineveh bear evident traces of having been destroyed by fire.

"Their interior," says Mr. Layard—(we must find place for this concluding and gorgeous picture)—"was as magnificent as imposing. I have led the reader through its ruins, and he may judge of the impression its halls were calculated to make upon the stranger who in the days of old entered for the first time the abode of the Assyrian kings. He was ushered in through the portals guarded by the colossal lions, or bulls, of white alabaster. In the first hall he found himself surrounded by the sculptured records of the empire. Battles, sieges, triumphs, the exploits of the chase, were portrayed on the walls, sculptured in alabaster, and painted in gorgeous colours. Under each picture were engraved, in colours filled up with bright copper, inscriptions describing the scenes represented. Above the sculptures were painted other events—the king, attended by his eunuchs and warriors, receiving his prisoners, entering into alliances with other monarchs, or performing some sacred duty. These representations were enclosed in coloured borders, of elaborate and elegant design. The emblematic tree, winged bulls, and monstrous animals, were conspicuous amongst the ornaments. At the upper end of the hall was the colossal figure of the king, in adoration before the supreme Deity, or receiving from his eunuch the holy cup. He was attended by warriors bearing his arms, and by the priests or presiding divinities. His robes, and those of his followers, were adorned with groups of figures, animals, and flowers, all painted with brilliant colours. The stranger trod upon alabaster slabs, each bearing an inscription, recording the titles, genealogy, and achievements of the great king. Several doorways, formed by gigantic winged lions or bulls, or by the figures of guardian deities, led into other apartments, which again opened into more distant halls. . . . The ceilings above him were divided into square compartments, painted with flowers, or with the figures of animals. Some were inlaid with ivory, each compartment being surrounded by elegant borders and mouldings. The beams, as well as the sides of the chambers, may have been gilded, and even plated, with gold and silver; and the rarest woods, in which the cedar was conspicuous, were used for the wood-work. Square openings in the ceilings of the chambers admitted the light of day. A pleasing shadow was thrown over the sculptured walls, and gave a majestic expression to the human features of the colossal forms which guarded the entrances. Through these apertures was seen the light blue of an eastern sky, enclosed in a frame on which were painted, in vivid colours, the winged circle, in the midst of elegant ornaments and the graceful forms of ideal animals. These edifices, as it has been shown, were great national monuments, upon the walls of which were represented in sculpture, or inscribed in alphabetic characters, the chronicles of the empire. He who entered them might thus read the history, and learn the glory and triumphs of the nation. They served at the same time to bring continually to the remembrance of those who assembled within them on festive occasions, or for the celebration of religious ceremonies, the deeds of their ancestors, and the power and majesty of their gods."

Such was the magnificence of ancient Nineveh. But we must hasten to a conclusion. Profoundly interesting are the inquiries of Mr. Layard, from the means already at his disposal, as to the religion, the manners and customs of the ancient Assyrians, concerning which we were but yesterday completely ignorant. History, as he observes, may have failed to chronicle the deeds of a nation which could maintain its sway over the largest portion of the then civilized world, and traditions in which their remembrance was preserved may have perished before history was ready to receive them; but the records of the people themselves have remained, and are now before us. "I shall be well satisfied," he concludes, "if I have succeeded in an attempt to add a page to the history of mankind, by restoring a part of the lost annals of Assyria." And how far soever succeeding discoverers and inquirers may carry their investigations, to Mr. Layard we must adjudge the palm of having first laid open the subject, of having obtained for his country a valuable collection of antiquities, and of recording their acquisition in a volume which will take its place among the best works of travel in our literature.

LIGHT IN THE DARKNESS.

I had been thinking of the account given me by the pious and intelligent master of a deaf and dumb school, of one of his favourite pupils, the daughter of a farmer. He told me of the delight with which she learned from him the glad tidings of great joy concerning the redemption which is in CHRIST JESUS, and of her own standing, as made in holy baptism a member of CHRIST, the child of God, and an inheritor of the kingdom of heaven. Beautiful it was, he said, to look upon her sweet peaceful countenance, and to learn from her in her mute language how she prayed continually, "Thy kingdom come!" and how she was quite happy, walking all day long in the presence of God. Her affliction seemed to her a conscious blessing, shutting her out from communion with others, only that she might more uninterruptedly commune with Him Who had so loved her, and given Himself for her. Like another deaf and dumb child, who, on being asked who caused him to be born deaf and dumb, wrote upon his slate in answer these touching words,—"Even so, FATHER, for so it seemed good in Thy sight,"—she, too, seemed to recognize a Father's will in the circumstances of her earthly lot, and to know that all things work together for good to those that love Him. But what most struck me in her story, was the great and blessed change which she had been the means of effecting in her parents' house on her return home. "She was amongst them," said the master, "as a little preacher of righteousness." "How was that," I asked, "when she could not speak, and they could hardly converse with her by signs, at first?" Then he told me how her very silence, her holy example, her every look preached to them, as she walked before them in all lowliness and gentleness, in peace and purity like one whose conversation was in heaven. There was but one thing that brought a shadow over her sweet face, and it was sin; while on the other hand, it needed but the turning away from evil on the part of those around her, or some deed of righteousness or mercy, to brighten up her countenance with the radiant happiness of a saint. And so it was that by degrees one evil habit after another was given up, lest they should vex the loving gentle-hearted one, whose grief and gladness were but the showing forth of the mind of CHRIST; and thus, by the silent example of her holy walk, they learned to glorify God, and to do well themselves. It was a beautiful instance of the light reproving the darkness; and as I dwelt upon it, I thought how very different was such reproof from the fault-finding so common in the world. And just at this moment my attention was aroused by the angry voices of two little ones, who were playing in the garden not far from me.

"You are very naughty, Edward! Papa told you not to dig there; you naughty child you!" said his eldest sister; and running up to him she passionately snatched away a little wheelbarrow which Eddy had been using, and which he now struggled to retain possession of, while he repeated, "I'm not naughty, Lucy, I'm not naughty, but you are; you shouldn't take away my barrow."

I went up to the little ones, and endeavoured to make peace; not, if the truth must be told, with very good success, for both tried to justify their own conduct by finding fault with each other. "Papa said we were not to dig on our borders; and Edward is very naughty!" repeated Lucy; while I was inclined to think that the real cause of offence was that Edward had taken possession of the wheelbarrow, which she herself wanted. And it is strange to see how some little ones, when thwarted in any way, find a sort of relief in condemning others. I once heard a little boy in this kind of temper, exclaim of his nurse Mary, "Naughty Mary! naughty Mary!" for so he used to call her. "Johnnie must not say so," said his mother; on which the child exclaimed, "Naughty aunt Annie! naughty aunt Annie!" "No, Johnnie must not call aunt naughty," "Naughty King Herod, then! may say naughty King Herod. Naughty King Herod, kill all the little children; but they're all up in heaven now, where he can't get at them, and Johnnie may say naughty King Herod! Johnnie will say naughty, very naughty King Herod; mayn't he mamma?" I could not help observing that Johnnie would do best to call himself naughty, and to be angry with himself; and it was something of the same kind that I said to poor little Lucy, as she sobbed out in my arms, "Edward is naughty."

"Were not you naughty to snatch away the barrow from him?"

"But he shouldn't dig up the border, Auntie; and I don't love him, I don't!"

Lucy did love him very dearly, and would never have said so but in her naughty passion; and it was always a very hard matter to bring my little favourite (for so she was, notwithstanding many things that often pained me in her), to acknowledge that she herself was in the wrong. It was after this interruption that I returned to what had been the subject of my thoughts just before and while looking down from the garden of which I have spoken, and which, being upon the brow of a hill, commanded an extensive view of the lovely valley in which so many of my early days were spent, I fell into a sort of waking dream of the days and ways of childhood.

Methought that I was looking on a company of baptized little ones, in a valley unlike the one before me; for that was bright and lovely, but this was dim with the misty shadows of a dark and cloudy day: so dim, that, but for the light of a lantern which the little ones held in their hands, they would many times have missed the path in which they were walking. Some of them, indeed, walked along carelessly enough; and while they held the lantern, they took no heed to walk by its light; and so they soon got off the dry firm path into miry ways, where their white robes got splashed; and yet the children seemed themselves unconscious of it, while, from the dimness in which they walked they were constantly jostling one another. When this happened, they would hold up their lanterns, not to be a light unto their feet, and a lamp unto their path, but to show the stains upon the garments of their companions. "Look at your robe; see how splashed and dirty it is!" one would say; while the child addressed would make answer angrily, "Look at your own; it is much more splashed than mine, I can tell you." And sometimes while they were thus disputing, their feet seemed to slip, and they not only fell down themselves, but in their fall they pushed others down also. Now all these children had been clad alike in white robes, and signed upon their forehead with a glistening cross: but when one came to look upon them more closely, there was a great difference amongst them. On the robes of some a dark splash showed the more from its contrast with the whiteness of the rest of the garment; while, in the case of others, their robes were all over of a dingy yellow hue, and the fresh stains were less perceptible. There was as great a difference in the cross upon their foreheads; on some it was like a faint red sign, more or less perceptible; while on others it shone with a clear and starry radiance. These last seemed to be those who, taking heed unto their goings, walked straight onwards in such a brightness, that the light which shone around their footsteps, and the glistening purity of their white robes fell upon the soiled or splashed garments, and on the unsteady steps of the heedless ones; so that they could not help seeing the difference. And then I noticed that either they loved not the light, and they hastened to get away from the company of these bright little ones, or else they wept to mark how their robes were defiled, and they looked sorrowfully around for a fountain in which they might wash away the stains. And as these bright ones went on their way, I heard them ever and anon chanting some such words as these,—"Blessed are the undefiled in the way, who walk in the law of the Lord." And again, in the tone of one that prayeth earnestly, they would say, "O that my ways were directed to keep Thy statutes;" and their path seemed to be as the shining light, that shineth more and more unto the perfect day. Sometimes it happened that a very little one, walking thus in light, and singing on his way came near one much older than himself; and behold, the robe of the elder one was dark with many spots, and he was shame-faced in the presence of the little child, and bowed down his head, and wept: for he said, "I have sinned." Then I saw that the bright one wept too, and covered his face with the skirt of his robe, that he might not see his brother's shame; and even as he did so, the light shone with a softened radiance, and the stains upon the garment of the elder one were red to look upon, and a voice was sounding in his ears as of one who said, "My little children, these things write I unto you that ye sin not;

and if any man sin, we have an advocate with the FATHER, JESUS CHRIST the righteous." And so the defiled one was encouraged to seek for cleansing and forgiveness; and after a while, I saw him walking beside the little one, and they were rejoicing together. And it came into my mind that it was thus that the goings of the undefiled in the way, should make manifest and reprove the wanderings of the heedless ones; and thus the scene passed from before me.

ORIGINAL PAPERS OF BISHOP ANTHONY DOPPING.

DOPPING.

These interesting documents are dated July 28th, 1672, in which year he commenced Doctor of Divinity in the University of Dublin, being then Vicar of St. Andrew's, Dublin. And it is curious that even at that time, Dr. Anthony Dopping found it necessary, in exhorting his parishioners to the observance of the Rubric, to guard the more ignorant of them from supposing that he was "a bringer in of innovations."

I.

BISHOP ANTHONY DOPPING'S ADDRESS TO HIS PARISHIONERS.

Read these ensuing directions to my parishioners, July 28, 1672, on the Sunday before the communion: which I added at the end of the exhortation which is ordered by the rubric before to be read the Sunday before the communion.

Where it is ordered by the rubric before the communion that as many as intend to be partakers of the holy communion shall signify their names to the curate, at least some time the day before, I do therefore desire you that you would observe that pious and laudable injunction, and send your names in writing to the clerke of this parish the Saturday before, who will see them delivered to mee; to the intent that I may know what and who those persons are to receive; and, brethren, I beseech you do not entertain any thoughts of meaneas of a person that brings any innovations into the Church; for you see, first, that I have a rule for it, and I look upon myself as obliged in conscience to let you know it; and if you do not observe it, let the blame of it lay at your own doores, seeing you are warned of your duty. And secondly, as there is a rule laid downe for you to practise, so I am willing to render you the reasons of it, that so I might recommend it the more effectually to your practice. And some of them are briefly these:—

1. To the intent that if any person be a notorious and open evil liver, or have done any wrong to his neighbour, or bears any malice or prejudice to him, the curate, knowing thereof, may advise him, that hee presume not to come to the Lord's table, till hee have repented of his sins, and reconciled himselfe to his injured neighbour. This reason is hinted at in the rubric before the communion.

2. There may possibly come several persons from other parishes, who by reason of the scandalousness of their lives, or being under an excommunication, or for other just causes, may be prohibited the communion in their owne parish church; and therefore it is necessary that their names should be sent, that the curate may know who they are, and of what parish, and may confer with their owne minister about them. —Vide can. 95. Hibern.

3. That the minister may know what persons in his parish are fit to be admitted to undertake for children in their baptism, it being laid as a rule upon us all, by the sixteenth canon of our church, that no person shall be admitted godfather or godmother to any child at christening or confirmation, before the said person so undertaking hath received the holy communion in the church; presuming it reasonable to believe that hee that hath so little regard for his owne soul will not be much carefull or solicitous for another's.

Thus much I thought fit to tell you all, as to the first thing which concerns your duty; another branch there is, that concerns mine, and that is this: whereas it is ordered by the nineteenth canon that the minister of every parish shall, the afternoon before the communion, give warning, by the tolling of a bell, to the intent, that if any person of his parish have any scruple of conscience, or desire the speciall ministry of reconciliation, hee may afford it to those that need it, I do therefore thinke fit to give you all public notice, that every Saturday before the communion, there shall be prayers in this church, at nine in the morning, and at three in the evening, and that, after they are finished, I shall be ready to attend in the church till eleven in the morning, and until five in the evening, all such persons who, finding themselves either extreme dull, or much troubled in mind, shall willingly resort unto mee, and shall be ready to afford them as well advise and counsell for the quickening of their dead hearts, and the subduing those corruptions whereunto they have beene subject, as the benefit of absolution likewise, for the quieting of their consciences by the power of the keys which Christ hath committed to his ministers for that purpose.

II.

BISHOP DOPPING'S RULES IN VISITING HIS PARISHIONERS.

Rules proposed to myselfe in the visiting my parishioners:

1. If I find any dissenter from our church, either papist or sectary, to confer with him, and endeavour to reduce him.
2. To advise every master of a family to keepe family duties, and in order to that, to advise them to read to them every Sunday, after evening sermon, a chapter in "The Whole Duty of Man," and to recommend that booke to every one of them to buy.
3. If they have children, to advise them to catechise them frequently, that so they may be instructed in the grounds of religion; and in order to that to carry with me little primers, to bestow on such persons as are not able to buy them for their children.
4. Where I find children grown up, and able to give an account of the church catechism, to desire and advise the parents to bring them to be confirmed, and to show the necessity of confirmation, if they scruple it.
5. To represent to the several masters of families, the advantage of the above-mentioned course, that so upon the score of profit and peace (if for no other motive) they might embrace it—viz., that this will be the way to make their children dutifull, and prevent future mischiefs—that servants will be more faithful and diligent, when they do their duty out of conscience, and not for profit.

6. To reconcile differences between them, if I know or hear of any.

7. That I may find out the way to suit my discourse to them, and know their principles and their humours, to enquire one man concerning the temper, the taste, the religion, the worldly condition, of his next neighbour—and of him concerning the next to him, and of him concerning another, and so forth, till I have got a sufficient knowledge of them all.

GOSPEL TRUTH, AND PRIMITIVE ECCLESIASTICAL ORDER.

SATURDAY, MAY 26, 1849.

THE CALENDAR ITSELF AGAIN.

"It gives us pleasure to announce the return of Professor Jackson to his post at Trinity College, with gratifying hopes that the purpose of his journey has been realized. His friends, who undertook to supply the editorial columns of the Calendar during his absence, have therefore fulfilled their engagement; and the present number is the last which will be issued under their supervision."

Such is the very gratifying announcement made in the last Calendar. We rejoice most sincerely in view of the object of Professor Jackson's journey, that its issue has occasioned "gratifying hopes." God grant that these hopes may be realized! Under the editorial conduct of the Rev. Mr. Payne and his successor, Professor Jackson, this Paper has always preserved a firm, consistent, and dignified course. We have always welcomed it as one of the most acceptable of our exchanges. On the other hand, during the brief editorial rule of "his friends," (well may he say, save me from my friends!) this Journal has been marked by a temper and spirit almost unchristian. First sending forth to the world sweeping and unfounded charges against the Church, as nurturing in her bosom a nest of vipers, charges whose only effect was to gladden the hearts of the Church's enemies, these it has attempted to sustain by the most reckless assertions, without a single word of positive proof. And those who had the courage in these days of rebuke, when evil reports of brethren are most readily credited, to stand up in defence of the Church against her false accusers, have been assailed with violence of temper, and with an offensive personality. We appeal to the readers of the Banner to say whether all our articles on this subject have not been marked with calmness and good temper. We have acted upon the conviction, that it is always better to point an article with pleasantry rather than with malice. Yet in every case, these anonymous Editors, without attempting to answer our sober arguments, have directed their responses against these playful attempts to soften the asperities of controversy. We ask our Readers to recur to the Editorial in the Banner of April 12, and see whether the following reply is a whit more consistent with the truth, than it is with the honorable feelings which should actuate a Christian and a gentleman.

"The Banner of the Cross is the only paper in the Church, which persists in trifling with issues of deeper seriousness than it seems capable of fathoming. If it chooses to maintain the position of a harlequin, intruding upon the scenes of a tragedy, we leave it to wear its motley without disturbance."

We call upon the Calendar, as an act of justice, to republish this and append to it the editorial which it professes to describe. We have not a few friends in Connecticut, and we fear not their verdict in the case, if they are only possessed of the facts. We pronounce the above assertion of the Calendar to be as false as it is offensive, and a plain violation of the charge given by our Saviour in St. Matt. v. 22. The writer of the above must be strong in self-conceit if he thinks this flippant abuse will do away with the sober truth of our editorial. We have assurances from many quarters, that it is otherwise.

We rejoice, and we doubt not the Church has reason to join in our pleasure, that the person or persons who have thus conducted the Calendar, have given place to one possessed of better temper, of more wisdom, truth, and honesty. We have only to express the hope that Professor Jackson will not feel himself trammelled by the false position in which "his friends" have placed the Calendar. His return was most opportune for them. It has enabled them to slip out of the awkward corner in which they had placed themselves, and which was getting too close and hot for their comfort. They have done so without meeting the challenge which has been given them, or vouchsafing to furnish the proofs called for. The Church is assured, however, that all is safe in their hands. "We had and still have in our hands, proofs, which our Bishop considered amply sufficient to sustain our cause." This is the point of the Parthian arrow, dipt in a little harmless venom, which these retiring editors send back to keep open the wounds they have inflicted. They have winged their missile with one additional "assertion." "To-day we have added the assertion, that this (the Church of the Holy Apostles) is not the only point of danger near the seminary." In an Editorial, which seems a kind of valedictory, the retiring Editors of "Romanizing," thus present the matter to their readers.

"THE STATE OF THE CASE."

"We have reached a point at which it seems desirable to review what has been accomplished, since our editorial of March 24th, and to present to our readers, in a distinct summary, the actual state of the case. It has been very erroneously imagined by at least one of the journals of the Church, that because we have mainly dwelt on the testimony which different persons have seen fit voluntarily to present, therefore we have had nothing else to rest upon. And some expressions which we have used in the course of the controversy, have been ingeniously tortured into favoring this idea. We therefore say distinctly, and once for all, that we had and still have in our hands, proofs, which our Bishop considered amply sufficient to sustain our cause; but that having this sure ground to rest upon, we shaped our course so as to draw out, if possible, the admissions of opposers, and thus the sooner to bring matters to a head. This is obviously a very different thing from proceeding on mere suspicion, to challenge answers confirmatory of it. It infringes no law of honor or of justice, and it avoids a host of petty issues and cavillings, which special pleaders, would raise against any conceivable testimony. With this exposition of our course, declaring that we have proceeded not on grounds of suspicion, but of actual knowledge, we call attention to what has been done.

"In the first place, then, it is acknowledged that the Church of the Holy Apostles, of which the Rev. Mr. Howland is the Rector, and the Rev. Dr. Huntington* the assistant Minister, is an unsafe place for the students of the General Seminary; unless, that is, Professor Ogilby shall explain his withdrawal of the students, as he does his Matriculation Address, to be a mere abstraction. To-day, we have added the assertion, that this is not the only point of danger near the Seminary."

"Secondly: it is admitted,† that there are those in the Church who need the defence which Mr. Howland has set up, and who may therefore be fairly designated as a 'Romanizing clique.' N. K., in the Churchman adopts our very phrase: and another correspondent evidently recognizes the truth of our statements."

"Thirdly" contains some remarks upon the Churchman and the Banner, having nothing to do with the case, and the last head seems to us as little relevant.

"Fourthly: the fact of the existence of the Order of the Holy Cross, is now before the Church; and its extremely dangerous character, and bearings have been pointed out, though not all has yet been said that may be."

The assertion of the existence of such a society is before the Church, we have not yet seen "the fact."

The withdrawal of two or three students from a certain Parish, an additional "assertion," the admissions of anonymous correspondents of the Churchman, those "proofs" which cannot be brought to light by the most earnest demands, these are the closing arguments in this case. Let us remember it is a very different thing to whisper "proofs" into the ear of a Bishop, when no defendant is at hand, and to present them to the public where they have to meet more trying scrutiny. And we will never be satisfied about those proofs until we see them. In this aspect of the case, we ask, who has been trifling in this matter? Have not those who have dared to trifle with the reputation of their Brethren, to trifle with the good name of the Church, and to open the lips of the reviler and blasphemer in scorn and derision? Have they not been trifling who have, for no just cause, for no useful end that they have yet assigned, dragged forth into the public prints matters which they have not been able to prove, and which, if proved, should have been first the subject of authorized discipline? And then, forsooth, they must turn and call all fools who do not weep at their justian tragedies! "Scenes of a tragedy!" In the words of Fuller, "what Heraclitus would not laugh what Democritus would not weep" at such a tragedy as this! We profess ourselves incapable of fathoming its "deeper seriousness." So profound is it that it reaches to the lowest depths of bathos. We repeat the hope that the Calendar, under the wiser and more discreet conduct of its proper Editor, may become ITSELF AGAIN. And if Professor Jackson is obliged to vacate his post again, we trust he may find some less ambitious friends to drive the chariot in his behalf.

As persons professing to be authorized for that purpose, are applying for contributions towards the erection of St. Michael's (African) Church in Ohio street, in this city, we are requested to warn our readers and the public generally against them. They have no authority either from the vestry or any other proper source to make such applications.

* Dr. H. is not, we think, the Assistant Minister of that Church.

We are sure that all our readers will participate in the joy we feel at the almost UNANIMOUS adoption by the late Pennsylvania Convention, of the resolutions in favour of this worthy and respected Prelate. It was an earnest and heartfelt expression of opinion, most justly due to him; and the deeply impressive manner in which it was accorded, gave a peculiar weight and solemnity to the occasion.

Previous to offering the resolutions, the Rev. Dr. Coleman stated that he gladly availed himself of an opportunity so favourable for their calm and serious consideration; when the Convention was as yet undisturbed by any exciting topic, and members were free from that weariness which usually attends the close of a protracted session. He was also anxious to avoid the appearance of taking advantage of a thin house for their introduction. Requesting that the resolutions might be acted upon without debate—and intimating that if there should be any opposition, members would have an opportunity of expressing their sentiments by calling for a vote by orders—he then submitted them, in the hope that they would meet with the cordial approbation of the Convention, and be passed without a dissenting voice.

The resolutions will be found in another part of our paper. In reading them, the Rev. mover was evidently much affected, and they were listened to by the House with profound sensation, while he proceeded to add the following brief and feeling remarks:—

"For nearly five years, Mr. President, has the venerable Prelate who is the subject of these resolutions meekly and silently submitted to the authority of the Church. The uncomplaining spirit in which he has borne his sufferings, and his exemplary life during all this time, are well known to many of us; and they have greatly exalted his Christian character in the estimation of those who know him best. I believe the resolutions before us to speak the sentiments of this whole community, and the diocese at large; and that their passage by this body will convey the most lively satisfaction to every quarter of the Church. The House of Bishops will naturally look for some action first on the part of this diocese; and such an expression of opinion by this Convention, cannot but have great weight with those who were solemnly charged, at their consecration, 'so to minister discipline, that they forget not mercy.'

"Another reason for my offering these resolutions now is, that life is uncertain. I trust that our late Right Rev. Father will yet be spared for many years of further usefulness in the service of the Church; but before the House of Bishops shall again assemble, it may please God to take him to Himself: and in that case, it will be no small consolation to those who now sympathize with him in his distress, to know that they, at least, did what they could that his gray hairs should not be brought down with sorrow to the grave."

During the delivery of the above remarks, a deep and solemn silence pervaded the whole Convention; many being affected to tears. The resolutions were immediately seconded by several members, and passed by a viva voce vote; there being but two or three negative voices. Dr. Coleman then rose, and after humbly thanking God for the remarkable unanimity displayed, renewed the offer which he had before made—to reconsider the question, if desired, that the clergy and lay deputies might vote as two distinct orders; but the loud ayes which had resounded from every part of the House, and evidently came from every heart, seemed to render this so unnecessary, that, after a short conversation, it was dropped.

ANNIVERSARY OF THE BISHOP WHITE PRAYER BOOK SOCIETY.

In our last paper we published the circular of the Board of Managers of this society, and called our readers' attention to the interesting occasion on which the approaching celebration would take place. In order to give the clergymen in the vicinity and others an opportunity of attending, the anniversary has been deferred until Monday, in Whitsun Week. We now republish the resolution of the Board in order to keep it before our readers.

At a meeting of the Board of Managers of the Bishop White Prayer Book society, held on the evening of the 14th inst., it was

"Resolved, That if the collection to be made at the ensuing Anniversary of the Society, on Whitsun Monday, shall be sufficient to justify the expenditure, this Board will appropriate one thousand copies of the Prayer Book to each Bishop in the United States, for distribution in his Diocese.

We hope that the liberality of churchmen will enable the Board to carry this noble resolution into effect. It will be a suitable expression of gratitude for the great blessing wherewith God's mercy has entrusted us for His own glory and our eternal benefit. We add the following notice from the secretary.

The sixteenth anniversary of the Bishop White Prayer Book Society, will be held in St. Andrew's Church, 8th St. near Spruce, on the evening of Monday the 28th inst., when will also be celebrated the 300th anniversary of the introduction of the first Prayer Book, in the English tongue, into the worship of the English churches.

The sermon upon the occasion will be preached by the Rev. Dr. Stevens of St. Andrew's Church, and a collection made in aid of the funds of the society.

Service to commence at a quarter before 8 o'clock. The Society will meet for transaction of business at 7 and a quarter o'clock.

JAMES M. AERTSEN, Sec'y.

May 21st, 1849.

ANNIVERSARY OF THE BISHOP WHITE PRAYER BOOK SOCIETY.

DEAR MR. EDITOR:

I am glad to see by your last paper, that the Bishop White Prayer Book Society will make its anniversary meeting this year, the occasion of an especial appeal to churchmen to enable it to give One thousand Prayer Books to each Bishop in the United States for gratuitous distribution in his Diocese.

To enable the Society to carry its resolution into effect will require about Five thousand dollars.

This sum sounds large as we have been accustomed to anniversary collections, but it is a small matter for the Churchmen of Philadelphia if they will only allow the better impulses of their hearts to direct the contributions of their hands.

A few $100, $50, $20, $10, $5 mites will make the required sum, and I shall not believe that they will be withheld on such an occasion and for such a purpose, unless the result shall show that I have been too sanguine in my calculations and too ardent in my hopes.

The Society has chosen a most appropriate period for its purpose—indeed it was the period that suggested the thought—and of all the means which have been named by which it could be suitably commemorated, none seems to me to be so in keeping with it, as that which proposes to circulate the Book of Common Prayer.

I trust it will so commend itself to the minds and hearts of our communion, as to receive their cordial co-operation and liberal aid. Let it be an occasion of real good feeling, of full-hearted, free-handed benevolence, which shall tell to each other that we prize our privileges and blessings, and realizing their value desire to impart them to those who have them not.

The Prayer Book is very much wanted in every diocese of the Church, and a gift of a thousand of these would be received with feelings of sacred joy by each Bishop in our land. The Society has offered us the opportunity to bestow them; do not let us disappoint its charitable and holy purpose, nor the hopes which have been excited in the hearts of those who will receive them, that its efforts may be crowned with full success.

Any churches and individuals out of this diocese, which prefer the method proposed by the Society to signalize the occasion, and desire to contribute to the promotion of it, will be gladly received as co-labourers in the good work.

Their contributions may be sent to the Treasurer, Wm. Musgrave, Esq., Market street, Philadelphia. I hope it will appear that many abroad have their sympathies enlisted for the occasion.

I suppose the clergy in this city will inform their congregations on Whitsunday, of the anniversary meeting to be held on Monday evening next, in St. Andrew's Church, and invite their attendance and their liberal aid.

The sermon will be preached by the Rev. Dr. Stevens, on whose suggestion it was determined, I believe, to hold the anniversary meeting at that suitable period.

A LAYMAN.

ASCENSION DAY.

The Convention assembled at half-past 8 o'clock for religious service. Morning prayers were read by the Rev. Dr. Dorr, assisted by the Rev. Mr. Long, who read the lessons. The ante-communion service was read by the Bishop.

On motion of the Rev. Dr. Coleman, the elections were made the order of the day for 1 o'clock.

The Standing Committee having reported that Christ Church, Madison, Jerseytown; Christ Church, Holidaysburg; and St. Mary's Church, Jersey Shore, had not made, within the last three years, any parochial report, nor employed any clergyman, it was resolved that they shall no longer have a right to be represented in this convention.

The report of the Treasurer of the Episcopal Fund, John Welsh, Jr., showing a balance of $387.50 on hand, was read.

The report of the Treasurer of the Convention Fund was also read, showing a balance of $107.72 in the treasury.

The Trustees of the Christmas Fund for infirm and disabled clergymen, reported a balance of $267.04 in the treasury.

The Rev. Dr. Coleman offered the following resolutions. The impressive and affecting remarks with which the Rev. gentleman prefaced his motion will be found in another part of our paper. They were listened to with the most respectful attention, and many in the convention were affected to tears.

Resolved, That the removal by the House of Bishops of the disabilities imposed by that body on the Right Rev. Henry U. Onderdonk, D.D., would give great satisfaction to the individuals, clerical and lay, composing this Convention; and also, it is believed, to many others, as well in the Church generally, as in the Diocese once under his jurisdiction.

Resolved, moreover, That while such removal would cheer the declining years of a venerable and distinguished servant of the Church, it would secure to his many admirable productions their just estimation by posterity, and be in accordance with the charity so eloquently portrayed in the teaching, and so consistently exemplified in the conduct, of the great Apostle of the Gentiles.

The resolutions were seconded and passed by a viva voce vote, there being but two or three negative voices.

In consequence of these negatives Dr. Coleman called for a vote by orders. But he was induced to withdraw this call, on the representation that the unanimity of the vote was entirely satisfactory.

Judge Conyngham offered a resolution, that the lay deputies, Francis Wharton, Charles E. Lex, and Francis Shackelford, of the Church of the Crucifixion, be permitted to take their seats as members of this Convention.

After a prolonged debate the vote was taken by orders and decided as follows:

Clergy—Ayes, 27; nays, 44.

Churches—Ayes, 21; nays, 37; divided, 3.

So the resolution was negatived.

Dr. Hare, from the Committee on the Claims of Clergymen to seats in the Convention, made a report in favor of the claims of the Rev. D. S. Miller, of St. Jude's, and he was accordingly admitted.

In regard to the claims of the Rev. James Bonnar, acting as assistant to the rector of St. James', Philadelphia, the committee reported adversely. A debate ensued, but the consideration was finally postponed.

On motion, the order of the day, the election of officers, was postponed till 5 o'clock.

The cases of the Rev. W. L. Suddards and J. J. Kerr, referred to in the report of the Committee on Clergymen's claims, came up for consideration.

The debate was terminated, by a motion to adjourn prevailing.

Afternoon Session.—The Convention met at 5 o'clock.

The charter of Calvary Church, Tamaqua; Zion Church, Philadelphia county; Christ Church, Milton, Northumberland; St. James' Church, West Marlborough, Chester county; and St. Bartholomew Church, Kensington, were declared in accordance with the constitution of the church and the churches admitted.

The majority and minority of the Committee on the Claims of Clergymen, in relation to the claims of the Rev. Benj. Douglass, assistant to the Rector of St. Matthew's Church, at Francisville, made reports, the former declaring he was not entitled to a seat, and the latter, signed by Dr. Hare, in favor of his claims. The subject was, however, postponed, and the Convention proceeded to ballot for members of the Standing Committee.

During the counting of the ballots by the tellers, the following business was transacted:

The Rev. N. Sayre Harris, from the committee appointed at the last Convention, presented the following resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, That the parish clergy of this diocese be and they are hereby requested to bring the subject of an ample provision of seats for the poor and strangers before their respective congregations, at such a time and in such a manner as they may deem best calculated to promote the desired end.

The following, presented by Joseph R. Ingersoll, Esq., was adopted:

Resolved, That among the particulars to be reported by each parish clergyman in his annual report, shall be the property other than the church building and lot owned by the parish; the amount of indebtedness of the church or of the parish; the amount of salary which the clergyman is entitled to receive, and whether the same be in arrears and to what extent.

The Rev. Dr. Upfold submitted a resolution, requiring clergymen who give up their parochial charges on the plea of ill health, to submit a certificate from a physician, in order to retain their seats in the Convention. Adopted.

On motion of Mr. Robins, it was resolved, that until the next annual Convention, the expenses of the Bishop, upon his Episcopal visitations, be paid out of the Convention Fund, provided the amount so paid do not exceed the sum of $350.

Wm. H. Newbold, Moses Kempton, John Welsh, and Hon. T. M. Pettit, were chosen trustees of the Christmas Fund.

Mr. Robins, the treasurer of the Convention fund, stated that the balance in his hands did not authorize the usual appropriation toward the mileage of rectors.

The Rev. J. M. Douglass presented a petition from St. Thomas (African) Church, praying that the eighth revised regulation, precluding the lay delegates from that church from taking seats in this Convention, be rescinded.

A conversation ensued, when a motion to lay upon the table was put and carried—yeas 99, nays 50.

On motion, 2000 copies of the Bishop's address were ordered to be printed.

The amendment of the sixth article of the constitution, adopted at the last Convention, was voted for, and approved of by a large majority of both orders.

Resolved, That the following words in the 6th article of the constitution, viz.: 'all officers and committees appointed by ballot, must, in order to their election, receive the votes of a majority of the clerical members, and of the lay representatives,' be stricken out, and in place thereof there be inserted as follows:

"All officers and committees appointed by ballot, must, in order to their election, receive a majority of the whole number of votes cast at such election by each order; provided that there shall be no election, except of Secretary and Assistant Secretary, unless there are present at the time a majority of the clerical members and a majority of the lay representatives, who shall have appeared during the session, and been admitted to seats; and such election, except that of the Secretary and Assistant Secretary of the Convention, shall be held at five o'clock in the afternoon of the second day of the session; and provided also, that if no such majority of the clerical members and of the lay representatives be present at that time, or if said elections be not completed, such elections shall be postponed until ten o'clock of the morning of the next day, when the same shall be proceeded in, without regard to the number then present."

The tellers made a report of the result of the election for members of the Standing Committee, from which it appeared that the Rev. H. J. Morton, D. D., J. C. Clay, D. D., G. E. Hare, D. D., and M. A. De W. Howe, of the clergy, and Messrs. George M. Wharton and Thomas Robins, of the laity, had been elected.

The Bishop announced that there was still a vacancy of one clerical and three lay members of the Committee.

A second ballot was proposed, but a motion to adjourn till 9 o'clock, on Friday morning, finally prevailed.

FRIDAY.

The Convention met at 9 o'clock.

Previous to the call of the roll, the Bishop stated that he had been requested by the Hon. Joseph R. Ingersoll, one of the Directors of the Academy of Fine Arts, to invite the members of the Convention to visit the exhibition at that Institution.

On motion of the Rev. E. Y. Buchanan, the first revised regulation was amended so as to require that nominations for officers should be made on the first day of the session, in addition to the other business already prescribed.

Dr. Upfold presented a resolution in relation to the Convention Fund, authorizing the Treasurer to devise some plan and report to the next Convention to secure the necessary sum to meet the travelling expenses of clergymen, in addition to the other current expenses of the Convention. Adopted.

Mr. Wharton said that the above was but a prospective measure, and did not meet the exigency in relation to the clergymen now in attendance on the Convention, who were seriously embarrassed by the failure of the fund to meet their travelling expenses. He therefore proposed that a subscription of $300 should be raised among the lay members, which was approved of. Dr. Ducachet hoped that the clergy would have the privilege of contributing to this subscription if they think proper.

On motion, the Convention went into the election of the remaining members of the Standing Committee. While the tellers were engaged in counting the ballots, the following business was transacted:

The Rev. Dr. Dorr offered a resolution expressing the pleasure of the Convention in learning the success of the Floating Chapel, and applauding the efforts of the Churchman's Missionary Association for Seamen. He stated that the success of this enterprise was most flattering, and that it deserved encouragement.

Rev. Henry E. Montgomery, of All Saints' Church, offered a resolution that the petition of the African Church of St. Thomas be referred to a special committee of five, to report at the next Convention.

The Bishop announced that the Tellers were ready to report. The result of the ballottings showing that the Rev. Dr. John A. Vaughan, R. S. Smith, Hon. T. M. Pettit, and William Welsh, having received the highest number of votes, by both clerical and lay deputies, were duly elected members of the Standing Committee, which result was announced by the Bishop.

A motion to postpone the election of Delegates to the General Convention was agreed to.

The consideration of Mr. Montgomery's resolution was then resumed, and the vote was taken, and the resolution directed to be referred.

The Bishop then appointed the Rev. Mr. Montgomery, Dr. Hare, G. M. Wharton, Rev. C. Breck, and Tobias Wagner, said committee.

Mr. James M. Aertsen submitted an amendment to the fourth article of the Constitution, so as to require that lay delegates shall be elected by the congregation or pew holders of the Church they are to represent, and that the charters of the Church shall provide for their election in this manner.

An amendment was proposed, so as not to affect charters now in existence.

The subject was finally referred to a special committee of five to which the Bishop was subsequently added. The committee consists of the Rev. Dr. Ducachet, the Rev. Mr. Howe, Jas. Smith, Judge Stroud and Judge Conyngham.

Another amendment of the same article of the Constitution requiring that lay delegates should also be communicants as well as worshippers in the Churches they represent for six months prior to their election, was referred to the same committee.

A third amendment, proposed to allow every clergyman canonically resident for twelve months preceding within the diocese, a seat in the Convention. The reference of this was lost.

The case of the Rev. Benj. I. Douglass, whose right to a seat in the Convention, as a deacon assisting the rector of St. Matthew's Church, Francisville, had been the subject of a majority and minority report from the committee appointed for the purpose, came up for consideration, and led to a very animated discussion, in which the Rev. Dr. Hare, Judge Stroud, Dr. Upfold, Rev. Mr. Ogilby, Jas. S. Smith, George M. Wharton and others participated. The Bishop also explained the reasons which had induced him to place the name of Mr. Douglass upon the list of members. The question was finally decided in the affirmative, the vote being taken by orders on the following substitute for the resolution offered by the minority of the committee:

Resolved, That the Rev. Benj. I. Douglass is entitled to a seat in this Convention.

The Rev. Dr. Bowman, of Lancaster, brought up the subject of the fund now under the control of the corporation, for the relief of the widows and children of clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church. He mentioned that this fund now amounted to $107,000, through the wise management of its trustees, yet there were but very few who had taken advantage of the fund, by making the required yearly contributions, so as to secure its benefits to their wives and children. He urged that clergymen were generally unable to do so, from the small annual sum they received, being insufficient to do more than provide for the support of themselves and families. The speaker submitted a resolution to refer the subject to the standing committee, to devise some means to alter the fundamental laws of the corporation, so as to extend its benefits among the clergy, and report to the next Convention. He suggested the propriety of expending some portion of this fund in affording means of education for the children of clergymen.

Mr. James S. Smith, a member of the corporation, made some explanations. He stated that the fund, by the terms of the charter, could only be appropriated to the one purpose, that of affording relief to the widows and children of deceased clergymen. All had been done that was in the power of the corporation to extend the benefit of the fund by allowing the vestries of the churches to secure an annuity for the families of their rector, should he die while occupying that post.

The resolution was adopted.

On motion, 750 copies of the journal were ordered to be printed.

Mr. Robins, the Treasurer of the Convention Fund, stated that, as a sufficient sum had been placed in his hands for the purpose, he would move that $250 be appropriated to pay the mileage of clergymen. Adopted.

A vote of thanks was passed to the Vestry of St. Andrew's Church for the accommodation afforded during the session of the Convention in this church.

On motion of the Secretary, it was resolved, That the next meeting of the Convention be held in St. Andrew's Church, Philadelphia, on the third Tuesday of May, A. D., 1850, at 5 o'clock, P. M.

On motion, it was resolved to adjourn sine die, and the minutes were read and approved of.

The Bishop then addressed the members in an affectionate manner, congratulating them upon the perfect cordiality that had been maintained throughout the sittings of the Convention, and returning thanks for the courtesy manifested in their conduct towards their presiding officer. He also adverted to the fact, that during the past year the relations existing between himself and the clerical members of the body over which he presided, had not, in a single instance, been sundered by death. He closed with a devout hope, that the coming year might be as the past. After prayer and the benediction, the Convention adjourned sine die.

DIED, in this city, on Thursday, May 10th, GUSTAVUS COLHOUN, in the 83d year of his age.

To pay a just tribute to the dead, is the pleasing privilege and duty of the living. Long known in the community in which he lived, distinguished for high integrity in his mercantile career at a time when Philadelphia merchants were known over the world, and connected, during a long life, with the Protestant Episcopal Church, we feel that in the death of Gustavus Colhoun, one of the few remaining links which connect us with the past has been suddenly severed. And, though the gospel of Christ needs no witness from man, it is yet pleasing to observe the fullness of its sustaining and illuminating power in those who have professed its holy principles. The subject of this notice, for a long period a communicant member of the Christian church, seemed, as he approached his end, to approach also in nearness to his Saviour. He had long leaned on the Almighty arm, and daily found comfort in communion with Him, so that when summoned by Him, he had not then to prepare for the great change, but was found ready "to depart and be with Christ." In his last short illness, he was heard repeating the line, "I would not live away," and he delighted to express his unwavering faith in the Triune Jehovah; and his reliance on the alone merits of his Redeemer; so that he seemed, indeed, to pass by an almost imperceptible change from the church below to that glorious, "general assembly and church of the first-born," in the mansions on high.

DIED, On Friday the 4th instant, in Carlisle Miss. SARAH CAMPBELL. Her friends and acquaintances at a distance (for whose information this notice is published) are well prepared by their knowledge of her exalted christian character, to learn, that death was met by her, only as a summons to enter into a peaceful and happy rest. Her life on earth was one of labor, the labor of love; labor which was not in vain, because it was done in the Lord; and when she saw that her work was over, her faith rested calmly and confidently upon the inheritance that lay before her. She knew that she already enjoyed, in the Church, the first fruits of that inheritance, inasmuch as she has been made a member of Christ, and joint-heir with Him of his glory, and she was thus enabled to wait with patience for the accomplishment of that hope which was anchored within the veil. In hope she waiteth still, looking for the Bridegroom's coming, and enjoying the promise on which she often and fondly dwelt—"He who hath begun the good work in you, will perform it until the day of Jesus Christ."

THE FEMALE PRAYER BOOK SOCIETY.

MR. EDITOR,—I feel assured the Female Prayer Book Society would not, on any account, interfere with the collections to be made on Monday, in Whitsun week, by the Bishop White Prayer Book Society; but I hope, on the Centenary Anniversary, they will not be forgotten by private contributors, as I am credibly informed that their books, both 12mo. and 18mo. are far cheaper and better than those distributed by any Society in the Union. But one appropriation was made to them last year by our churches; and they have been frequently refused on account of their always being free from debt, the only solitary case I have ever known that contradicted the saying, "Honesty is the best policy." I have heard they send their large and beautiful edition to all the Bishops in the far West; and, had they the means, they could as easily send them by the thousand as the hundred, which they, at present, are compelled to do, in consequence of their very inadequate means.

'VOICE OF THE ANGLICAN CHURCH ON CONFESSION.'

We feel much honored in being made the medium of communicating the following excellent letter of the Bishop of North Carolina. For ourselves, we beg leave to say, that we knew too well the character of this eminent Prelate as a scholar and theologian, to suppose, for a moment, that he was the editor, either directly or indirectly, of the Tract in question, and that all those whose opinions were worthy of respect, and with whom we have conversed, have expressed the same opinion. Indeed, we have not seen it attributed to him in any respectable quarter.

JACKSON, May 2d, 1849.

To the Clergy of the Diocese of North Carolina:

DEAR BRETHREN:—I did not see, till yesterday, the review in "The Churchman," of the Tract styled "The Voice of the Anglican Church on Confession," or I should sooner have declared to you my conviction of its unfairness and untruthfulness—particularly as its authorship, I am told, has been ascribed to myself. This, for my sake and yours, I feel bound wholly to disclaim; and to submit the following facts as explanatory of my instrumentality in its circulation.

Having some eighteen months ago been moved, in a spirit of love and anxiety for the souls committed to me, to deliver, while on a visitation to my Diocese, a course of sermons, "On the Obedience of Faith," one of which related to the moral necessity, under certain circumstances, of private confession, as provided for in our system of discipline, and having, in that sermon, referred to the views of the Anglican divines on the point, I was anxious to have these views presented in a form accessible to all the members of my Diocese, that all might judge for themselves of the sense of our interpreters.

Being in New York a few months after, and learning that a Tract professing to contain what I desired, was already prepared and submitted for publication, I expressed my gratification, and ordered a certain number of copies for circulation. From the high standing of the Presbyters said to have been consulted in preparing the Tract, no suspicion crossed my mind of the possibility of unfairness in the compilation. This, with the state of my health, which, for the time, forbid all mental labor, prevented any attempt on my part, to verify the extracts.

I returned to my Diocese, in the expectation of soon receiving the copies I had ordered. Months passed off, and no copies came.

Business calling me again to New York, I inquired the cause of the delay, and found it had been occasioned by some misunderstanding with the publisher. A new arrangement was made, by which, after the publication of the Tract, with some extracts of my own, it was to have been appended to my sermons, about to be put to press.

When it finally appeared, I found my extracts not included; but was still ignorant of any unfairness in what was published.

Some three or four weeks ago, however, I received an intimation through the publishers, that such unfairness was charged. By the return mail, I requested them, if upon examination, this, in any degree, was found to be just, to make no further use of the tract on my account, and to stop the circulation of my copies. Yesterday, for the first time, I had an opportunity of reading the review of "Nemo," in the Churchman, though, two or three days before, I had heard of its existence. I now avail myself of the first mail, to communicate these facts, and to express my sorrow, that any instrumentality of mine should have given occasion, for one moment to suspect me capable of aiding, in any way, or for any cause, the publication of so unreal and deceptive a view of the teaching, on Confession, of the Anglican fathers, adduced in the Tract under consideration. Indeed, the real voice of our portion of the Catholic Church on this subject is sufficiently distinct and solemn, one would think, in this age of alarming pride and worldliness, to excite the suspicion that what, in more faithful times, might be safely viewed as an exception, had, by our present, urgent necessities, been converted into the general rule; and sufficiently pertinent, as my sermons will soon show, to my own teaching, to shield me from all imputation of having been tempted, in this matter, to pervert the truth.

Ever, faithfully and affectionately,

Your friend and brother in Christ,

L. SILLIMAN IVES.

THE CONQUERER.

BY CHROMIA.

"Lift up your heads, O ye gates; and be lift up, ye everlasting doors, and the King of glory shall come in.—Who is the King of glory? the Lord strong and mighty; even the Lord mighty in battle."

Unbar your gates,—rebellious world!
For Christ's blest banner is unfurled,
And 'neath its folds, God's hosts shall stand,
Made firm in combat by His hand,
Until with loud triumphant cry,
His pennant shall be raised on high,
Above your turrets bold.

Unbar your gates, doomed world! Before
Jehovah's wrath shall reach your shore;
Your battlements He'll break in twain,
Your boasted strength shall all in vain
Contend with His great might: His breath
Shall blast your vaunted troops with death,
And spread forth dire dismay.

Quickly unbar your gates, for see,
For you sweet peace is offered free!
And in the parchment pure, is traced
A Cross, the sign of pardoning grace.
'Tis by our royal King's behest,
That with this mercy you are blest;
Then sign the saving scroll.

Unbar your portals, ere too late;
Refusal, signs your endless fate;
Cling to a pitying Savior's love,
Or torturing misery you'll prove.
God's justice spurns the rebel soul,
And whilst eternal ages roll,
No peace shall quell its woe.

Obeys, proud world! Your gates unfold!
The Conqueror comes; He charges bold:
He breaks your bars,—subdues all foes,
And loud the cry Victorious grows.
Who is this King so glorious,—who?
'Tis Christ! Your gates He passes through,
And God Supreme,—he reigns!

"THE SPIRIT, IN OUR HEARTS."

MR. EDITOR:—

I am sure that you and our readers will agree with me, that theology and personal religion are vitally connected,—that an understanding of the acts and relations of the Divine Three, in our behalf, will add to the strength and the efficacy of whatever of true piety we have in our souls. The two should always be combined. Men may grow largely in knowledge without growing in grace, or even without apparent grace; and men may grow in grace while in the merest twilight of knowledge. The latter case is infinitely the better. It is not, however, a vigorous growth in spiritual goodness; that requires the co-operation, yea, the intense co-operation, of both the head and the heart.

Deeply interesting, to him who would increase both in knowledge and in grace, is the renewing and sustaining office of the Holy Ghost, the Paraclete, in the commencement and through the whole course of regeneration from sin to holiness and holy happiness. A theological view of this His benign function is given in our Lord's promise, that the Comforter would "reprove (convince) the world of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment." (John xvi.) We claim this promise for the individual piety of the Christian; not allowing its confined or chief application to the outward affairs or character of Jesus, or to the open interests and prospects of the Church,—both these latter interpretations being defective in comprehensive unity and accuracy. Respectable commentators have indeed (yet with injustice to the topic of interior godliness) regarded it as a pre-nunciation of the miraculous gifts received by the apostles on or after the day of Pentecost,—which miracles, attesting the claim of Jesus, and vindicating and establishing His upright character, would, for the extension and welfare of the Church, make broadly manifest the "sin" of men in rejecting Him, the "righteousness" or innocence of the Redeemer, once accounted a malefactor and impostor, and the "judgment," or judicial victory, or dominion, He had won, and was for ever to maintain, over the prince of this world. But,—besides that the twofold object of honouring Christ and aiding the Church, ends in the salvation of souls,—this interpretation can refer to those only who should personally witness the apostolic (or other) post-pentecostal miracles; for, after they ceased, and were appealed to as merely on record, the miracles done before the Pentecost would as effectually prove the mission, the character, and the offices of Christ, as those after that date. This actual view of miracles, whether in that age or previously, was not given to "the world"; the great majority of men hear of them from the small minority who see them; yet "the world," the world at large, was to be "reproved of sin, righteousness, judgment." The result is, that the operations of the Comforter,—who was bestowed, though not so abundantly, before Christ came to the earth and left it to return to the Father,—the operations of the Paraclete, I say, here alluded to, are more general than His extraordinary gifts ever were, or were intended to be. They can be none other than the ordinary workings of the Heavenly Sanctifier. The perception of "sin," the "righteousness" intimated, the "judgment," the "reproving" or convincing men of them, denote inward influences, not external evidences or furtherances of the gospel,—these convictions are matters of individual and personal religion; for of such triumphs or labours of the Spirit, universality (their being as unlimited as "the world") is, in one or other form, perpetually predicated in the Bible,—His moral and converting graces are copiously provided for all,—most copiously streaming after Christ had actually paid their purchase-price.

And the theology of personal godliness is not to be slighted, because greatly abused, or because enormously disfigured by cant, by silliness, by party hallucination, by party spite. Much more should it not be undervalued, when it is the only check to a peremptory computation of our good and pious works, of our good and pious emotions: these works and emotions cannot too largely abound; but it is only by sound doctrinal views that faith will avert their ending in themselves, as so much prayer, so much contrition, so much alms, so much fasting, purity, zeal, and make them harmonize with the whole functions and the glory intact of the First and the Second Paraclete. Such doctrinal principles further likewise a wholesome attention to our operative sentiments, our operative feelings, our whole godly growth within.

The graces and the happiness of true piety were, by our Saviour, promised as the fruit of the mission of the Comforter. And in this sense, that Divine Supporter, instead of withdrawing, as He did in respect of miracles, was to "abide for ever" with "the world," with all throughout "the world" who receive Him. Thus "beareth He witness of Christ" in holy bosoms: and they "bear the witness" onwards, the Spirit ratifying and quickening it, to souls yet awaiting His full power and consolation.

The appellation "Comforter" does not express the whole meaning of the original word, PARACLETE. Its primary sense is, "one called to assist another in a judicial proceeding,"—an advocate, pleading for a delinquent put upon his trial,—the Saviour being thus our "Advocate with the Father," (1 John ii. 1,) our interceding "Paraclete,"—so, in the Greek. But here we adopt that signification of the word "advocate" which corresponds with the forensic office of Christ while on the earth; for the Spirit was "sent" as "another Paraclete," in place of Him who had gone to heaven. And the forensic office common to the two was that of a Counsellor, warning the sinner of the law condemning him, and encouraging the penitent with the hope or assurance of gracious immunity, acquittal through pardon. The Paraclete, therefore, now in "the world," is "the world's" Counsellor, Adviser, Monitor,—and "the Comforter" (the term ought to be more commonly used) is to "reprove," or, as in the margin, "convince of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment." We are at issue with God, our "iniquities separating between us and Him:" that Counsellor admonishes us within: and His monitions or convictions are concerning the three particulars mentioned.

1. Fundamental in this work of the Holy Ghost is the "convincing men of sin,"—and this, "because they believe not on Christ,"—because they have not faith in Him, or, in the case of the heathen and the ignorant, such faith as will accept Him when duly made known to them,—faith in their need of a Saviour,—because men feel not their "vileness" sufficiently to flee utterly out of themselves for hope, and "take even by violence" the redemption provided them by God. Until men, even those called good, thus apprehend their depravity, they are not "convinced," self-convicted, of all their "sin," they are not conscious of the entire burden that loads and stupifies their souls, and which will bring them "wrath in the day of wrath": vital, therefore, is their need of the "convicting" admonitions of the Paraclete, who alone can turn their deadness into feeling, their unconcern into anxiety, their self-exuse into self-accusation. Faith in Christ implies that we account His grievous work on earth and on the cross the mournful proof that all sin, be it greater or less, is supremely hateful to God and ruinous of our peace and highest welfare,—and therefore that it must all be abandoned, cordially and unreservedly. Faith in Christ further implies, in view of the obstinate adherence of the sinful mind and heart to even the most godly, that there is no merit whatever in the very highest of our virtuous attainments,—nothing that can claim from God either reconciliation or forbearance,—but that the whole procuring cause of pardon must flow from a source without the fallen being,—that Source being none other than the blood of the Cross. Such faith is the token of reconciliation with our Heavenly Father. Such faith the Divine Monitor will commend to our souls and infuse into them, if, abandoning wickedness and folly, we truly apply to Him.

Such faith is the object and the result of His wholesome convictions of sin. A right feeling of depravity, and of God's inflexible hatred of it, leads to self-condemnation; and in this there can be no sincerity, unless we forsake the conduct we reprobate. That holy change effectually begun,—while we continue improving, the Paraclete will still "convince" us of remaining sin and infirmity, and thus turn all our hope from self, and converge them, with no subtraction whatever, upon the crucified Lamb of God. Thus believing on Him, and our principles and conduct attesting this vital faith, convictions of sin have produced their hallowed effect. Though the convictions remain in a less degree in even the most godly, and they still feel sorrowfully their yet adhering depravity, it is that they may become brighter jewels of Christ. And, as the brightening of an imperfect creature may ever be more brightened, conviction and faith perpetually act and react upon each other, for the perpetual advancement and ripening of the saint, through his whole probationary term.

This function of the Paraclete, as the Counsellor, is—to persuade us of our criminality and our terrific peril, and to advise us to plead guilty without reserve, with entire prostration.

2. Pursuing the forensic relation, the Divine Counsellor "convincing" men "of righteousness," i. e. of justification, "because Christ has gone to the Father, and we see Him no more." Justification pertains especially to true faith; and when, through the Spirit, we have attained to believing on the Cross, it is through Him also that we have the comfort of the pardon that supervenes. We are to distinguish between the act of pardon, and the "convincing" of it here mentioned. The act of justification is effected by God Himself, through Christ, as our Intercessor and Advocate at the right hand of the Father; hence the language "because I go to the Father, and ye see me no more," because I go hence to plead for you with God: the High-Priest must be in heaven, behind the veil, "unseen" on earth, to plead the cause of each faithful soul, before the Spirit will encourage them to hope for the ardently desired success.—The metaphor (allegory indeed) of a court or tribunal is complete. We stand there in the person of our Advocate,—who pleads for us that we believe in Him, having cast away our transgressions, and being renewed in heart,—and that the Father has "given" all such to Him, to be through Him freely pardoned and accepted, whatever have been their sins, and though they are still imperfect. This plea of the Advocate is allowed. And then, by the Paraclete, who "knows the mind of Christ and the deep things of God," we are advised, "convinced," that we are forgiven, and so accounted "righteous" before the Judge.

This "conviction" of pardon is not a mere feeling; for we cannot know that any feeling comes from the Spirit. Feelings,—quietism being utterly an illusion,—feelings, be they gentle or powerful, attend the religious course of believers, varying with our temperament and affairs, and exceedingly gentle in unstimulated early piety: but that they come from God directly, and are not simply mental excitement or depression, animal fluctuations, we have, we can have, no proof. The "conviction," therefore, of the Paraclete, of our being absolved, must be sought, not in the mind or spirits only or chiefly, but also, and far more conclusively, in further changes wrought in the justified person,—in the principles, in the affections, in the conduct. If the heart and life are becoming pure, we may be certain that the good fruit indicates a tree "made good;" and if the tree be no longer corrupt, it is one "which our Heavenly Father hath planted," taking it from the waste of depravity to the garden of grace. In the humble view of our 'deeds, brought to the light, and made manifest that they are wrought in God,' through faith in Christ, we have the testimony,—more or less perceived according to natural or habitual sensibility, like all sacred emotions,—the gradually ripening "conviction" from the Adviser, that we are justified, absolved from criminality at the heavenly tribunal.

"Righteousness" and justification are here synonymous. A man wholly 'unconvinced of sin' may exult, in self-approbation for virtue and merit; but, being sinful, as all are, and the more so from being unconvinced, he omits, in his estimate and in his self-knowledge, the basis of his good character, conversion from sin, conversion whether mild or severe; and hence, his purity wants both the depth in the heart, and the loving gratitude for rescue and restoration, which mark the truth and reality of the holiness that has passed the ordeal of the Sanctifier. Virtue so defective cannot be the work of the perfect new-creating Power.

When the Counsellor would evince to us that we are justified, He points our affectionate hope to our upright conduct and our lowly faith, and superinduces the humble confidence, that the hallowing of our nature infers the success of the Advocate who is "gone" to the veiled Presence where He is "seen no more." And having thus, in our contrition and penitent obedience and controlling belief in Christ, the evidence that Christ hath gained our pardon, we find "joy and peace," and "abound in hope,"—happiness, more or less marked,—happiness it is, whether quiet or buoyant,—happiness, "trembling" indeed, yet broadly different from the agitation of mind in which we were first convinced of sin. Now, also, obedience springs from love instead of fear; for, as every thoughtful man must fear while uninformed of his reconciliation with God, so, as that testimony in his heart brightens, the "terrors of the Lord" gradually vanish in the mounting and culminating affection and love. The bond of affection and the cords of love, tempered always with bland humility, fearing while not fearing, become the preponderant relation between the child of God and his reconciled Father.

3. To complete the forensic work, the Paraclete "convincing" men of "judgment," of their sentence, their gracious acquittal, "because the prince of this world is judged." Conspicuously "judged" and foiled is the "prince of this world" in the recovery of the soul from his foul and baneful dominion. This his moral defeat within is a far more decisive overthrow than the casting out of demons, the demolition of idols, or any outward discomfiture. It must indeed be viewed with a spiritual perception; yet, all not absolutely destitute of the spiritual faculty, will acknowledge, in the renewing and restoration of the believer, the vanquishing of the fallen prince.—This "judgment" of Satan may be closely studied. "We have an Advocate with the Father." An advocate denotes opposition; and the opposition is made before the Judge,—as in the Psalms, (cix.) where an imprecation on a wicked man is, "let Satan stand at his right hand; [where the accuser stood in the courts;] when he shall be judged, let him be condemned,"—as in Job, (ii.) where this evil spirit came before God to accuse that exemplary person,—as also in Zechariah, (iii.) who, "before the Angel of the Lord," the Lord Himself, saw the evil one "at the right hand" of the high-priest "to resist him." So is represented the "accuser of the brethren before God,"—he who "for envy hath delivered them,"—against all good our "adversary," as the name Satan imports,—and eminently our "adversary" or opponent in the momentous issue of immortality, as he is pictured in the holy words we are explaining. But through the benign agency of the Paraclete, we are enabled to exult, however "tremblingly," in the inspired language, "He is near that justifieth me; who will contend with me? let us stand together [the opponent on the right hand]: who is mine adversary? . . . behold, the Lord God will help me; who is he that shall condemn me?" (Isa. l. 8, 9.) When the Holy Ghost "convincing" the heart of justification at the heavenly bar, He unfolds to it that the "adversary" there is "judged," or (to preserve the allegory) has failed in his cause, by means of the prevailing intercession of the "Advocate with the Father."

But this whole forensic process is progressive. After the first effectual conviction of sin, and hope of pardon and acquittal, our further sins and infirmities require further conviction and further hope,—if it be not that we are obstinately "casting away our confidence." Not till probation is ended, that trial which is perpetual while we remain in the flesh, is "the prince of this world" finally "judged," defeated beyond new attempts to ruin us: till then, though we "stand," we must "take heed lest we fall," lest we draw back unto perdition." And an unspeakable encouragement thus to persevere is afforded by the repeated "judgments" we obtain over Satan through our interceding High-priest, and the renewed intimations of our victories, imparted to us by our Counsellor. This confidence of the complete and eternal pardon is a very exalted comfort of the Spirit, never to be confounded with animal sensation or animal spirits, or with aught that is enthusiasm or allied to enthusiasm,—never to be claimed or imagined by any but the mature, the established, the continually persevering Christian.

We now discover, kindly reader, that the Paraclete has been throughout the "COMFORTER," even when piercing us for our transgressions. "Faithful are the wounds of a friend:" and faithful is the alarm sounded to him who is slumbering on the brink of ruin. In that alarm is the foundation of the entire victory, and of all the consolation of a fallen soul. Behold, then, the deep, the searching, the refining and brightening office of the Heavenly Comforter! He founds not the invigoration "upon the sand" of a claim within, but "on the Rock" of worth without, worth beyond calculation.

But you object, that whatever in this process can be observed of men, may be acted, by the weak or the hypocritical! Alas! it may. So, however, may good works, and godly graces, and all Christian tempers and tokens, be acted. Be careful, then, that in reprobating the counterfeit, you reject not the genuine manifestations of the Paraclete. Representation, fictitious imitation, implies reality for its basis; and nothing is more real than His energy within, and His energetic gladdening. The pretence is annoying and disgusting, it is miserably contemptible; but it ought not to disgust us with the well-attested profit and happiness of communion with the Sanctifier. In the ranks of personal religion, as in all the wide community of the Church, the tares must grow with the wheat. God detects the imposition. And "in the time of the harvest," He will pronounce the everlasting discrimination.

The Holy Monitor has the function of "convincing THE WORLD of sin, of righteousness, of judgment." None, however, can enjoy the two latter blessings who reject the one that is first and fundamental. The "world," every man, is "reproved of sin," whether effectually "convinced" or not; and all throughout "the world" who accept and further the 'reproving conviction,' are "convinced of righteousness and judgment." It is the declaration of Christ Himself, that to the whole "world" is open all renewing light and life. Opportunities indeed differ, whether of knowing the truth, or of intellectual or social aid, of the help of education, tradition, custom, pre-judgment, law, &c., in following it; and this will diversify the degrees of holiness attainable: but the essential features of the heavenly change, discernible by God, (whether by His creatures likewise matters not,) are within the reach of every one fallen in Adam and redeemed through Christ. All this inequality God can rectify hereafter.

Why then does not every soul, every soul evangelized, reflect, in godly sentiments and works, the hallowed Light shed into it? Because the Light shineth in darkness, and the darkness comprehendeth it not." All that is wanting is on the part of the sinner: for 'Christ hath tasted death for every man, is the Ransom for all, the Propitiation for the sins of the whole world;' and the second Paraclete, in agreement with the universality of redemption, brings from the first Paraclete "the true light which lighteth every man that cometh into the world," and is "sent" by Him to 'reprove and to convince the world.' Presumptuous offender, thy hardness of heart lies at thine own door! Perpetual are the admonitions infused within us. Never cease we then communing with the Spirit; never cease we communing frankly and profoundly with our own spirits, in which He is breathing hallowed whispers. There let us gather, in our inmost souls, deeper and deeper "convictions of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment;" and, like the early saints, we shall "walk in the fear of the Lord, and in the comfort of the Holy Ghost."

Bishop H. U. Ostrander

P. S. About a quarter of a century ago, I paraphrased in rhyme the foregoing commentary; which (with my late piece on the heavenly Intercession,) is a few years earlier in date. Valueless as a composition, the lines (retouched) are here annexed, as they offer a devotional peroration of the article.

HYMN TO THE PARACLETE.

Hail Paraclete! we Thee confess
Envoy of Christ to all mankind;
Through Thee, its sin, its righteousness,
And judgment, every heart may find.
Dead, careless, unbelieving souls
Convince of guilt, reprove of sin;
Till faith, with hallowed power, controls
Fault, frailty, vice, without, within.
Thus pure, their righteousness impart
In Christ; who past the Vail hath gone,
To justify each new-born heart,
Pleading its pardon at the Throne.
That judgment to their hope declare,—
The Prince of earth there foiled, repelled,
Th' Accuser's envy baffled there,
And they in Jesus upright held.
Hail Paraclete! to Thee we bow:
Convince of sin, and righteousness,
And judgment-victory blandly show,
Till all the world Thy counsel bless!

Bishop O.

* Observe how the expression "the world" is resolved in the two cases respectively:—"of sin, because they believe not on me," the world at large;—"of righteousness, because ye see me no more," the willing of the world, whom the Redeemer is justifying beyond the celestial veil.

On the Sunday after Ascension, in the morning, at St. Mary's Church, Hamilton Village, the Bishop confirmed eleven. In the afternoon, the Bishop held a confirmation in the Floating Church of the Redeemer. On this most interesting occasion, the Rev. Dr. Upfold, of Pittsburg, preached, and the Bishop addressed the congregation in reference to the holy rite to be administered. Eight persons were confirmed, two of which were sailors and the remainder belonged to the families of seamen. The large congregation, assembled, was for the most part composed of sailors. In the evening, at the Church of the Nativity, the Bishop confirmed eight persons.

MARYLAND.

CONVOCATION OF THE CLERGY AND LAYING OF A CORNER STONE IN CUMBERLAND, MD.

The convocation of the clergy of Washington and Alleghany counties, Md., held its second stated meeting on Wednesday, and Thursday, the 16th and 17th of May, in Emanuel Parish, Alleghany county. There were present the Rev. T. B. Lyman, of St. John's Parish, and the Rev. Messrs J. B. Kerfoot, and R. Trevett of the college of St. James, Washington county, and the Rev. Messrs. D. H. Buel, Wm. Greene, J. H. Kehler, and L. H. Johns, of Alleghany county. The convocation held meetings for business on each of these two days, at which among other proceedings the Rev. R. Trevett was appointed preacher of the convocation sermon at the next session, and the Rev. J. B. Kerfoot substitute. Incipient steps were also taken towards the establishment of a mission within the limits of the convocation. During the two days of convocation divine service was held and a sermon preached in Emanuel church morning and evening. On Wednesday morning the Rev. T. B. Lyman preached the convocation sermon, and the Rev. J. B. Kerfoot preached the stated sermon on christian education. On the morning of Thursday, the feast of the Ascension, the Holy Communion was administered.

On the afternoon of Ascension day, the Rev. D. H. Buel, rector of the parish, laid the corner stone of St. Peter's, a new parish church of Emanuel Parish. He was assisted in this service by the other clergy of the convocation, the Rev. J. B. Kerfoot reading the proper psalms, the Rev. R. Trevett reading the lessons, the Rev. L. H. Johns announcing the metrical psalm and hymn, and the Rev. T. B. Lyman, delivering the address, which was very appropriate and impressive, and added not a little to the deep interest of the service. The new church thus happily begun in this parish is urgently demanded by the increase of the congregation and the rapid growth of the town. It is to be built after a design by John Notman, Esq., of Philadelphia, and under his direction. It will be of stone in the pointed style of architecture, of the transition period between early English and decorated. It is designed to accommodate six hundred persons, and will consist of nave, chancel, transepts, south porch, and a tower and spire on the north side of the chancel between it and the north transept. All these parts are well proportioned to each other and finely developed, and altogether it will be one of the most picturesque and pleasing as well as one of the most correct churches to be found in our country. The site is remarkably commanding and beautiful, and afforded the architect every advantage (of which so far as the limited means would allow he has made the best use) for giving proper position and fine effect to his church.

The very interesting services of this convocation were well attended, and have, we trust, left good and lasting impressions. The only thing that marred the enjoyment of the occasion was the deeply regretted absence of our beloved Bishop, who would have been present and have performed the ceremony of laying the corner stone, had he not been providentially detained by sickness.

TENNESSEE CONVENTION.

The twenty-first Annual Convention of the Church in the Diocese of Tennessee commenced its session in Immanuel Church, La Grange, on Wednesday, May 2d, and closed on Saturday, the 5th. The following elections were made.

The Rev. J. T. Wheat, D. D., Secretary. The Rev. Messrs. Wheat and Tones, and Messrs. F. B. Fogg and I. Shelby, M. D., Standing Committee. The Rev. Dr. Wheat, Dr. Page, Mr. Crane, Mr. Cressey, Lucius J. Polk, Francis B. Fogg, G. A. Henry, H. G. Smith, delegates to General Convention.

The Bishop, ex-officio, and the Rev. Messrs. Wheat and Cressey, and Messrs. Lucius J. Polk, and Andrew J. Polk, Executive Committee of Ravenscroft Seminary.

Resolutions were passed commending Ravenscroft Seminary to the patronage and fostering of churchmen in the diocese and without it.

An amendment to the constitution was proposed, requiring delegates to the Convention to be in full communion with the Church. It was rejected.

The meetings of the convention in this diocese have always been distinguished for unity and harmony. The present was not less so than always heretofore. The present number of clergymen belonging to the diocese, including the Bishop, is twenty-one.

On the Sunday after the close of the convention, Mr. John Ambrose Wheelock was admitted to the holy order of Deacons.

The next convention meets in St. Paul's church, Franklin, on the first Wednesday in July, 1850.

In haste, truly yours in Christ,

H.

VIRGINIA.

VIRGINIA CONVENTION.—The convention of this diocese met at Charlottesville on Wednesday, the 16th instant. The Bishop and Assistant Bishop were present.

The duties of the convention were, as usual, commenced by divine service, morning prayer being read by the Rev. Robert Nelson. The convention sermon was preached by the Rev. William Friend, from Acts ix. 6, Lord what wilt thou have me to do.

The number of delegates was small at this first meeting, but was increased in the afternoon, when another session of the convention was held. On this occasion the addresses of the Bishops were delivered, stating their Episcopal services during the past year, and concluding with reference to subjects which required the consideration of the convention.

The subject of William and Mary College, and the question relating to its presidency, which was presented by Bishop Johns, was referred to a committee of ten.

Thursday morning.—After the usual devotions by the Assistant Bishop, the convention received the parochial reports and attended to some miscellaneous business until 11 o'clock, when morning prayer was read by the Rev. John Hoff and a sermon preached by the Rev. Charles Mann, from St. John vi. 7. After divine service the convention adjourned to Friday morning.

Friday morning.—After the usual prayers, on the opening of the convention, by the Assistant Bishop, a new constitution for the Theological Seminary was submitted by its trustees for ratification, and was adopted.

The committee appointed in regard to the Presidency of William and Mary College, presented the following report:

"The committee to whom was referred the communication of the visitors of William and Mary College, relative to the acceptance of the presidency of the college, by the Right Rev. John Johns, have bestowed on the subject the careful consideration which was due to its own importance and the source from which it emanates, and regarding the proposition now made to the convention of such importance, as that it may be the duty of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Virginia to make trial of the same, recommend the adoption of the following preamble and resolution.

"Whereas on former occasions, the partial and temporary services of the Bishop and also of the Assistant Bishop of this diocese have been given to other objects without materially interfering with their Episcopal duties.

Resolved, That if the Bishop and Assistant Bishop, after further conference with the visitors of William and Mary College, shall be of opinion that the interests of religion and literature will be promoted by Bishop Johns' accepting the presidency of the college, the convention hereby give their consent to such acceptance, his continuance in the same being subject to the future advice and action of the convention, and Provided, that until the meeting of the next convention, he shall be at liberty to devote such time to the performance of Episcopal service, as in the opinion of the Bishop and himself the interests of the Church may require."

The vote upon the question was 73 ayes, 28 noes.

The convention at 3 o'clock adjourned to Saturday morning.

Saturday morning.—The convention was opened this morning with prayer by Bishop Johns; the subsequent afternoon session by Bishop Meade.

After the election of the standing committee, the reports of committees were read.

The whole of the morning, from half past 8 to 3, and the afternoon, from 4 to 7 o'clock, were occupied with the consideration of the new code of Canons, and by far the greater part was devoted to that respecting offences for which members of the Church may be repelled from the communion, which has been more than once cited in our paper.

After the discussion in the house, Bishops Meade and Johns expressed their sentiments on the subject, but for the reasons above stated we cannot undertake to report them. They were listened to with deep interest, and evidently produced much impression upon the convention.

The vote on the Canon was taken by orders when it appeared that there were of the clergy 42 ayes, 12 noes, of the laity 19 ayes, 22 noes.

In the evening, at 8 o'clock, the convention again assembled. Mr. B. B. Minor moved a reconsideration of the vote taken at the close of the afternoon session. He remarked that the majority of the laity which defeated the proposed Canon was small, while the vote of the clergy was large, that one of the lay-members, kept away by sickness, would have voted for it, and that the convention was comparatively a small one. In these circumstances he moved the reconsideration of the vote with a view to lay the Canon on the table until the next convention. Both the motion to reconsider, and to lay on the table, were carried unanimously. So the Canon lies over for the consideration of the next convention.

The proposed code of Canons with some amendments was adopted, and some miscellaneous business transacted. A vote of thanks was passed for the kind hospitality of the citizens of Charlottesville, which doubtless was most cordially adopted by all. After which, and prayer by the Assistant Bishop, the convention adjourned sine die.

The place appointed for the next meeting of the Convention is ALEXANDRIA.

The number of clergymen in attendance was 63, of laity, 45.

MASSACHUSETTS.

MISSION TO SEAMEN.—The Anniversary meeting of the Mission to Seamen in the port of Boston, Rev. Mr. Robinson, Missionary, was held in St. Paul's Church, on Tuesday evening. The Rt. Rev. the Bishop of the Diocese opened the meeting with a selection of suitable prayers and collects, after which, the Missionary read his annual report, detailing the operations of the past year, the mode of conducting the mission, and several interesting and encouraging facts, showing that the efforts used to benefit the seamen have not been in vain. The Bishop then made an interesting address in relation to missionary efforts among seamen. His first position was, that missions to seamen tend directly to promote the evangelization of the heathen world, and thus not only benefit a class, but the world. The vices and immoralities of seamen, are the most powerful obstacles in the way of converting the heathen—a living contradiction of the gospel. We must change the character of our representatives to heathen shores—we must make Christian men of them, if we would convert the world.

Hence, in the second place, the Rt. Rev. speaker remarked, that the duty of missions to seamen, grows out of the general duty of sending the gospel to all men. If this be our duty, the only question is how it is to be done—a choice of means and instrumentalities; and the conversion of seamen is one of the most powerful and effective means.

Thirdly, he asked what was Christianity, and then dwelt on its general, diffusive nature; it is not to be confined to any country or race of men, but to all—to the world; and seamen are included within the scope of this command and obligation.

The meeting then closed with the singing of the 194th hymn, and benediction by the Bishop.

Handwritten notes: The meeting then closed with the singing of the 194th hymn, and benediction by the Bishop.

MASSACHUSETTS.—The Bishop's address to the convention contains the following summary of Episcopal services during the past year.

"The results of the preceding statements are as follows:—I have confirmed, during the year, 341 persons,—being more by 105 than the number for the year preceding; consecrated 2 churches; laid the corner-stone of 1 church; ordained 1 deacon, and 2 priests; and 3 parishes have been organized."

Clerical Changes.

The Rev. John A. Merrick has been transferred to the diocese of New Jersey, as assistant to the rector of St. Mary's Church, Burlington. Letters and papers will be directed accordingly.

DEFERRED ITEMS FROM ENGLISH PAPERS.

We copy the following from the "Colonial Church Chronicle."

The Church Review. No. IV. New Haven, Connecticut; and London, G. P. Putnam.

This able organ of the American Church (the previous Numbers of which we noticed at page 312) continues to be distinguished for the sober judgment and sound learning of its articles. In the present number we may particularize the article founded on the recent American edition of Bishop Horne's Works, in which we have a dispassionate review of the religious aspect of the eighteenth century, and a judicious appreciation of the singular merits of that apostolic prelate. The writer of the article on the "Syriac Ignatius" has the advantage, which some of his English contemporaries have not possessed, of understanding the language of the work which he reviews. As to the genuineness of the Syriac edition, he comes to a conclusion more in accordance with the opinion of Mr. Cureton and the Chevalier Bunsen, than with the judgment of the recent editors of the "Patres Apostolici" in Germany and England—Dr. Hefele and Dr. Jacobson.

The annual meeting of the Church Missionary Society was held yesterday in Exeter Hall, the Earl of Chichester in the chair. The report shows the funds of the Society to be in a satisfactory state, the income amounting to upwards of 101,000*l.* and the expenditure being 87,000*l.* The last year having been the 50th anniversary of the society, a jubilee was held, and a jubilee fund formed, which amounts to 53,000*l.* It is proposed to appropriate 20,000*l.* of this sum to the fund already formed for the relief of sick and aged missionaries. The Bishops of Norwich and Winchester, and several other speakers, addressed the meeting.

The French troops took possession of Civita Vecchia on St. Mark's day without opposition. Whether the French intend to help the Pope, or to help themselves, remains to be seen. Certainly they have not had so large a naval force in the Mediterranean for a long time. Jealousy of Austria has had a good deal to do with the sending out of this expedition, which, in the present state of Italy, seems to be quite uncalled for.

The Guardian contains the following announcement concerning the Cholera.

Our readers probably perceived a statement in last week's Guardian, copied from the Observer, to the effect that the cholera had, in England, altogether disappeared; and that in Scotland it has so much diminished as to be only perceptible in a very modified form in two or three localities. We believe that, so far at least as London is concerned, this is certainly the fact; and in recording the withdrawal, at least for the present, of the visitation which has been so mercifully tempered to us, we may be allowed to express a hope that a thanksgiving will shortly be appointed for the occasion.

In Ireland, unhappily,—whither the stream of the disease has now passed,—there is great suffering, and, in some parts, great mortality.

Mr. Layard, the author of the Researches in Nineveh, has been promoted by Government to the office of paid attache to the Embassy at Constantinople. The trustees of the British Museum have voted 3,000*l.*, to be paid in two sums, for promoting further investigations at Nineveh.

TO MISS SELTON.

A SONNET, BY WILLIAM WORDSWORTH.

The vestal priestess of a Sisterhood
Who knew no self, and whom the selfish scorn—
She seeks a wilderness of weed and thorn,
And, undiverted from her blessed mood
By keen reproach or blind ingratitude,
A wreath she twines of blossoms lowly born—
An amaranthine crown of flowers forlorn,
And hangs her garland on the Holy Rood.
Sister of Mercy! bravely hast thou won,
From men who winnow Charity from Faith,
The pharisaic sneer that treats as dross
The works by Faith ordained. Pursue thy path,
Till, at the last, thou hear the voice—"Well done, Thou good and faithful servant of the Cross."

WHIT-SUNDAY.

THE COMING AND COMFORT OF THE HOLY GHOST.

It was good for us that Christ should come; very good for us that he should come down from heaven to save us from our sins. It was also good that after He had finished His work on earth He should also return to His Father and to the right hand of the throne of God. He says Himself that it was not only good as regards Himself to ascend into heaven, but that it was for our good. "It is expedient for you that I go away," and He explains the point very clearly in the words that follow, "for," He adds, "if I go not away, the Comforter will not come: but if I depart, I will send Him unto you."

But had not Christ been a Comforter? Yes, truly, the best that had ever been, the greatest and the truest. Never had there been seen in the world such a Guide, such a Friend, such a Master, such a Giver of true consolation, such a Comforter. The best of the sons of consolation were not worthy so much as to unloose the latchet of His shoes, Who spake as never man spake, and Who stood crying in the wilderness of this groaning and afflicted world, "Come unto Me all ye that labour and are heavy-laden, and I will give you rest. Take My yoke upon you, and learn of Me, for I am meek and lowly in heart: and ye shall find rest unto your souls. For My yoke is easy, and My burden is light."

So deeply had those who sought Him felt the power of His consolation, the greatness of the peace and love which issued from Him abundantly, that the mere mention of His departure filled them with sorrow. "Because I have said these things unto you," as He Himself bears witness, "sorrow hath filled your heart." They could scarce bear the thought that He was about to go; it was like losing the very Sun and Light of their souls. They had left all to follow Him; and when the tidings came from His own lips that He was about to leave them, their hearts sank within them, and their grief was great. The Church seemed to them without Him, as a bride forsaken by her husband, as a household without its master, as a besieged army without its captain, as a flock without its shepherd, as a family without its head. And yet He said, "it is expedient for you that I go away." Where was the good to lose Christ, Whom it was worth all the world to gain? Who could be like Him or supply His place?

Or did He mean, that when He went the great sorrows of the Church would cease, and so, with the sorrow, the need of a great comforter? Did He mean that the company of believers were to be freed from all the temporal tribulations which afflict the sons of men, the instant He ascended up into heaven? Nay, Christ Himself spoke plainly enough on this point. His own words, to say nothing of the immediate experience of His followers, took away all hope of the undoing of the burden of earthly trouble. "In the world ye shall have tribulation," was a sentence that could not be mistaken. Tribulation then is still the portion of believers; and more than this, there are some sorrows, some harassments that come upon us because we are believers, as especial trials of faith, that would not come upon us, except we believed in Christ.

How then was it good for us that Christ should go? It was expedient for us in this way. First, because He went to prepare a place for us in heaven; "I go to prepare a place for you—that where I am, there ye may be also;" next, because He went to add another work of love to his former work, I mean, the gracious work of constant intercession with the Father; and lastly, because He went in order that He might send another Comforter. But you may say that there may be many comforters, yet not such a one as Christ; we may have another, and yet one not equal to Christ, either in love or in the power of comforting; but if Christ said it was expedient for us that He should go away, in order that we might enjoy the presence of an abiding Comforter, we have proof in this very statement, that we were to have not simply another comforter, but one equal to Himself, one not inferior in any way, and superior in this respect, that He would abide continually with the Church even unto the end of the world. He tells us who this is; it is no less a one than "the Spirit of truth," God the Holy Ghost. This saying of Christ, is proof enough that the Holy Ghost is equal to the Father and the Son; else surely it would not have been good for us to have lost Christ. Nay, as He sends to us the Holy Ghost to be our Guide, we keep Christ while we lose Him, for He is one with the Spirit; and hence, though He said, "I go to the Father," and then went, He also said, "Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world."

Unspeakable indeed would have been the loss of Christ's bodily presence, if any other than God the Holy Ghost had come. Though we deserve not this Presence, we need it. With less than this, how could we keep the faith at all, or live at all as men of faith? With all the power of sin and all the wiles of the devil, and all the strength of lust, and all the baits of the world, and all the sicknesses of the flesh, and all the spiritual fears which crowd upon us in various and changing forms as we move through life, how could we of ourselves sustain the fight? Prosperity, adversity, smooth times, rough times, hardship, ease, riches, poverty, sickness, health, all these are states of temptation; all these are trials of the soul; and those which we are the least apt to reckon among trials are in truth oftentimes the most fearful and the worst of all, both because of the natural tendencies of the things themselves, and because we are not enough suspicious of the sting they carry; such are the states of prosperity, worldly ease, comfortable circumstances, good health, a calm life, with no more than the shadow of a few summer clouds crossing it at times.

Left to ourselves, we could in no wise go through these trials by our own sufficiency, since we are born in sin, and have yielded to actual sin. When we are rich, we are tempted to be proud and fond of pomp, to plume ourselves on our consequence, to like show or flattery or over many dainties of meat and drink and dress: when we are poor, we are tempted to murmur at our lot, to speak impatient words against the providence of God, or to have impatient thoughts: when we are well and strong, we are tempted to abuse our health, to take it as a matter of course, to be unthankful, to put off the concerns of the soul on the very ground that we are young and strong, as though religion were the business only of the sickly and the dying, who cannot serve the world nor take their pleasure; when we are sick, we are tempted to become peevish and taken up with ourselves. These are the temptations that surround us in the various changes and chances of this mortal life; and we should all fall, we should all yield to the strength of sin, unless we had a Divine Comforter. Blessed therefore is the memory of that Feast of Pentecost which fell as on this day, when a Divine Comforter came down to strengthen the hearts of the first disciples, and to continue with the Church till the second appearing of our Lord from heaven. The promise of Christ was on this day fulfilled. He had gone and the disciples were alone. For a few days they were as men expecting their Great Guest and Guide and Friend. They waited, as men should wait, in hope, in love, in peace one with another. They clung together all the closer, and their very trials tightened the cords of love. Their common love of Christ united them in love for each other; and it was in one of their peaceful meetings, when they were joined together as one little family or household of faith, that the Holy Ghost, the ever-blessed Spirit, came down with wonderful gifts. "When the day of Pentecost was fully come, they were all with one accord in one place. And suddenly there came a sound from heaven, as of a rushing mighty wind, and it filled all the house where they were sitting. And there appeared unto them cloven tongues, like as of fire, and it sat upon each of them; and they were all filled with the Holy Ghost, and began to speak with other tongues as the Spirit gave them utterance." Thus is the wonderful scene of the descent of the Holy Ghost described.

Most blessed day for all who seek to be saved through Jesus Christ, and desire strength to follow Christ through the thorny path of faith! Most blessed day for all who are called upon to suffer trouble and are visited with affliction! Look back, ye followers of Christ, to that bright sunrise as it were of the day of spiritual gifts. See in that little company of faithful men, that band of brothers, "the first-fruits of the Spirit;" yes, "the first-fruits," not the last. We are called to taste His later gifts; we are called to bring forth in these latter days the fruits of the Spirit, through the operations of the self-same Spirit who is at work in the members of Christ. Very good was it for those first disciples that Christ went; very good is it for us also; for now we have both Christ and the Spirit, Christ interceding for us in heaven, the Holy Ghost succouring and comforting us on earth. The more we consider our own weakness, our own evil will, our natural love of the world and of worldly things, the more will our hearts be lifted up with a deep and joyful thankfulness, as we consider the coming and the continuing presence of the Holy Ghost. And we shall be more deeply impressed with the value of this blessed presence of the Spirit, when we look farther than ourselves and our own weakness, when we take deeper insight into the spiritual world, and see the very fearful elements of evil that strive to sway and act upon our evil will. There is a great Evil Spirit roaming through the world to make prey of souls; this great enemy is not an open one; he does not stand before us in his own shape; he moves about us like the wind; he is not seen with the eye, nor can his movements be watched, nor his comings and goings; he is secret and invisible, able to influence the thoughts and intents of the heart, secretly giving us notions of sin which we should not have had but for him, heightening our own evil desires, fanning every little spark of sin into a flame, hiding himself like a snake in the grass, yet working death so much the more, tempting us through other men, through outward objects placed in our way, making sin easy and pleasant, giving us opportunities, luring us on by little and little, whispering delays where feelings of repentance are stirred within us, suggesting worldly idle thoughts when our spirit inclines to pray and when we kneel down. O what a great war is within us and without! With what great wiles is Satan at work in his endeavour to destroy our souls! What are we by ourselves? How can we keep our feet or stem the strong rushing tide of temptation that sweeps against us? how by our own strength can we keep our hold of the Cross of Christ?

We must take into account not only our own sinfulness, but these great wiles of the devil, before we can appreciate in any degree the value of the succour of the Holy Ghost. As we have a great Evil Spirit ever plotting against us and attacking us, so we need the Good Spirit of God to blunt those fiery darts, and to beat down with His stronger arm the invisible sword of the prince of darkness. We want the Holy Spirit to sway the thoughts and intents of our hearts for good, to keep down evil imaginations and to suggest good, to give us opportunities for doing good and to throw good men in our way, to lead us on by little and little along the narrow way of Christian obedience, to incline us to pray and to give us collectedness when we pray, to move us to repentance when we have sinned, to give depth and continuance to our repentance when we have begun to repent, to soften our hearts when we are prosperous, to humble us when all men speak well of us, to give us patience in time of adversity, and heavenly consolations in seasons of anguish and distress.

With no less a Comforter, no less a Guide, no less a Counsellor, could we hold our hearts on high above the waters of the world; for even with all this help of the Holy Ghost, who is greater "than he that is in the world," greater than the prince of this world, we find it hard to keep with Christ, hard to return when we have erred and strayed from His ways, hard to acquire habits of holiness, hard to undo and disentangle ourselves of habits of sin. A multitude of evil, unchaste, selfish, uncharitable or worldly thoughts, are ever ready to fill the whole house of the inner man as with an armed host, to people every avenue and secret passage of the heart, and to carry us away from God. A multitude of evil spirits are besetting us all the day, coming to us in our walks, our labours, our amusements, our trade, our places of business, our places of leisure, first trying one plan to entice us, and, if that fails, then another, sometimes coming for a moment with a slight suggestion of sin, then staying longer with us and giving the suggestion a bolder shape, now dropping the seed of evil into the soul, now coming to water the seed sown. Thus are we surrounded by evil powers, even though we have the comfort and the aid of the Spirit of grace. What should we do had we a lesser Comforter, a weaker Friend, or one who only at times could come to give us aid?

"Thanks be to God for His unspeakable gift!" thanks be to God, through our Lord Jesus Christ, who has given us, His weak wayward children, so divine a gift as the presence of the Spirit! Thanks be to our Lord Jesus Christ, in that He ascended up on high and led captivity captive, and gave gifts unto men! For "every good gift and every perfect gift is from above," and all the diversity of spiritual gifts that aid us in our way to heaven, are the operations of one and the self-same Spirit, Who is Himself the great Gift sent to us by Christ Jesus our Lord from heaven. He it is, Who is the Author and the Finisher of every thing that is good in us. He it is, Who made Apostles preach and gave their words power, and sent prophets and taught disciples, and wrought miracles, and spread the faith. He it is, Who has given us the example of martyrs and the patterns of saints, and the writings of good men, and spiritual songs with sweet psalms, and moved men to build churches, and sent pastors, and gathered flocks, and preserved sound doctrine. He it is, Who inspired prophets and evangelists, and now keeps their words, and makes them effectual to the saving of souls. He it is, Who comforts mourners and lifts up the widow's heart, and consoles the fatherless and befriends the friendless, and abides with the lonely and the desolate. He it is, Who has given us all the good desires we have ever had, brought us to ourselves when we have done wrong, begun in us all our repentances, assisted us in all our offices of kindness towards our brethren, or put it into the hearts of our brethren to be kind towards us, visited us in our affliction, and brought good out of evil. He it is, Who has gone before us and led us on to all the good we ever designed to do, and helped us in all the good we ever did, and made us finish whatever good we took in hand, and given us all the sense of sin we ever felt, all the charity we have ever exercised, all the faith we have ever shewn, all our moderation in prosperous times, all our patience in time of trouble. He it is, Who is now ready to go before us, to go with us, to be behind us, pressing us on, to be on all sides of us as we desire to walk on the heavenward road, ever willing to help the selfish, to be unselfish, the angry to conquer anger, the covetous to be liberal, the divided to be at one again, the harsh to be gentle, the intemperate to refrain from strong drink, the lustful to be chaste, the foolish to be wise, the worldly to give up the world.

O good Spirit of God, O most gracious Guide, O blessed Comforter of our souls, shew us the way and lead Thou us on; guide Thou our feet into the way of peace; we desire to follow Thee and to learn of Thee; Thou art our Friend and hast come down from heaven to take charge of Christ's flock. We are Christ's; we are Thine; we desire more and more to be Christ's, more and more to be Thine; we give ourselves into Thine hand afresh this day on which Thou didst first descend on the first disciples. Come among us at this time and succour us. Come among us and lead us onward to all holy living, all holy conversation, all ways of godliness, all pure thoughts, all good counsels and good works, that we may at last reach the heavenly places where Christ is, and may be with Him for ever.

POSTURE IN PRAYER.

Mr. Editor—I send you, expressed in as few words as possible, some of my objections against sitting in prayer; and especially against sitting when we present ourselves before God on the holy Sabbath, and in the house solemnly consecrated to his service. I claim no infallibility; and I have no desire to dictate. I only ask that the subject may be examined in the spirit of Him who purchased the Church with his own blood.

For myself, I object against sitting in public prayer, because, it is withholding from God that outward magnification to others of our reverence, of which he is infinitely worthy, which it is our duty to render him; and which we never fail to manifest towards magistrates and others of our fellow men, when we have occasion to come before them, and address them in their official capacity.

It is dishonorable to the Saviour, who is never found coming to the Father in this posture. Though perfectly holy, he stood, or kneeled, or prostrated himself, but never sat.

It is disrespectful to God's ambassador, who leads in prayer.

It is withholding from him who leads, that evidence of sympathy and union to which he is entitled, and which the church would give by taking the posture which he takes, when he invites them to unite with him.

It teaches that which ought not, at least, to be true. There is a language in action, no less truly than in words. And the language of sitting while the minister stands, is, that he is praying, while the church are being taught how to pray. The church, on the contrary, ought to be praying, not learning.

It is uniformly discountenanced by Scripture examples.

It is contrary to the light of nature, or that instinctive sense of propriety, which God has made a part of our very being. This is shown by the fact, that no nation has existed in any country, or in any age, which has presented its worship in a sitting posture.

It is contrary to the uniform practice of the worshippers of the true God, before the coming of Christ.

It is contrary to the apostolic practice.

It is contrary to the uniform practice of the church in the first ages of Christianity.

It is contrary to the uniform practice of the Church for more than eighteen hundred years after the coming of Christ.

It does not accord with the typical representations of the ceremonial law.

It does not accord with the emblematical representations which the Scriptures give of the heavenly world. Holy beings in heaven are never represented as coming to God in direct acts of worship, in a sitting posture; but, if seated, are uniformly represented as leaving their seats.

It is an unnecessary and wanton departure from the established practice of our puritan ancestors.

It countenances the doctrine, that we are not bound by the Scriptures, to do any thing which is not expressly commanded. And in this way, it is taking part with those who deny our obligation to observe the first day of the week as a holy Sabbath, or to practise household baptism, or to maintain family worship, or to associate in local churches, or to require females to attend on the Lord's Supper. For since standing or kneeling in social or public prayer is urged upon us by far more frequent examples than either of these, and by at least as much force from other scriptural facts and arguments, it evidently follows, that, if these examples, facts, and arguments do not bind us in the matter of attitude in prayer, we are not bound by them in the other cases. And thus, by sitting in public prayer, we are indirectly, however unintentionally, aiding the cause of infidelity.

It is a disregard of the well known fact—a fact abundantly confirmed by the experience of many, perhaps most, Christians—that the more deep and solemn our sense is of the Divine presence, or of our guilt, or of our perishing need, the more forcibly are we impelled to present our adorations or our supplications in some other than a sitting posture. Sitting is never an expression of solicitude or reverence. It both indicates and increases a want of feeling.

It is making too little of bodies, which God in his word declares to be members of Christ, and temples of the Holy Ghost—which he has commanded us to present a living sacrifice—which he has made the habitations of undying souls—which he has destined to a resurrection, and to a participation in the joys of heaven, or the torments of hell for ever.

It is a violation of the command to glorify God in our bodies.

It is an unnecessary breach of that uniformity in public worship, which, though not absolutely essential, is nevertheless desirable, especially in the same denomination.

It is contrary to that Christian regard to the consciences of others, which Christ and his apostles expressly taught, and beautifully exemplified; since many pious persons conscientiously believe that sitting in public prayer, (except in case of indisposition or infirmity,) is contrary to the teachings of Scripture, and therefore sinful; and since multitudes, though they may not go this length, are yet fully persuaded that it is inexpedient; while it is agreed by all, that some other attitude may be taken without sin.

It is a lazy posture.

It is a drowsy posture.

It is calculated to have, and it is beginning to have an unfavourable influence on family prayer.

It disregards, in many ways, the laws of association, which God in his wisdom and kindness has made a part of our very nature. By placing singing, preaching, and prayer on a common level, so far as externals are concerned, it tends to fix the impression, especially in the minds of youth, that there is nothing more solemn in prayer than in the other services of the sanctuary. Where there is similarity in that which is seen, the impression is natural that there is a corresponding similarity in that which is unseen.

I might add to the foregoing; but I forbear. OMRICRON. Presbyterian.

SATURDAY NIGHT.—The clock has just struck eleven. In one more hour, another week will have forever fled. All the wealth of earth could not purchase back those hours. How have they been improved? They have borne their account to God, there to wait the judgment.

Thus week follows week in rapid succession, hurrying us all on to eternity. And soon the last week of life will come, and then the last day and hour.

"Time, like an ever-flowing stream,
Bears all her sons away;
They fly forgotten, as a dream
Dies at the opening day."

Let past sins be repented, confessed, forsaken. Let us not close our eyes on Saturday night, till we have earnestly sought reconciliation to God through Christ Jesus; and let our prayer be—"So teach us to number our days, that we may apply our hearts to wisdom."—Presby. of the West.

A true Christian cannot bear the thought of going to heaven alone.

REV. AND DEAR SIR:

Your readers, like myself, have probably read of the case of the Bishop of Exeter and Mr. Shore; and, like me, they may have wished to know more of the matter than is found in party statements and legal details. The following account has all the blunt and frank appearance of verisimilitude and authenticity. And, as its source in England and its channel in this country are religious newspapers not of the Exeter Persuasion, but rather of the Persuasion of Exeter Hall, there is little risk in accepting the narrative. Its effect should be, to rescue the zealous Bp. from the "strife of tongues" and pens:—so

May 21.

From the Church and State Gazette.

THE BISHOP, THE DUKE, AND THE SECEDER.

The Bishop of Exeter has published a letter to the Primate, containing a simple documentary statement of Mr. Shore's case. We do not think ourselves that the bishop has acted throughout the whole of this trying affair—viz., from August 1832 to the present time—with an infallible judgment and unruffled temper; but we do not see why a man is to be put out of court simply because he is too sensitively alive to the responsibilities of his office.

In the eventful year 1832, Bridgetown, a hamlet of the parish of Berry Pomeroy, belonging to the Duke of Somerset, was added to the borough of Totness. His grace, who had recently much improved the size and quality of the houses, designed for it an ecclesiastical as well as a civil emancipation. He had just finished a church—that is, a building for that purpose—and in the summer of that year communicated with the bishop on the subject of consecration. He was somewhat disappointed at the bishop's reply. The duke had imagined that he could have the church consecrated, the patronage vested in himself, and the minister left wholly dependent on pew rents or on the ducal bounty. It was explained to him that he could not have everything, and that in order to consecration he must either make it a district church with an endowment of £50 a year, or a chapel of ease, leaving the patronage to the incumbent of Berry Pomeroy. The Duke made it a sine qua non that he should have the patronage; still, as he had previously sold the next presentation of Berry Pomeroy, and was now about to cut off the most important part of the parish to the injury of the purchaser, and as also he had thereby acknowledged the rights of the patron, he ought to have been prepared at least to pay for his hobby. The duke and his man of business settled at last to petition the bishop to license the building as a temporary matter, and with the intention, as expressed in the petition, of applying for consecration as soon as the endowment could be agreed on. The Bishop acceded to this proposal, and, with the consent of the incumbent, licensed Mr. Shore to the chapel. The concluding words of the petition, signed "Somerset," on which this arrangement was made, were—"I hereby engage that, if your lordship shall think fit to grant such your license, the said intended chapel shall be set apart and appropriated exclusively for that purpose"—viz., "religious worship according to the rites of the Church of England and Ireland."

This state of things, intended to be only temporary, was inconvenient and painful to the incumbent of Berry Pomeroy, who, though charged with the cure of Bridgetown, was, in fact, ousted by the stranger. The incumbent, however, died in 1834, and was succeeded by the gentleman to whose friends the duke had sold the next presentation.

The new incumbent soon had found Mr. Shore a thorn in his side, and felt a special grievance in the fact that the duke, having first sold the living, had subsequently got the most important part of it back into his hands again, leaving the purchaser that much minus what he had bargained for. But, rather than have Bridgetown still included in his spiritual cure, but actually under what he considered erroneous teaching, he was ready to make any sacrifice. He offered to alienate all the tithes in Bridgetown, amounting to £80 per annum, to have the cure of that district separated. The duke's agent caught at this offer, and asked the bishop to consecrate the church on that endowment, giving the patronage to the duke. The bishop, however, did not think this fair, and certainly it was not fair. If the vicar gave all the endowment he had a right to all the patronage. If, on the other hand, the duke was to be patron, he ought to contribute in a greater portion than the vicar. The bishop made a proposition to this effect, but in vain. The truth was—the duke was too satisfied with things as they were to take any real steps towards an endowment. Mr. Shore took greatly at Bridgetown, let all the seats, got £200 a year, and was content with it. That the arrangement could not be pleasant to some other parties concerned is evident from the fact that as early as 1834 it was commonly reported, not only in Devonshire but throughout the kingdom, that the Duke of Somerset had built a church, and, as he could not have the patronage, had converted it into a meeting-house. This rumor, though not true, was indicative of the truth. The incumbent of Berry Pomeroy, baffled in his attempts to get rid of Bridgetown, exchanged the living in 1843, when a third incumbent stepped into the scene. He had no sooner looked about him than he found he would have no peace in his parish so long as Bridgetown was in his parish and Mr. Shore was there. The vicar and Mr. Shore each thought the other in serious error. The vicar, therefore, refused to grant Mr. Shore that renewed nomination without which he could not legally continue to officiate in the chapel. Mr. Shore made many desperate attempts to continue where he was—we respect him for doing so: he went rather beyond himself, indeed, in playing off the bishop against the vicar, and the vicar against the bishop, and the duke against both. He protested to the last his devotion to the Established Church, and his adherence to its Articles and Liturgy. He nevertheless, at the duke's suggestion, threatened to officiate in the building without episcopal license, and, when the threat was disregarded, eventually proceeded to that step. Mr. Michelmore, agent to the Duke of Somerset, took out a license for the building as a place of Dissenting worship, and Mr. Shore, who had just before declared that he was no Dissenter at all, but a thorough adherent of the Established Church, officiated in it.

This is not the case of a conscientious Dissenter, or a Dissenter at all, persecuted for his Dissent. It is the case of the clergyman, who declares he is no Dissenter, publicly officiating without and in defiance of the diocesan authority, and doing this in a building which has been built and licensed for the services of the Church, and which its builder and its patron had expressly engaged should never be applied to any other purpose than those services. It is the case of an attempt to employ the prestige of a Church, and the prestige of a clergyman, against the Church and its authorities. If clergymen and their patrons may conduct themselves in this manner, playing fast and loose, declaring their devotion to the Church one week, snapping their fingers in the bishop's face the next, and using the same building at pleasure for a church or a meeting-house, of course it is a truce to talk of discipline. Honest Dissent is another thing.

There are scores of Dissenting preachers who have renounced episcopal ordination, and who derive no little influence from the fact that they were once Church ministers; but no one ever molests them—no not even Henry Exeter, though there are some in his diocese. We are not aware of a single instance of deprivation or penalties for simple Dissent. Clergymen and laymen are equally unmolested. Mr. Shore's "persecution" is a sheer imposture. The danger against which the bill before the Commons is levelled is a ridiculous bugbear; though, as the bill does no harm, it may as well pass. As for the legal proceedings, Mr. Shore left the bishop no alternative but to institute them. It was he who dragged the Bishop from court to court, in the face of all remonstrance, till the climax of his persecution is—that, having appealed to the law, he now finds that the law is against him, and, like other obstinate and unfortunate suitors, he has the cost to pay. We are sorry for him, because he seems to have a certain amount of good intentions and is evidently a favorite with his congregation; but, as for his "martyrdom," that is all fudge. Of course, the duke, who pushed him into the scrape, has franked him through the courts. If anybody is a martyr it is the bishop, who has not the Duke of Somerset's purse to draw upon, and who has probably paid hundreds to Mr. Shore's tens in this stupid affair.

If I had no other view in advising, or speaking my sentiments, than merely the good of others, I should never do it with any degree of passion.

SATURDAY, JUNE 2, 1849.

SIXTEENTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE BISHOP WHITE PRAYER BOOK SOCIETY.

This annual celebration, made more interesting by its concurrence with the 300th anniversary of the publication of the Prayer Book, took place on Monday evening of Whitsun week. The inclemency of the weather made the audience smaller than might have been expected, though it was much larger than on ordinary anniversaries.

Previous to the public service the Society met for business in the Vestry-room of St. Andrew's Church. The following officers were elected for the ensuing year.

President.—Rt. Rev. A. Potter, D.D., ex-officio.

Vice-Presidents.—Rev. George Boyd, D.D., Wm. Suddards, Benj. Dorr, D.D. Messrs. William H. Newbold, and John Welsh, Jr.

Corresponding Secretary.—S. Austin Allibone.

Recording Secretary.—James M. Aertsen.

Treasurer.—Wm. Musgrave.

Managers.—Rev. Jehu C. Clay, D. D., Henry J. Morton, D.D., H. W. Ducachet, D.D., John Coleman, D.D., Richard Newton, Edm. Neville, D.D., Frederick Ogilby, J. H. Fowles, M. A. De W. Howe, T. C. Yarnall, W. B. Stevens, D.D., Kingston Goddard. Messrs. Samuel Wagner, Wm. Welsh, Jas. S. Newbold, Thomas Latimer, Geo. M. Wharton, Horace Binney, Jr., Edm. Wilcox, Henry Reed, B. G. Mitchell, Herman Cope, Z. Locke, Francis West, Joseph R. Massey, Chas. Wingate, Henry F. Rodney, B. C. Buzby, Alfred Horner, A. G. Coffin, Wm. Martin, Tobias Wagner, John R. Wilmer, George S. Scofield, and Ed. C. Biddle.

The Society then adjourned to the church.

Evening Prayers were said by the Rev. Dr. Dorr, and the Rev. Mr. Suddards read the Lessons. The annual report of the Board of Managers was then read by the Rev. Dr. Upfold. From this interesting report we gather the following facts.—

“During the past year the Society has availed itself of the valuable services of the Rev. Mr. Trapier, Minister of the Floating Church of the Redcemer, in distributing Prayer Books to the seamen in our port; the usual manner of doing so is this,—at the close of each service, an invitation is given to all persons anxious to have a Prayer Book to come forward and receive one. For the sailor's devotions there is no book like the Prayer Book;—its plain language and short prayers meet his case exactly.

In the year 1828, there was in this city only one set of stereotype Prayer Book plates, belonging to an Episcopalian, and from which were issued annually about 5000 copies in quite inferior style. But it is pleasant to every well-wisher of our Church, to know, that there are now not less than 20 sets of plates, from which are annually issued upwards of 42000 copies of the Prayer Book; of these 20 sets of plates, fourteen are owned by persons not of our communion. Thus we find that three-fifths of the Prayer Books printed and circulated in this city are by persons not connected with the Episcopal Church. The increase in the number, and the very handsome improvements in the books themselves, speak well for the cause in which we are engaged.

The distribution of the Society for the past year, including 75 copies not before reported, has been 3105, of which 1631 have been distributed in Pennsylvania, 112 in New Jersey, 100 in Maine, 50 in Delaware, 25 in Maryland, 50 in Ohio, 75 in Virginia, 150 in Rhode Island, 260 in Kentucky, 25 in Alabama, 25 in Michigan, 150 in Arkansas, 42 in California, 25 to the army of the United States, 263 to the seamen sailing from our port, and 142 to the prisons and humane institutions.

The Managers believe that there can be no objection whatever to the manner in which the business of the Society is conducted. It is plain and simple. The Society employs no agents, pays no rent, has neither stock nor capital. Monies received from churches, societies, and individuals, just as they are disposed to give, are expended exclusively in the purchase of books for distribution wherever needed; it is in fact only the almoner of churchmen for this specific purpose. If it receives largely and freely, it is only that it may more freely give.”

The Annual Sermon was then preached by the Rev. Dr. Stevens, of St. Andrew's, from the text, “The king's daughter is all glorious within; her clothing is of wrought gold.” Psalms xlv. 13. We know that we but speak the general sentiment, when we say, that this discourse was worthy of the occasion on which it was delivered. Its great theme was, of course, the beauty and excellency of the Liturgy. The subject was introduced by an admirable historical digest of that Reformation, in the faith and worship of the Church of England, whose glorious monument is the Prayer Book.

This sacred book was considered as a commentary upon Holy Scripture, declaring the mind of primitive and apostolic times. Its holy teachings were eloquently and forcibly set forth under the following heads. 1. As a devotional commentary. 2. Eucharistic. 3. Sacramental. 4. Ecclesiastical. 5. Doctrinal. “The poor man's compendium of theology.” “A faith learned at the mercy-seat, rather than from the pulpit.” The sermon closed with a powerful appeal in behalf of the Society whose object was to distribute, throughout our land, this Book of Prayer.

A collection was then made, amounting to $445 55. The services closed with prayer and the benediction by the Bishop.

It will be seen, from the amount of the collection, that churchmen have not afforded the Society the means of carrying out their noble plan of commemorating this anniversary. It is not too late still for the Church to amend the deficiency. Less than one dollar from each communicant in the city of Philadelphia would accomplish it. Shall it not be done?

As there was some uncertainty in the announcement of the last Protestant Churchman in reference to the death of its late Editor, we forbore to mention it.

The following notice, however, leaves no room to hope.

From the Protestant Churchman.

There can be no doubt that the intelligence of the decease of the Rev. JOHN W. BROWN, the late editor of this paper, which was announced in our last number, is authentic. The last information received directly from him by his relatives, noticed his intended departure for Malta; and we learn from the Boston Post, that the statement of his death which appeared in that journal, was derived from a letter received from the American consul at Malta. Our readers will find in another column the proceedings of the Vestry of St. George's Church, Astoria, on this melancholy occasion, which justly commemorate the virtues and noble character of their deceased Pastor, who was tenderly beloved and respected, not only by the members of that congregation, but by the whole community, of which he was so distinguished an ornament. Even to his most intimate friends, this blow has been as sudden as it is grievous. Of his widow and orphan children we dare not trust ourselves to speak, except to express the hope and confidence, that God will in His infinite mercy watch over them for good in this their hour of affliction and bereavement, and raise up for them faithful friends, so that the loss of a beloved husband and parent may not leave them exposed to the cold charities of the world. We trust to be able hereafter to give more minute information in relation to the last hours of our departed brother, together with such a notice of his life, labors in the ministry, and character, as a man of letters and a minister of the Church, as may be a deserved and becoming tribute to his memory.

A meeting of the Wardens and Vestrymen of St. George's Church, Astoria, was held at the house of the senior warden, on Monday afternoon, the 21st inst., R. M. Blackwell, Esq., senior warden, presiding.

The senior warden stated, that authentic information had been received from the United States' consul at Malta, communicating the mournful intelligence of the death of our late rector, the Rev. JOHN W. BROWN, who died at Malta on the 9th of April last. The letter of the Consul states that every attention was paid him during his last illness by his clerical brethren of the island; and that the Bishop of Gibraltar officiated at his burial.

Whereupon the following preamble and resolutions were unanimously adopted:—

Whereas, It has pleased Almighty God, to take from his labors in this world, our late rector, the Rev. John W. Brown; and whereas, that on the death of one of such singular goodness, and devoted piety, it is proper that we should express our sorrow for his loss, and our admiration of his excellence and worth; therefore—

Resolved, That by the death of our late rector, the Rev. John W. Brown, the parish has sustained a loss which it will be difficult, if not impossible, to repair.

Resolved, That our late beloved pastor, the Rev. John W. Brown, by his Christian virtues, and exemplary character, had endeared himself to all; meek, humble, courteous, and dignified in his deportment, he was peculiarly fitted for the station which he occupied; possessed of talents of a high order, he wearied not in the service of his Divine Master, but labored in His cause with untiring zeal, until the energy of his mind overcoming the strength of his body, he sank into an early grave. He was a friend to all,—the poor will miss his ready aid, accompanied by advice and encouragement, which enhanced his charities, and rendered misfortunes more easy to bear. The sick will miss his consoling voice—his cheerful countenance—his fervent prayers. We will miss him at our social gatherings; and when affliction's heavy hand is laid upon us, the want of his sympathy will be deeply felt. He will be missed everywhere; for mingling in every walk of life, he cast the effulgence of his virtues over all—exalting and improving all.

Resolved, That we deeply sympathise with the family of the deceased in their affliction, under this dispensation of Divine Providence, and exhort them to look for consolation to Him only who numbereth the hairs of our heads, and suffereth not a single sparrow to fall to the ground without his notice.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the memory of our late Rector, we cause the church to be hung in mourning, and that we wear crape on the left arm for thirty days.

Resolved, That these resolutions be published in the Church papers, and that an authenticated copy be sent to the family of the deceased.

Astoria, May 21st, 1849.

ACKNOWLEDGMENT.—The Editor of the Banner acknowledges the receipt of $6.00, “an offering from the Hannah More Academy for Whitsunday.” It has been applied to the object designated.

A DISCUSSION RESPECTING THE PRINCIPLES AND POSITION OF THE EVANGELICAL PARTY IN THE PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH, in one vol., by the Rev. Albert Barnes, Rev. S. H. Tyng, and the Rev. G. W. Ridgely, and sold by H. Hooker & Co.

Such is the modest and peculiar title given to this collection of controversial mind. If any one can find in it the principles or position of any one, or of even the authors in the Protestant Episcopal Church, it will be more than we are able to find. Has, for instance, Dr. Tyng any principles or position in the Church? None that we can find. At the time Mr. Barnes demonstrated against the honour or advantage of the concessions of such persons as chose to act so far and no farther than self-display and the flattery of the public prompted them, Dr. Tyng was known to declare openly and with passion, that he would never appear again with them on their platforms. His spirit, on the occasion, showed that it was a personal thing with him; and if he was not thanked and courted for his co-operation, both the motive and reward of it were withdrawn. But there appears to have been a dryness in this voluntary retirement which could not long be endured, and we find him soon forgetting the smart of Mr. Barnes' views, and appearing again with him and other sectaries, where he could gain more notoriety than in the single-minded service of his own Church; and he has gone on unchecked in his old career, from that time to this. But there is no high Churchman in this land who has said as severe and unbecoming things of the sects as Dr. Tyng. We remember, at the time this controversy opened, hearing him say, “Presbyterian ministers had no more right to baptize than so many old women—that their baptism was no better than squirting so much water.” Many persons heard these remarks; and we doubt if there is another Churchman in the land who would speak thus; and we are mistaken if any well-bred infidel could be prevailed on thus to speak of things held sacred by a respectable portion of the community. We have ever regarded Mr. Barnes' objections to the position and principles of such men as just. We think he gave them a well-merited reproof; for the truth is, they have no position and no principles that are held with such consistency as to be definable. They do and can concede nothing which is of any value to ministers out of the Church. They must leave the Church before they can do so; and every approach they make to it savors of unfaithfulness to their own convictions or to the Church. Men must be weak if they can be flattered by a fellowship of this kind. It will go with them just as far as they will count it an honour, and if they dare to assert a cherished right, and require it to be conceded, there is a breach of the bond of charity at once. Take away the courting, the applause, the reward, the notoriety from speaking and acting on the boards of these general societies, and the position of these evangelical co-actors would soon define itself; and persons who think it is a mark or sign of a catholic, humble, or Christian spirit, to be an agent for any of them, or to make speeches (to be reported) on their anniversaries, read men in their own way, not ours. Should these Churchmen take parishes, their salaries might be less, they would move about less, talk less, be less known, but certainly they would have more time for reading and meditation, and we doubt not would come out improved by the trial.

Dr. Tyng was never reliable or consistent in any thing; and when, in his late speech before the American Tract Society, he affirms that he "would sooner have booksellers all put into a sack, and sunk to the bottom of the sea, than have the movements of the society retarded," he utters but a senseless, lawless impulse of his own mind. It is not at all likely that booksellers pursue their interests after a more selfish fashion than he does his own; nor is it likely that their rights can be disregarded with any less impunity than his. Touch him in right, or in property, or in reputation, and there is not one in ten thousand who will feel it so deeply, or make the stir about it he will. If he and others like him were sacked and sunk, it might be thought by some the Church would be a gainer by it—but it does not follow it would be right.

It is natural for some men to be uneasy, unless they are always on the move. To be settled in a parish, to serve the Church in a still, ordinary way, would be a dull sort of life for them. Mr. Ridgely, who figures in this volume with considerable ability, is now a travelling agent of the Tract Society. It is a business that suits his taste, but how he can reconcile it to his duty to the Church and to the ministry given to him, is more than we know.

Have we not churches and institutions of our own—not so powerful, not so much, perhaps, in the eye of the world—in which the ordained clergy of the Church might satisfy their cravings for well-doing? Must they go about to rally the people of our churches to assist societies strictly sectarian, that have no sympathy in common with the Church as our clergy understand it, and are sworn to support it; yea, that would dispense with a ministry altogether except for the purpose of collecting funds from the people, thus setting themselves up above all that is called a church and ministry? We say, let Mr. Barnes go on; let him show how contemptible are all these half-way meetings, this halting and incongruous fellowship, which has as little of the unity of the spirit in it as any strife can have. We say Mr. Barnes has done good service in unmasking the nonsense and hypocrisy of such unions. There is no union of principle in them. It is little better than a meeting for glorifying one another. There would be no charm in it without this food for self; and we say the sects have something to answer for when they suffer themselves to be flattered by such concessions, and thereby seduce men from their principles and propriety.

We are not able to speak, in particular, of the merits of this work, as it is somewhat out of the range of subjects claiming our attention. But the interest of the subject, and the character both of the author and translator, will commend it to those who have a taste for such works. A cursory examination shows that it is a work of great learning, and containing a large amount of important information.

From English Church Papers.

BY THE LAST STEAMERS.

The following relates to Mr. Pierce Conolly, formerly a minister of the Church, afterwards a schismatical Priest of the Church of Rome. He has grown weary of his new office and of celibacy, and finds now the difficulty of returning to his old relations.

In the Arches Court yesterday, a singular case came on. Mr. Conolly, a married Priest of the American Church, some years since became a Romanist, separated from his wife (who became a nun, and founder of a Convent, at Hastings), while he took orders in the Roman Church. A year or so since, Earl Shrewsbury (a Romanist) sent Mr. Conolly on a mission to Rome, and subsequently he renounced Romanism. He now wishes to live with his wife again, but she refuses, and he has consequently taken proceedings for the restitution of conjugal rights. It appears that the separation—if not a formal divorce—was sanctioned by Pope Gregory XVI. The case is to be further argued, and the document obtained at Rome is to be set forth. Whether our Ecclesiastical Courts will recognize a divorce by the Roman Church, under such circumstances, remains to be seen.

Friday's Gazette contains orders in council ratifying certain schemes of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, for making additional provision for the cure of souls in certain parishes named; also for assigning districts to the new churches of St. Mary, at Middleton, Yorkshire; Trinity, at Bolventon, Cornwall; St. John, Stoke Row, Oxfordshire; Trinity, Shirebrook, Derbyshire; Christ Church, Allercliffe, Yorkshire; St. James, Mauston, Yorkshire; St. Peter, Forsbrook, Staffordshire; and St. Matthew, West Town, Dewsbury.

The number of additional churches erected during the last thirty years is variously estimated at from 1,100 to 1,400; the latter amount, probably, includes the whole number consecrated, many being churches rebuilt only. In the diocese of London, 161 new churches were consecrated (to 29th July, 1847.) In the diocese of Winchester, 155, of which 55 were rebuilt (to November, 1847.) In the diocese of Litchfield, 135 new churches were consecrated (to October, 1847.) In the diocese of Chester, during the twenty years it was held by the present Archbishop of Canterbury, 230 new churches were built.

The Irish Ecclesiastical Journal announces that a subscription has been commenced for the distressed Protestant clergy; the Archbishop of Dublin heads the list with the munificent sum of 137*l*. Mr. Arthur Guinness contributes 40*l*.; Lady Arden has given 50*l*.; six trustees have been appointed for the fund, and subscriptions are received by the Rev. Charles Wolseley, 133 Stephen's-green. Amongst the cases brought forward into public notice is that of a clergyman whose income was 367*l*. yearly. Of that sum 94*l*. was assigned to pay a charge for 1000*l*. on the glebe house. His poor rates for the last year were 160*l*. He had a rent of 47*l*. to pay for the glebe, and, after paying an insurance, he had a balance of 41*l*. per annum to support his wife, himself, and seven children.

Europe is now in a most disturbed state, and wars and rumors of wars are the burdens of the Foreign news. We give the following interesting summary from the English Churchman.

The French Republican fete of the 4th May went off peaceably, though there have been disturbances amongst the soldiers both at Paris and Lyons. The anniversary of the death of the Emperor Napoleon was celebrated on the 5th inst., but did not produce a reconciliation between the President and his cousin Napoleon Bonaparte, as was expected. The Prince de Joinville is certain to be elected for the Haute Marne; and in all probability, the Duc d'Aumale also for Algiers. This will give the Orleanist part a piéd a terre, which they will not fail to turn to their own advantage. The Prince de Joinville is very popular in France (where everything depends upon personal character) and he bids fair to be the next President.

The advanced guard of the French Expedition has arrived at Rome, but has met with a prompt and severe check. So General Oudinot has sent for reinforcements. The Roman Republicans threaten to blow up St. Peter's, the Quirinal, &c., rather than yield; but we fancy they will give in after blustering a little. At the same time we must say that we think this French expedition to Italy to have been totally uncalled for, if the object of it really be the restoration of the Pope, and nothing else. His Holiness, would, without doubt, have been soon restored by the Roman people themselves, who are heartily sick of the Republican faction. In like manner, the Grand Duke of Tuscany would have been restored by his own subjects, without the aid of Austrian bayonets. But the Austrians and French are sadly inclined to meddle where they have no business; and they are so jealous of each other, that we should not be at all surprised if they came to loggerheads in Italy.

The Austrians are bombarding Venice, and the Sardinian fleet has left the Adriatic; but considerable irritation still continues to exist between these two powers. The conferences at Milan have not led to any definitive result.

The cause of Don Carlos seems to be lost for the present in Spain. He will have a better chance on the death of the Queen, when the Spaniards will certainly prefer him to the Duc de Montpensier.

The German troops have not yet advanced into Jutland. The fact is, they will soon be wanted at home. If the Danes have a little patience, they will be able to settle the matter in their own way.

Germany is in a very disturbed state. The King of Saxony has been obliged to leave Dresden; and matters are no better in Bavaria. The Rhenish Provinces too are very unsettled. The fact is, that the King of Prussia's refusal of the Imperial Crown (combined, as it is, with the entrance of the Russians into Hungary) has given a great impulse to German Unity, and that, too, in a Republican direction. It would have been more prudent if the King of Prussia had accepted the Imperial Crown, even with his present Constitution, which he might have got modified afterwards. As it is, the people see that Austria, Prussia and Russia are all playing into each other's hands, and they resent it accordingly. A German Republic seems a very likely event.

The Russians are pouring large bodies of troops into Hungary to assist the Austrians against the Magyars.

The Prussians also are sending an army of observation to the frontiers of Silesia. The object of these movements is to prevent a Polish insurrection.

There has been an attempt at revolution in Persia, but it has been put down by the firmness of the Shah.

The last Indian news was satisfactory. The Sikh Chieftains had surrendered to the British, and given up their cannon, arms, and prisoners. The Punjab will now be annexed to our Indian Empire.

In England the second reading of the Parliamentary Oaths Bill has been carried by a majority of 93.

It will be seen, by our Parliamentary report, that the second reading of the Bill for repealing the Navigation Laws has been (by means of proxies) carried by a majority of ten! Of the Lords who were present, there was a majority of fourteen against the Bill; so that, if this majority pleases, it can still throw out or nullify the Bill in Committee, where proxies cannot be employed.

From the Continent, we learn that the Austrian and Neapolitan troops are hastening to join the French, in the Roman States, where they will probably realize the old song—

"Father, and mother, and I,
And a stout and trusty band,
Beat a poor little beggar boy,
Till he could not go nor stand."

THE WITNESS WITHIN.

MR. EDITOR:

Lest I be misapprehended in my remarks, in my last paper and the present one, on the inward "fruits of the Spirit," and His pervading communion with the whole secret places of the heart, allow me to say,—that I think no better of a perpetual raking among the sentiments and feelings, than of the constant opening of a watch to gaze upon and finger its wheels and springs. Both the heart and a watch are too delicate for gross prying: both will be put out of order by over-curiosity. Nevertheless, while we give up the watch to the creative and curative skill of its maker, we are so far joint-creators of our graces within, "working out our own salvation," that we can further the holy work, or mar it utterly; it will neither appear nor exist without our earnest co-operation. Highly important is it, therefore, to eschew carelessness or ignorance in so vital an issue, and understand well our spiritual task, exploring it deliberately and prudently, that we may be apt and able in fulfilling it.

Personal religion, friendly reader, is practical religion; and practical religion includes, with holy obedience, all the principles, affections, and thoughts which further stability and growth in well-doing,—all that revelation hath taught to make us "wiser unto salvation." Of this character is the whole doctrine of the influences of the Holy Paraclete on the heart,—some of which are peculiarly deep and recondite. Passages noting the highly mysterious action of the Spirit on our spirits are not unfrequent in the Bible,—"the secret of the Lord is with the righteous,"—"if any man will do His will, he shall know of the doctrine whether it be of God,"—"he that believeth on the Son of God hath the witness in himself." Most explicit, perhaps, among these lofty and animating encouragements, is the declaration, "the Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit that we are the children of God,"—which is supported by the parallel scriptures, we "have received the Spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba, Father," and, "because ye are sons, God hath sent forth the Spirit of His Son into your hearts, crying, Abba, Father." These notices of the WITNESSING SPIRIT direct us to the "confidence" inspired by Him in a Christian bosom,—one of the most delicate and most interesting topics in personal religion. Wonderful is the truth, that "the Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God."

Concerning this inward testimony of the Holy Ghost there are various opinions. One, very current, finds it in the miraculous gifts in the early Church; by which He attested to the Gentile converts, particularly, that they were "children of God,"—their becoming members of the Church being highly repugnant to the first Jewish brethren; but miracles were the testimony of the Spirit through an external means, not of the "Spirit itself" acting directly upon the soul; and outward marvels appealed to the common understanding of every one, rather than to that sanctified perception of the godly which is eminently "our spirit." Another view (Hammond) contrasts "the spirit of bondage," or the severe dispensation of the law, with "the spirit of adoption," or "easy yoke" of Christ,—and regards, not the Holy Ghost, but these benign gospel requirements, as "the spirit," and as attesting, conjointly with a good conscience, "our spirit," that the Christian converts were no longer "servants" under the old "bondage," but "sons" enjoying the new evangelical "adoption;" but this makes "the Spirit" figurative, not the Paraclete, not the Holy Ghost personally, which (see Bishop Middleton) is the true sense. A third exposition so connects the verse with the preceding words as to make our crying, "Abba, Father," the moment or juncture of "the Spirit's bearing witness with our spirit;" which, though perhaps over-definite as to the time or the immediate clearness of the testimony, is sound as presuming a direct operation of the Heavenly Witness on our hearts. Not so correct as this view (of Aretius and G. Penn), is that of Parkhurst; "the Spirit itself bears witness at the same time (namely, that we cry, Abba, Father,) to our spirit, that we are children of God, not by any direct impression, or immediate testimony communicated to the soul, but by leading us in our lives and conversation, and especially, by being in us a spirit of filial love to God;" the great error lies in making one "witness" instead of two,—a "witness to," instead of a "witness with." Were the authority less respectable, we might imagine that a dread of enthusiasm had influenced in such an exegesis. If so, it was unfortunate. No expediency whatever should control, or even touch, the interpretation of the word of God: here, interposing expediency is abomination.

* In Rom. ii. 15, "their conscience also bears witness," "with" (margin) their hearts, i. e. with "the law written" in them. In Rom. ix. 1, "my conscience also bearing me witness," i. e. with my tongue or pen. Joint-witness is the meaning in all the passages in the New Testament,—the one now occupying us (Rom. viii. 16,) being the third and last.

A double and united testimony is named in the words before us,—the testimony of the Holy Ghost, and the testimony of "our spirit." The original shows this clearly; and "with" in our translation is along with, and implies "partnership" or concurrence,—the Holy Spirit bears joint-testimony with our spirit, "with our conscience, to our mind or soul, "that we are children of God." (Pol. Syn., Bp. Bull, Calvin, Macknight, &c.: Bp. White, p. 21, 22, and Hammond, maintain a twofold witness.)

And the testimony of the Holy Ghost is not figurative or indirect,—not the "fruits of the Spirit," faith, works, affections,—for, our having these is the testimony of man's "spirit." It is a testimony His own, that of "the Spirit Itself," or in vernacular English, of the "Spirit Himself." Man has the testimony of a holy conscience, well examined of course, and most humbly estimated: the Sanctifier adds another, a concurrent, a confirming testimony, along with this,—superinducing an impleatory conviction of faith, on the rational conviction already existing and deliberately and rationally approved.

If "our spirit" bear not its witness, the Holy Ghost bears not His; for He is but a "joint-witness," never attesting alone, but only in support of the attesting "spirit" of the party concerned. Hence, no conviction, be it ever so powerful, tenacious, enthusiastic, is paraetelal, can be attributed to the Holy Ghost, if there be wanting a "heart which condemns not," accredited by the life, a heart "created in righteousness and true holiness." It is mere delusion to arrogate the certifying of the Spirit of God to our hope, without the 'joint-certificate' of a soundly approving conscience in ourselves.

We infer, naturally, that wherever our own "witness" within, the conscience uncondemning, the righteous heart is found, and is approved by the conduct, there likewise will be the "witness" of the Holy Ghost. Every godly man has, or may have, the celestial attestation. This we justly infer: for, though good writers (see Poole) confine it to "a very few only, and they the most perfect among Christians," the scope of the passage is not thus limited. The apostle hints not an exception, but speaks the unqualified language of a general rule. This is obvious. And the phrase "our spirit" (not 'our spirits') points to the general spirit, the one spirit, of heart-ruling and life-ruling religion, the hallowed sensibility of a hallowed conscience, as being the "joint-witness" with the Holy Ghost: all who have that one spirit, a purified heart, are embraced in the assertion of St. Paul, and either have or may have the sacred "confidence." As the general rule, where our hearts bear witness, the "Spirit Himself" bears joint-witness.

Another thought pertains to the words "our spirit." The sanctified "spirit" of good men is one in kind and in effect, but different in degree,—a characteristic spirit in all, but varying in the amount or intensity of its consolation, according to the measure of holiness attained, and yet more according to the impressibility, natural or acquired. Some Christians experience more of its happiness, some less; while some give it almost no attention, and seem ignorant of a privilege which greater heed and a brighter temperament would discover,—a diversity common in all matters connected with feeling. Hence, a wide latitude is always to be understood in affirming the universality of the presence of the Witness in holy bosoms. It is graduated, partly, by the sound purity and peace of the conscience, and, very much, by the constitutional or disciplined frame of mind. Yet in every converted and obedient heart, with a few anomalous exceptions, it is either readily perceived, or may be discerned with careful observation.

Being, however a privilege only of piety, not an essential, our not taking cognizance of it involves no peril of our eternal safety. The principles and the life are the only tests and the only requisites. And these cannot be annulled, though they are aided, by a wholesome unimpassioned regard to the hallowed movement of our sensitive nature. Nor may it be forgotten, that illusive or hypocritical sensitiveness is the veriest bane of Christian virtue,—much more, the sensitiveness that is only simulated.

The apostle has defined the exact purport of the 'joint-testimony': it is, "that we are the children of God." The attestation is not that we are unchangeably pardoned, or that we have an indefectible inheritance of glory,—but simply that we enjoy this high filial relation, are new-born in heart, morally regenerate. An irrevocable security of heaven is not granted at all,—at least until the death-bed. And our security of it for the time being comes only from our successful valid title,—is but an inference from the assured fact of our sonship; a right inference indeed, "if children, then heirs, heirs of God, and joint-heirs with Christ;" yet this is not the matter explicitly attested. Christians will be disappointed, sooner or later, who ask an inward certifying of their future bliss, who would not be disappointed if they sought only the certifying of their being at present sons of God and in His paternal favour. Though divine sonship is a strong argument of our eternal acceptance, a very strong one, it is not infallible: for, as with earthly heritages, so may we in fair expectancy be "heirs of God and joint-heirs with Christ," yet never take our patrimony in possession. St. Paul, both baptismally and morally a son of God, allowed that he might "become a castaway." And his confidence he records with this perfect accuracy,—"I know whom I have believed, and am persuaded that He is able to keep that which I have committed unto Him:" his trust he "knows," having the Witness within of sonship; but of so continuing he is only "persuaded;" and that modest persuasion is that God is "able" (not prepossessed) to uphold him to the last. Let our notions be as accurate.

Where now,—with the subject brought to the light, and with the apostolic moderation in view,—where shall the enthusiast find countenance? He hankers after some flash of animal feeling, some rapture, for the Spirit's testimony; and while this is unfelt, he believes not that the Paraclete is communing with his soul. Lamentable misconception! When the Spirit shall lift our hearts in final victory, in the last day, He will pour into them the ecstasy everlasting. All that we now look for is a mild and gentle consolation, that peace which passeth understanding," which tells us to go on our way rejoicing, and to hold fast our confidence firm to the end. Far from us be aught beyond this! The more we are given to enthusiasm, the more our hearts are accustomed to strong excitement, the less will be our sensibility to these mild and tranquil observations and emotions,—in which is found the genuine witnessing of the Holy Ghost.

Impulses, impulsive feelings, impulsive transports,—what are they,—what more common or more senseless? You may even produce, artificially, artistically, artfully, any vehemence or any dejection in the human breast. An army may be roused to even madness of courage,—it may then be struck with unaccountable panic; yet the personal character and substantial qualities of each soldier remain well nigh what they were before. A multitude may kindle into a momentary rage that will destroy and trample upon the best man within their reach,—or may be moved to a false pity, knowing none among criminals too vile to be rescued from justice; yet when the frantic hour is past, the heart and principles of almost every one of them continue about as good or about as bad as before the excitement. Public rage, or panic, or a wild mental trepidation compounded of both, and just as irrational and undurable, may deal as terribly and as fatally with reputation. Religionists have perpetrated all deeds of fanaticism, and deeds worse than fanaticism, in the notion that they were "doing God service," nay, that they were under a divine impulse; but in time, such fancies melt, and very often their religion vanishes along with the religious delusion,—the enthusiast then receding into nearly his former condition. In all such cases, a partial or total eclipse of mental sanity, a contagious bewildering, on the point concerned, must have occurred,—a wonder, yet too common to be wondered at. The soldier's rage and his panic, the cruelty or the effeminacy of the multitude, the persecution of credulous tongues, the religionist's wildness, are obliquities of mind, storm-clouds hovering over the regular current of the intellect, the heart, the character. And shall we allow the testimony of the Spirit to be at all cognate with these? Shall we acknowledge its remotest affinity with animal fervour, with excitement or depression of the animal spirits, with any of those workings of the sentient fabric which hold captive the better faculties, and overwhelm the regulated sentiments of reasonableness and piety? No, verily. Come these delusions, and all like them, whence they may, they come not from the Paraclete.

A large class of excitements called religious, kindred with the foregoing, though generally not so extreme or outrageous, and vehemently extolled when (almost thirty years ago) these remarks were first penned, are now confessed, by even their former promoters, besides thousands of the subjects of them, to have no sound claim to the co-operation or the approbation of the Spirit of God,—none to His witnessing influence. They belong not to "the Second Man, the Lord from Heaven," but to "the first man," and are "of the earth, earthy."

The divine testimony within ranks generically with the emotions of joy, peace, hope; they all, like gracious love, are "shed abroad in our hearts through the power of the Holy Ghost;" and, like the entire "religion which is from above," these emotions are "pure, peaceable, gentle, full of mercy and good fruits." They are softer breathings of the Spirit than inspiration proper; and they have no affinity with animal excitement. They are a superaddition, from the Sanctifier, to the general felicity of virtue, and the general consolation of piety; and they pertain to those in whom the warfare of virtue and piety is no longer dubious or worse than dubious, but hopefully victorious. Being above nature, we may not class them with natural emotions, and investigate them as points of ordinary philosophy: scripture and sound holy experience are the lights by which to study them. If we urge them beyond the due warmth, into high stimulation, the genuine emotion is lost in a stronger feeling,—the false affection overcrows the true, drowns it, floods it away. Reason departs when we become passionate, fiery, fiercely captious; good-will, in rioting fellowship; courage, in ferocity; manliness, in blustering; and so throughout;—excess in any quality or feeling will usually create a vital change: and in like manner, the impress within of the Heavenly Witness, as also indeed peace, hope, joy, love, essentially bland and meek, are effaced by the rude stamp of aggravated animal sensation. Precocious cultivation turns them into exuberant and short-lived weeds.—Holy joy, and peace, and hope, and love, are degrees and variations of the inward testimony of the Spirit, akin to the ASSURING WITNESS from Him that we are "children of God." It is not a rampant positive security, but a calm confirming assurance,—and not of final pardon, but of present actual acceptance. And we cannot better describe it than in the language of Article XVII, which, we presume, included this heavenly "witness with their spirit" whom God's foreknowledge of their character, as His pardoned and obedient sons, hath chosen:—"the godly consideration of predestination, and our election in Christ, is full of sweet, pleasant, and unspeakable comfort to godly persons, and such as feel in themselves the working of the Spirit of Christ, mortifying the works of the flesh and their earthly members, and drawing up their mind to high and heavenly things, as well because it doth greatly establish and confirm their faith of eternal salvation, to be enjoyed through Christ, as because it doth fervently kindle their love towards God." The divine WITNESS WITHIN "establishes and confirms faith, fervently kindles love:" what greater benefit can there be, in the entire scope of providence or of grace?

But you ask,—can that be "assurance" which is not perfect virtue? I ask, in return,—can that be virtue which is not perfect virtue? or that confidence and trust in men which is not perfect reliance? All such language is but the language of approximation, an accommodation to the deficiency of language. The Holy Ghost so confirms the humble soul as to relieve doubt and awaken encouragement,—and this, so far only as comports with continued humbleness and the utter repudiation of careless security. Theologians find constantly employed terms not in their ordinary meaning. Thus,—besides more important examples,—the Bible represents God as pleased or angry, merciful or jealous, loving or hating, yet none of these in the sense of human passion. Nor is there a wider difference between passion and the thoughts of God, than between an unqualified asseveration to the soul, and the confirming emotion given by the Spirit to those who have the testimony of a conscience in humble peace. This heavenly confirmation is closely allied to assurance, and is so termed as a near approximation to a positive utterance of the Holy Ghost.

Concerning the fitness of the mild and unpretending character of this grace, ponder this further truth. Examine the sentiments of a pious bosom, and you find HUMILITY to be the first and the last, the Alpha and the Omega, of all repentance and all faith: ALL estimates of self, in the true Christian, terminate in humility. And this authenticates their heavenly origin. For, can such a principle naturally yield confidence? have abasement and exultation a natural affinity? Obviously not. "Assurance" cannot result from humility as the indigenous cause, but is effected by divine power, by the Divine Paraclete. And this resolves the seeming paradox,—that the more perfect our lowliness and renunciation of merit, the more stable will be our joy, and peace, and hope, and love, and the more confirmed our persuasion that we are born of God. "Our spirit," godly and fruitful, bears this testimony; but a shade of uncertainty impends, from an humble sense of imperfection. The Spirit from on high breathes upon us, therefore, a loftier current of emotion, and attests our own testimony. And thus humility and assurance become supernaturally and perpetually, yea, eternally confederate, and harmonious inmates of a renewed soul here, and the vitality of a glorified saint hereafter.

To the foregoing exposition, of our important theme,—highly important as aiding the deep inspection and progress of the soul,—we add a few practical remarks.

1. Though every one, having Christian rectitude, Christian principle, and Christian warmth, may know the high witness of the Spirit, yet, being above nature and human philosophy, to argue profitably concerning it is not easy, and different minds attain different conceptions of its nature. Absolute agreement, therefore, of one mind with another, is not to be expected,—much less, agreement in language. Language is framed for secular objects much more than for spiritual, and hence is imperfect generally in delineations of piety. Especially do our ideas of devout impressions belong to ourselves individually,—very seldom to be spoken of,—never to be displayed,—never to be held a standard for our brethren. What we experience, then, of confidence and assurance,—having proved it thoroughly by the broadest moral tests before we trust it,—is to be regarded as a personal gift, demanding our highest gratitude and praise,—not as a topic of boasting,—much less as a measure of the godliness of others. It is not conferred for obtrusion or towering exultation of any kind, but for encouragement to new efforts in obedience and all pious attainments,—and also for humiliation, that our highest efforts bear no proportion to our reward, here or hereafter.

2. Earnest brother! avoid as pestilence all animal substitutes for this high testimony,—for substitutes only they are,—I mean glowing feelings, indescribable sensations, self-exalting triumph, the fume of "despising others." We may distinguish this imaginary kind of religion,—by its not being accompanied and authenticated by sound and mature piety,—by its not being proportioned to a sterling growth in piety,—by its overcrowing mild humility, or else, plainly or plausibly affecting to be humble,—by its resting, in any degree whatever, in the comparison of itself with the piety of others,—by its violence, its resulting from ardent stimulation, its claim to a mystical nature or enjoyment. The genuine witness of the Holy Ghost is vouchsafed only to practical sanctification and newness of life, to "fulness of mercy and good fruits," to deep and inextinguishable lowliness of heart,—it is duly graduated by the entire holy progress,—it is ever serene and gentle.

3. Seek not so much for a testimony of the Holy Ghost, as for the testimony of your own "spirit." The latter we can ourselves improve by an increase in hallowed virtue; and therefore we may forbear carking anxiety concerning the former,—trusting that it will be granted as our filial relation to God becomes purer and brighter. To long after assurance, while we are careless of further repentance and amendment, is mere selfishness,—watching for a mean bargain with the Almighty,—asking a promise and pledge of Him, without performing the required conditions. And, be our goodness ever so hopeful, to be over-anxious for a confirmation of our trust is to be distrustful; and God may withhold the boon in righteous discipline of such an infirmity. The testimony of the Spirit is not an addition to our uprightness, it only inspires comfort; and comfort is supervenient favour, and a help, but not an essential. When the secrets of all hearts shall be revealed, many will doubtless prove to be God's children, and pass their judgment honourably, who in this life failed to discern within the paraetelal testimony. That privilege should be left unreservedly to Him whose dealings in this as in every matter, though often mysterious, are always just, and wise, and merciful. Repressing perturbation will best avert the deceptive notions and feelings that prevent the humble recognition of the Comforter, when He may be actually infusing His mild joy, His calm peace, His tranquil confirmation. Such emotions, alas, count for nothing—with the over-exacting, and with the ambitious.

4. We should ever improve soundly this benefit; not abusing it, but treating it according to its spiritual nature and high delicacy. Attaining the hallowed gift, (as we tremblingly believe,) whether faintly or more decidedly marked, whether budding or maturing, we are never to slacken our progress in well-doing. If we thus recede,—as "our spirit" withdraws or veils its testimony, the genuine testimony of the Holy Ghost will darken also. Some treat their better prospect as they do a pleasing gift, a new dress, a new ornament, a new picture, simply to be admired; and the admiration vanishes for want of deeper and holier regard. Some, who ought to have "clean escaped," shatter it as children do toys, courting anew the peril of sin; and, instead of an advance, there is a retrograde movement of the Divine Supporter. And we are warned, that those may "fall away, who have been enlightened, and who have tasted the heavenly gift, and the good word of God, and the powers of the world to come." No arrogance then, no indolence, because our cured leprosy has been showed to the Priest! for the spiritual malady may return with double violence, and our "last state be worse than the first."

Thus guided, and thus guarded, the upright may improve the disclosures within, of the Sanctifier, to their frequent consolation; while the wicked will or ought to see in our doctrine perpetual disquiet. The former derive encouragement from tracing their hope to a heavenly Source; to the latter is denounced the blasting alarm, that the confidence of the unrepentant has not the seal of God.

On the approach of death, sin, which brought death, outspreads often the darkness of its curse; and the "child of God," though entering paradise, is timid at the summoning Voice, and would "hide" himself, as unworthy to appear in the holy Presence: an "unprofitable servant" at best, humility re-awakens fear after he has "done all." But the Paraclete will often, in that hour, dispel the misgiving. He will plead with humility till it shall go hand in hand with triumph,—like the eagle preparing to soar after its last flight on the parental wings.* He will again bring from heaven the seal of the Father's fidelity; and as He writes anew within the departing saint His comforting testimonial, He will stamp that seal so deeply that not one character of the impression shall be wanting,—the assured favour seen, felt, unboundedly relied upon. With this clear muniment, the maturely regenerate soul is emboldened;—and, in anticipation of being new-born, in the resurrection, in the perfect image of the Saviour, can breathe victoriously the expiring whisper, "when I awake up with Thy likeness, I shall be SATISFIED."

"BREAD UPON THE WATERS."

A year ago—'Tis a holy day of the Church, the festival of St. John the Baptist. A light vessel moves over the waters, cleaving the waves which play about the shores of yon bright island of the sea. In her cabin, a man of noble mien, a Bishop of the Church of Christ, sits tracing, with fluent pen, thoughts that breathe pure devotion to his Master's cause. About him is a group of dark hued boys, the native children of yon glorious isle, each with a book in hand, intent upon his task. 'Tis the devoted Selwyn of New Zealand, "instant in season, out of season," coasting along the shores, where, but as yesterday, Satan's seat was, in prosecution of his blessed work of founding there the Church of the living God, and gemming that once benighted land with living temples of the Holy Ghost. That group of boys, fresh gathered from the heathen, so is his hope, shall "as lively stones be built up a spiritual house, an holy priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices acceptable to God, by Jesus Christ." We learn all from the sheet that lies before him, freighted with a glowing, hopeful message to his own loved England. "That there is no difficulty in procuring a supply of promising scholars is proved by the fact, that I am now writing, with my cabin full of native boys, busy learning the collect for the day, St. John the Baptist's. I have eleven in all on board." He is communing with that venerable institution, "the Society for propagating the Gospel," in behalf of "the flock over the which the Holy Ghost hath made him overseer." "We require men who will number every hair of a native's head, as part of the work of Him who made and redeemed the world." He is guiding with his eye that youthful band; seeking, by the Spirit's blessing, to enlighten their minds more and more with the light of the everlasting gospel, as reflected in the services of the Church. Native boys learning the collect for the day, St. John the Baptist's! They who might else have lived and died New Zealand savages, drinking in the words of such a prayer! "Almighty God, by whose providence thy servant John the Baptist was wonderfully born and sent to prepare the way of Thy Son, our Saviour, make us so to follow his doctrine and holy life, that we may truly repent, according to his preaching, boldly rebuke vice and patiently suffer for the truth's sake, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen." Glory be to God on high, for that He hath given His only Son our Saviour Jesus Christ, "a light to lighten the Gentiles"—for that He hath sent forth such a labourer unto such a harvest.

A year gone by, St. John the Baptist's day is nigh at hand to us: and then, we, in this our favoured land, shall unite in the strain breathed in their far distant home by "Selwyn and his native flock." Dwelling between the fatherland of New Zealand's mitred saint and the land of which he, of God, is made the Father, our offering will mingle with theirs and make both one, as the collect for the day—the Church's prayers, a golden censer, shall go circling the globe, gathering, as incense, the heart's desires of the blessed company of Christ's faithful people, to bear them up to heaven. Is it not a thought to kindle higher our devotions on the festival?

Coincident, this year, with the Lord's day, neither festival will eclipse the other, but both unite their rays to make that Sabbath a delight, holy of the Lord and honourable; and unite to cast a genial warmth upon the sister Branches and their parent stock—to draw up, by the blessing of the Holy Ghost, from England and New Zealand and our own America, the fragrance of fervent and effectual prayers. We cast these thoughts as Bread upon the waters. Can the promise ever fail, thou shalt find it, after many days?

THE RETREAT.

TO THE EDITOR.

Among the several institutions of learning connected with the Church, I know of none that presents stronger claims to encouragement than the CHURCH seminary for young ladies, on School lane, near Germantown, known as "THE RETREAT," under the charge of Miss M. A. SPAFARD, liberally assisted by several accomplished teachers.

To the notices of this school which have occasionally appeared in your editorial columns, I beg permission to add a few words in the way of earnest commendation, in justice not only to those who stand at the head of this excellent seminary, but for the information of Churchmen generally, who may be supposed to cherish a particular interest in Church institutions. This duty is discharged from public considerations alone, the writer having no other interest in the matter than that which, as a Churchman, he naturally feels in the success of every enterprise having for its primary object the advancement of sound instruction, religious and literary, and the judicious training of children in the way they should go.

The practice of men claiming to be regarded as faithful members of our holy communion, in sending their sons and daughters to colleges and schools established and governed by dissenters, is an inconsistency for which, in our day, no reasonable excuse can be pleaded. Time was, when Churchmen had only a choice of evils; and if their sons were sent to college at all, or their daughters to boarding school, it became a matter of grave and very anxious inquiry to which of the many establishments under the watchful guardianship of persons inimical to the Church, their offspring were to be sent for literary and religious culture. With the progress of the Church, and auxiliary to its high and sacred mission, colleges and seminaries have been founded, in which the course of instruction is more comprehensive, and quite as thorough and accurate, as in any of the older institutions; and in several, while this course of instruction is distinguished by a far wiser and more practical adaptation to the requirements and spirit of this progressive time, the inestimable advantages of the teachings of the Church—her healthful and elevating influences—are superadded; and, while "BURLINGTON COLLEGE," and "ST. MARY'S HALL"—those noble monuments of the unassisted energy, and earnest, unfaltering perseverance of their distinguished founder—shall remain, they, with kindred institutions, will henceforth become the nursing mothers of the Church, if those, especially, who recognize her paramount authority, shall no longer continue unfaithful to their most sacred obligations.

The advantages afforded by "THE RETREAT" are certainly not inferior to those of any other school within the knowledge of the writer. Its situation is "beautiful exceedingly," occupying one of the healthiest positions of a proverbially healthy region, and is within a few minutes' walk from a depot upon the Philadelphia and Norristown railroad, and about two miles from Germantown, within sound, also, of the bells of the celebrated Church of St. James the Less, the rector of which is distinguished for sound churchmanship, piety and zeal, and under whose faithful ministrations the pupils enjoy all the advantages that could be desired for them.

The grounds belonging to "THE RETREAT" are extensive, and the amplest freedom for recreation is allowed. Here are successfully taught the various branches of an English education, with drawing, and painting in oil and water colors; also music, Latin and French. Eminent professors of these several branches are in constant attendance, faithfully devoted to their respective departments, and the scholars are carefully instructed in the ways of the Church, through the daily use of her impressive services, and the example of pious and enlightened members.

ADDRESS,

TO THE GRADUATING CLASS AT ST. MARY'S HALL; MARCH, 1849.

Beloved children, the painful parting moment comes, at last! The daily task, the daily pleasure, and the daily prayer, are done and gone! No more, the thronged and busy school-room, with its beaming galaxy of cheerful faces and bright eyes. No more, the long-drawn corridors, through which the ready feet hastened, at every summons of the faithful bell. No more, the patient and devoted teacher, waiting your approach; the quiet lecture-room; the books, the maps, the apparatus, the black-board and the slate. No more, the evening stroll, with loving arms clasped close to loving hearts, along the sweet, sky-tintured Delaware, upon the verdant carpet of its loveliest bank. No more, the morning bell, the still, sequestered, sacred "noons," the evening prayer, and hymn; with the fond parting, where heart went with hand. No more, the peaceful dormitory, with its space for silent prayer, and then its welcome couch; and then the sleep, as sweet, as when the moonlight slept on that Venetian bank,* in Shakspeare's pictured page. No more, the festal day, with that domestic Sacrament; in which a father, with his children, of one family, fed, with still hearts, in penitential love, upon that blessed banquet, which the Saviour spread, and gave Himself to be its heavenly food. No more! No more!

But, no! It is not so. These are not gone. The mind, the soul, die not. They are immortal; and they lend their immortality to all their issues, interests, and incidents. No hour of faithful study, in your whole school course, dear children, has been lost. It told, in treasure, such as California could not compass, in that most thorough, searching, all-embracing trial of your strength, and wealth, of mind, which made your closing examination the most satisfactory to me, and the most honorable to your teachers and yourselves, that I have ever witnessed. Your early hours, your systematic occupation, your simple fare, your joyous sports, your constant intercourse of mutual love: these are not lost. They live in the serene repose of your well-balanced feelings; in the sweet contentment of your daily life; in the subdued, yet buoyant, cheerfulness of your young hearts. And, in the sacred haunts of home, and in the converse of the dear ones that surround its hearth, and in the social intercourse of life, they will attest the wholesome wisdom, and the faithful tenderness, which have controlled your training here; while they give pledge, with God to bless you, of health, and usefulness, and influence, and that true cheerfulness which flows from a well-ordered mind, in all your after-life. And this is not the best. The faithful counsels and instructions of this sacred place; its vocal chants; its tender and subduing hymns; its solemn prayers; your penitent confessions, the fervent protestations of your faith, your glad thanksgivings, your beseeching intercessions, your devotions of the heart, your patient catechising, your child-like listening to the sure word of God, your eager study of its blessed page: these are not lost. They are engrafted in your heart; and, in the dew, that is won down from heaven, on tender, faithful, loving souls, are bringing forth the fruits of righteousness and peace. They have led you, by the Spirit's mild constraint, to the baptismal water, to the sacred rail, to the most holy Eucharist: and, if you continue faithful in the use of these divine provisions, for the renewal of your nature, and salvation of your souls, through the most blessed Cross of Jesus Christ, they will conduct you, all your days, in holiness and righteousness of life; console and smoothe the hour and pillow of your death; and open for you, in the pathway which the blessed Saviour trod, and stained with tears and blood, the Paradise of God.

Oh, my beloved, what a blessedness and beauty in such thoughts and hopes as these, made true and real—and, if we but will, made certain, and made ours—by the most holy word of God; as they were purchased for us by the blood of His dear, only Son! Take them out with you into the world, to be a light to guide your feet, a panoply to guard your heads. Take them home with you, to be the comfort of dear parents, the encouragement and strength of brothers and of sisters, the joy of all who know and love you, and are happy in your happiness. Nor leave us out of their benign and blessed comprehension. Bear us with you in your thoughts. Let us dwell kindly in your hearts. Let us never be forgotten in your prayers. Come to us, when you can, with loving confidence, as children, to a father's home: and be assured of a true welcome, from a father's loving heart. And, oh, beloved, as my last word to you, as pupils of St. Mary's Hall—and, it may be, my last word, to you on earth—so keep the faith, you have acknowledged here, and live so in its holy precepts, and its pious prayers, that, when the voice of the Archangel shall awake the dead, and call the living to be judged, your names may be found written in the book of life, before the Lamb; and you be with Him, where He is, in perfectness of bliss, forever and for ever.

It is a great fault, even of good men, to expect that others should be convinced of, and brought to own the truth all at once, and perhaps to be angry if they are not: neither conceiving how difficult it is for such a blind and proud creature as man to see the truth and own his mistakes; nor by what slow degrees they arrived at it themselves. Little good comes by disputing. Pride is generally at the bottom of it, and not charity or the love of truth; and it is seldom managed with decency and candour enough to produce any good effect. Let fall a word in season, and wait in patience till the rain drops upon it from heaven.

Speaking ill of others at all, unless it be to prevent mischief to religion or our neighbour, is only for the sake of tickling ourselves, and those that hear us, with a comparison; proceeds from pride; and has no other tendency but to increase it.

In case of peevishness, ill-nature and unreasonable passion in others, if it be possible, be unmoved; be gentle and compassionate; give place to wrath, do not irritate; and try to soften.

* In point of fact, the scene in "the Merchant of Venice," which supplies this allusion, is laid at Belmont, the seat of Portia, on the Continent.

NEW JERSEY.

ORDINATION.—On Trinity Sunday the Bishop of the Diocese admitted the Rev. Andrew Mackie, Deacon, Missionary at St. Thomas' Church, Glassborough, and St. Stephen's, Mullica Hill, to the Priesthood. The Rev. Dr. Boyd read morning prayers. The Rev. Mr. Braden presented the candidate. The Bishop preached and administered the Holy Communion. The Rev. Mr. Frost read the Epistle.

MARYLAND.

DIOCESAN CONVENTION.*—The Sixty-first Diocesan Convention assembled in St. Paul's church, Baltimore, on Wednesday morning, May 30th, and owing to the indisposition of the Bishop, it was organized by the unanimous election of Rev. Wm. E. Wyatt, D.D., as President, and Dr. Colburn, as Secretary.

At 9 o'clock Divine service was performed, the Rev. J. R. Keach reading Prayers, the Rev. Mr. Gilliss reading the Lessons, and the Rev. H. V. D. Johns reading the Ante-Communion Service. The annual sermon was preached by the Rev. C. R. Nelson, of Annapolis, from the text: "Let a man so account of us as the ministers of Christ and stewards of the mysteries God." 2 Cor. iv. 3.

Upon the conclusion of the sermon, the holy Eucharist was administered to the members of the Convention and the large congregation assembled, by the Rev. Dr. Wyatt, who was assisted in the distribution of the elements by the Rev. Messrs. Johns, Keach and Gilliss.

Religious Services.—The morning service was read on each day, at St. Paul's, at 6 A. M., and the communion at 8 A. M. After which the Convention had two sessions, i. e. from 9 till 2, and from 3 till 5.

The attendance at the Convention was much better than was expected; and throughout the whole session, there appeared great harmony and good feeling in the transaction of business.

The standing committee was elected by a considerable majority, and it is composed of men who are well qualified to discharge the duties of that important post.

During the Convention the address of the Bishop was read by Rev. Mr. Lyman, of Hagerstown; and his charge by Rev. Mr. Kerfoot, Rector of St. James' College.

The address exhibits the remarkable activity of the Bishop, who makes up for the size of his diocese, by unwearied diligence in executing his duties, and of whom it may be said, as of the early Apostles, "in labors apt."

From this address it appears that during the conventional year, there have been 16 clerical removals, 1 death, and 16 additions. The total number of clergy at present in the diocese, including the Bishop, is 118. Of which 110 are Presbyters, and 7 Deacons.—The present number of candidates for Holy Orders in the diocese is 17. During the year, there have been held four ordinations, at which 5 were admitted to the Diaconate, and 4 to the Priesthood. The number of confirmations have been 67, at which 437 received the laying on of hands. The number of church edifices consecrated during the year was five.

The address complains of insufficient support from the people, for the paper which is his official organ, and for the other great but general, and it may be added, generally neglected interests of the Diocese. But at the same time it exhibits a prosperity, of which the Church in Maryland may well be proud.

How much has been accomplished since 1840! The fund for support of the Episcopate has been partly collected, many churches built, still more repaired, schools established, colleges founded, and other enterprises accomplished, too numerous to mention.

SECOND DAY.

The Triennial Charge of the Bishop, which appeared to be directed mainly to the refutation of certain latitudinarian sentiments entertained in the Church, was then read by the Rev. J. B. Kerfoot. The paper, which was evidently a learned and masterly production, was listened to throughout with profound attention, and on its conclusion a resolution was adopted providing for its publication. It occupied about one hour and a quarter in its reading.

The house then proceeded to the order of the day, being the election of the Standing Committee of the Diocese.

On motion of the Rev. Dr. Pyne, the following gentlemen were elected viva voce as the Executive Committee of Missions: Rev. Messrs. William E. Wyatt, D.D., Alfred Miller and Thomas Atkinson, and Samuel I. Donaldson, Hugh Davy Evans and James Mason Campbell, Esqs.

On motion of the same gentleman, the following committees were elected viva voce:

Trustees of the Episcopal Fund—Wm. J. Albert, Treasurer, J. Mason Campbell, Esq., Hon. E. F. Chambers, Samuel I. Donaldson, John S. Gittings, and Robert Neilson, Esqs.

Trustees of the Fund for Superannuated and Infirm Clergymen—Revs. Thomas Atkinson, Hugh T. Harrison, Thomas S. Alexander, John Glenn and Henry A. Thompson, Esqs.

The tellers appointed to receive the vote of the convention for members of the Standing Committees now made their report.

The report of the tellers having been read, the president declared the following gentlemen to be duly elected as the Standing Committee of the Diocese:

For the Western Shore, the Rev. Dr. Wyatt, Rev. Mr. Atkinson, Rev. Mr. Pinkney, Rev. Mr. McKenney.

For the Eastern Shore, the Rev. R. W. Goldsborough, Rev. John Owen and Rev. John Crosdale.

The Convention then adjourned to meet at 4 o'clock.

Afternoon Session. The Convention met at four o'clock, and, after the calling of the roll, proceeded to business.

The Rev. Dr. Atkinson, from the Committee on the admission of new parishes and congregations, reported in favor of allowing the establishment of St. Matthew's parish, Worcester county; in favor of admitting into connection with the diocese of St. Mark's congregation, Washington county; in favor of allowing leave to change the name of Grace church, Ellicott's Mills, to St. Peter's church. The committee also reported adverse to the admission of St. Paul's church, Sharpsburg, Washington Co., and St. Andrew's church, Clearspring, in the same county, on the ground that the requisite notice required by the canon not having been given by said churches. The report was adopted.

The Rev. Mr. McKenney, from the Committee, to whom was referred that part of the Bishop's address relating to the establishment of a Diocesan newspaper, reported that in the opinion of the committee, it was inexpedient at this time to attempt the revival of the Diocesan paper. Adopted.

The Rev. Mr. Nelson moved to take up the resolution which had been referred from the last to the present convention, requesting the Bishop to admit persons to the Holy Order of Deacons under the limitations and restrictions of the 5th canon of the General Convention of 1847.

The resolution having been taken up, a motion was made to refer the whole matter over to the next convention, which motion, after considerable discussion prevailed.

On motion of the Rev. Mr. Leakin, the convention resolved to hold its next session in St. Paul's church, Baltimore.

Dr. Atkinson, from the committee on the state of the Church, reported that so far as they had examined the reports of the clergy, they had found the state of the Church to be prosperous.

On motion of W. P. Malsby, Esq., the thanks of the convention were tendered to the President, the Rev. Dr. Wyatt, for the faithful and impartial manner in which he had discharged the duties appertaining to the office.

Then, after prayer by the president, and the chanting of the Gloria in Excelsis, the convention, on motion of the Hon. Wm. J. Blackstone, adjourned sine die.

KENTUCKY.

ORDINATION AND CONFIRMATION.—On Whit-sunday, the Rt. Rev. the Bishop of the Diocese, at his annual visitation to St. Peter's Church, Paris, admitted to the Priesthood the Rev. H. H. Reid, minister of the same. The sermon was preached by the Bishop. The candidate was presented by the Rev. Mr. Chadbourne, Rector of the Church of the Nativity, Maysville, who with the Rev. Dr. Mitchell of Pennsylvania, and the Rev. Mr. Coe of Western New York, joined in the imposition of hands.

In the afternoon, the Apostolic rite of Confirmation was administered to five persons.

ALABAMA.

ANNUAL CONVENTION.—DEAR MR. EDITOR:—I embrace the first leisure moment I have had since the meeting of our Convention to send you a brief account of it. It met at St. Paul's church, Selma, on the 3d ult., and a more happy or harmonious one it has never been my privilege to attend. The convention sermon was preached by the Rev. Mr. Massey, of Mobile, from the words, "Let a man so account of us, as of the ministers of Christ, and stewards of the mysteries of God." Moreover, it is required in stewards that a man be found faithful." It was a sound, earnest, judicious, practical discourse. Morning service was read by the Rev. Mr. Morrison, of Montgomery. Various changes and modifications in the constitution were recommended by a committee appointed at the previous Convention, and adopted, which will lie over to the next Convention for final action. A new body of canons was also recommended and adopted. The committee on the state of the Church made a report, showing the diocese to be in a highly prosperous condition. The number of baptisms reported was 331,—last year, 139; confirmations, 108,—last year, 33; communicants, added 299,—last year, 69; present number of communicants, 723,—last year, 657. The number of clergy in attendance was 19,—last year 11; lay delegates, 34,—last year, about 25. The great disparity between the reports of the present year and the past is owing partly to the greater length of time elapsing between the Conventions, and to other causes; still after making every allowance, the difference in the rate of increase is very striking. The number of visitors too was quite considerable. Every thing in fact went to show a great increase of interest in the Church, and that it is gaining a hold on the community far beyond what it has heretofore had. This is to be ascribed in a great measure, under God, to the primitive piety, wisdom, and zeal of our most excellent Bishop. The great obstacle in the way of the Church's advancement in the south-west is the idea, so commonly entertained, that it lacks spirituality, that it is cold and lifeless, having the form of godliness but lacking the power. Now wherever he goes the life of Bishop Cobbs is felt to be a practical refutation of this calumny. No one can be with him without being compelled to acknowledge him a fit successor of the holy Apostles. Few persons in any age have ever exemplified so beautifully as he does the wisdom of the serpent and the harmlessness of the dove. The pervading element of his character is love, and it is this which enables him to set forth the plainest truths, and to expose the weakness and falsity of long cherished systems of belief, without arousing those blind and fierce prejudices which so often close up every avenue to the mind. He makes his way to the understanding through the heart. Already has he succeeded in collecting around him, mainly by his personal influence, a band of sound, conservative, true-hearted, self-denying clergy, whose abundant labours will tell on a future generation. At the close of his usual detail of labours he expressed his views concerning some matters relating to the Church, which were listened to with the profoundest interest. It would be doing him great injustice to attempt to give a sketch of his timely and judicious counsel, which will soon appear, not only on the pages of our journal, but also in the form of a pastoral letter, in which he was requested by the Convention to lay it before the diocese. In hearing it one might almost fancy that he was listening to the matured wisdom of Hooker. On Sunday night several persons were confirmed, this making the third confirmation held in the parish in the course of twelve months. Before dismissing the congregation the Bishop made a simple, earnest, affectionate address, which touched the feelings and called forth the sympathies of all present. Few could have left Selma without feeling that it was good to have been there.

Rev. Mr. Mitchell

ORDINATION AND CONFIRMATIONS.—In Montgomery, Ala., on the 30th ult., the Rt. Rev. N. H. Cobbs, D.D., ordained Thomas A. Morris to the order of Deacons, according to the provisions of Canon V., 1847. On the evening of the same day a confirmation was held, when 12 persons came forward to receive this Apostolic rite. On Monday evening 2 more were confirmed, and on Tuesday 2 were confirmed at Mt. Meigs, making 16 confirmed within the limits of the parish. Montgomery is a growing town, containing at present between 4000 and 5000 inhabitants, and has recently become the capital of the state. The Church is at present feeble, but with the advantage of an intelligent and increasing population, it is evidently destined to grow and to exert an important influence.

NEW YORK.

THE CHURCH OF THE MEDIATOR.—The congregation recently formed and worshipping in the Chapel of the New York University, of which the Rev. Francis L. Hawks, D.D., is Rector, held a meeting in that place on the 28th ult., in compliance with the laws in such cases made and provided, when the title of "The Rector, Wardens, and Vestrymen of the Church of the Mediator in the city of New York," was adopted as the corporate name, and the following persons were chosen to serve in their respective offices until Tuesday in Easter week:

Luther C. Carter, and William P. Furniss, Wardens; James G. King, Caleb Swan, George Belden, George B. Rapelye, John W. Smith, Cyrus Chenery, Edmund Hyatt, and Cornelius A. Berrian, Vestrymen, until Tuesday in Easter week.

NEW YORK ECCLESIOLOGICAL SOCIETY.

The Annual Meeting of the Society was held on Wednesday evening, May 23d, in the school-room of St. Paul's Chapel. The President being absent, the chair was taken by the Rev. Dr. McVickar, senior Vice President.

The minutes of the last Quarterly Meeting were read by Mr. S. Cox, Jr., one of the Secretaries, and were approved.

The President's unavoidable absence from town deprived the Society of the pleasure of listening to the Address which he was expected to deliver upon this occasion. It is hoped that the Committee will very soon be able to lay this Address, (together with their Report,) before the members individually.

The Rev. Mr. Preston read a letter from the Rev. Dr. Forbes, President, resigning his office, but expressing his warm and continued interest in the Society, and promising his utmost aid (as a simple member) towards their object, which he hoped would be pursued with uncompromising firmness.

On motion of Mr. R. Ralston Cox, this letter was ordered to be entered at large on the minutes.

The Annual Report of the Committee was read by Mr. S. Cox, Jr., showing that there are now four Rt. Rev. patrons and seventy ordinary members of the Society, and giving a complete history of the proceedings of the Society during the past year.

On motion of the Rev. Dr. Huntington, this able Report was accepted and filed for publication.

The Treasurer, Mr. William A. McVickar, read his report; from which it appears that there is a moderate balance in the hands of the Treasurer. The library of the Society already contains a number of costly and most valuable works. This Report was also accepted and placed on file.

Mr. William A. McVickar then read an original paper written by Mr. Wills, the Society's Architect, who was unexpectedly absent from the city. The subject was "The difference between the Cathedral and the Parish Church," a subject not very generally understood, but which was fully explained by a complete description of the two; and illustrated by a number of fine large plans from the well-stocked portfolio of Mr. Wills. Among our modern builders, he said, there was a great mixing up of the parts which characterized these two distinct classes of Churches. They were originally intended for very different purposes. The Parish Church was meant for the worship of, generally, a rural congregation, with but one or two priests officiating. The Cathedral was meant to accommodate Bishops and all the clergy of a diocese in its spacious choir; and immense congregations of the faithful in its nave and transepts; processions were there witnessed, and gorgeous ceremonies, often the coronation of sovereigns. In elucidating the subject of Cathedrals, Mr. Wills chose that of Lincoln, as on the whole the best; and he gave a beautiful description of it. The approach from the west, with its three spires rising in the form of a pyramid, is unequalled. The Trinity was set forth as the leading idea in all Cathedrals, based on a ground plan, which was always in the form of a cross. The various parts of a Cathedral were then enumerated, with a running commentary, showing their significance, their beauty, their relation to the whole. The Galilee, considered less sacred than any other part of the holy edifice; the Nave, in which the pulpit was always placed before the Reformation, and where the font always stood; the rood-screen with the holy rood, having the Blessed Virgin on one side and St. John on the other; the Transepts, which were used pretty much as parts of the Nave; the Stalls in the Choir, of which there were sixty in Lincoln Cathedral, yet showing in all its magnificence the wonderful carving of the dark ages; the Bishop's throne, with its splendid canopy; opposite to which the modern pulpit is generally placed; all these were rapidly passed under review. Then followed the Sacristy, containing the High Altar, the climax of the whole building, adorned with hangings of varied hues according to the feasts and fasts of the Church; on the south side of it were the Sedilia, generally three in number, graded so that the highest was towards the east; then the Piscina, the Prothesis, the Ambry, and the Easter Sepulchre. All received their due share of notice. There was no Lady Chapel to this Cathedral, for the whole building was dedicated to God in honor of the Blessed Virgin. The Chapels were then described, with all their treasures of monumental and heraldic lore; and a little righteous indignation was vented on the barbarity with which their beauties have been buried deep under reiterated coats of white-wash by the hands of the enlightened moderns. A consideration of the Chapter House, Library, and Cloisters, adjoining the houses of the clergy, concluded the subject of the Cathedral.

The Parish Church consisted of two parts, the Nave and the Chancel, the average length of the Chancel being about one-third of the whole. The ancient Churches almost universally stood east and west. There were no doors at the end, lest any one in entering should turn his back on the Altar. The Parish Church should be simple, substantial and beautiful. The writer then went on to treat of the approach to the Church through Lich-gate and Church-yard; showing the significance and beauty of the spire surmounted by the cross, the buttresses and pinnacles, the numerous and varied windows, the battlements, the font by the door, the uncushioned benches, made for prayer and not for sleep, their simplicity making no difference in the house of God between the rich and the poor; the Roof, spangled with golden stars, and spanned and girded by beams fitly framed together; the legends of Holy Writ inscribed on the walls; the Chancel, more richly adorned than any other part of God's house, and supplied by the Altar window with a glowing flood of light from the east. The ancients never employed any very wide span of roof. If more width was required they added one or two, or even three, aisles. If this were not enough, they had recourse to Transepts. Towers were found in all situations but at the east end. They were most generally at the west, and in some cases were detached from the rest of the building altogether. The most usual place for the porch was on the south side, the second bay from the west end. The Chancel arch was frequently more ancient than the rest of the building, being the sole remnant of the previous edifice. It was crossed by the Rood-screen, separating between Nave and Chancel. The pulpits were often of carved stone, many fine specimens of them being still preserved. The Stalls and Sedilia occupied the same position as in the Cathedral, but the Stalls were of course much fewer in number. No Bishop's chair was ever found in a Parish Church. The Font was always near the west end of the building, and large enough to immerse a child in it. The Norman Fonts were generally circular, often resting on a single shaft surrounded by a cluster of detached pillars. They were afterwards generally made octagonal, and were surmounted by superb carved covers, which sometimes towered up to the ceiling. Pews with doors were purely modern, both in principle and practice; the seats were anciently so placed that the congregation all faced the east; and a central alley was always left leading up to the Altar. This interesting paper terminated rather abruptly, in consequence of the writer's being called suddenly out of town.

On motion of Mr. R. Ralston Cox, the thanks of the Society were returned to Mr. Wills for his interesting paper, and a copy was requested for future use and reference.

On motion of the Rev. Mr. Preston, the resignation of the Rev. Dr. Forbes was accepted.

On motion of the Rev. Mr. Preston, the thanks of the Society were presented to the Rev. Dr. Forbes, for his faithful discharge of the office he had just resigned, together with their sincere regrets at his unyielding determination to withdraw from that responsible position.

The election was then made for members of the Committee, and of Auditors, for the ensuing year; and resulted thus:—

COMMITTEE:—The Rev. Thomas S. Preston, M. A., the Rev. Henry McVickar, M. A., the Rev. Sullivan H. Weston, M. A., Mr. R. Ralston Cox, M. A., Mr. William A. McVickar, B. A., Mr. S. Cox, Jr., B. A.

AUDITORS:—The Rev. J. Huntington, M. D., Mr. John Henry Hopkins, Jr., M. A.

On motion of the Rev. Dr. Huntington, the Society proceeded to the election of a President; and on motion of Mr. R. Ralston Cox, this election was made by ballot. The Rev. Dr. McVickar, (then presiding,) was reported by the tellers to be unanimously elected; whereupon he rose and returned thanks for the honor, which was, to him, wholly unexpected. He adverted to the object of the Society, and to the progress already made by correct principles. Church Architecture was to be made the exponent of a Churchman's faith and feelings, and therefore none but a thorough Churchman could be a good Church Architect. He then enlarged on the prospects of the Society, and upon the prudence which ought to characterize its course, for the sake of the science to which it was devoted. He concluded with a full exposition of his views and feelings in accepting the Presidency just conferred.

The election of a Vice President was laid over to the next Quarterly Meeting.

On motion of the Rev. Mr. Preston, the Society adjourned.—Churchman.

MARYLAND.

On the 5th Sunday after Easter, May 13, an ordination was held by the Right Rev. the Bishop of the Diocese in Trinity Church, Elkton, when Mr. Thomas Applegate, late a minister of the Baptist denomination, was admitted to the order of Deacons. The candidate was presented by Rev. Robert Lloyd Goldsborough, Rector of the church—Rev. Messrs. A. A. Miller, of Baltimore, and R. M. Mitcheson, of Philadelphia, were also present and officiating.—(Communicated.) Id.

Clerical Changes.

The Rev. J. C. Tracey having removed from Mount Savage, and accepted the appointment of Professor of Ancient and Modern History in the College of St. James, Maryland, requests letters and papers to be directed accordingly.

The Spirit must be with us in every step of our progress, to convince us of sin, to work faith in us, to keep us steady in it and make us lively in our obedience. But then he does not deal with us as so many stocks and stones, or by putting an absolute force upon our natures, but gives in his help in the way of our own reason; that is by presenting thoughts to our minds, enforcing them upon us by his secret operation, and so gaining the consent of our wills. And this argument of God's love to us is, in the Spirit's hands, of all others the most powerful to recover our hearts to him, and settle us in the truth of obedience from love.

Rev. THOMAS ADAM.

We make solemn vows, and break them instantly: we cry for pardon, and still renew the sin: we long after the flesh-pots of Egypt, the garlic and the onions; and we so little esteem manna, the food of angels; we so loath the bread of heaven, that any temptation will make us return to our fetters and bondage.—Bp. Jeremy Taylor.

VOICES FROM THE SPIRIT LAND.

There is no speech nor language where their voice is not heard.—Psal. xix. 3.

Voices from the spirit land,
Ever calling "brother come!
Join our sinless, happy band;
That dark earth is not thy home.

"Link'd with us by mystic ties,
Hidden by thy mould of clay—
Open now thy spirit's eyes,
Cast thy prison house away.

"Mortify each earthly lust,
And thus learn 'to daily die;'—
Then, when dust returns to dust,
Thou on angel wings shalt fly."

Voices from the spirit land,
Ever on our pilgrim road,—
"Take the gentle Shepherd's hand,
Take His yoke, His easy load.

"Learn of Him, and thou'lt abide,
Weary soul, in blessed rest;
He thy wand'ring steps shall guide
To the regions of the blest."

Voices from the spirit land,
"Seek not happiness below,—
Build not on the shifting sand,
Where the waves of sorrow flow."

Though the warning few may heed,
Still each zephyr wafts it by;
Angel wings the message speed,
"Seek thy home beyond the sky."

In the forest, in the mart,
Round us wheresoe'er we roam,—
Ever to the earth-bound heart,
Gently whispering "brother come!"

Ev'ry friend that goes before
Doth but swell the choral strain,
Adding yet one anthem more,
Calling us that still remain;

Breaking one more earthly tie,
Weaning us from earthly love,
That our stricken hearts may fly
To a home of peace above.

Nearer than it seemeth now
Is that viewless spirit land;
Close the seal upon our brow
Binds us with that sainted hand.

By that new and mystic birth,
They whose warfare now is done,
And they who struggle still on earth,
In one faith and hope are one.

Pilgrim through this vale of tears,
Grasp thy staff with firmer hand!
Rouse thy faith and calm thy fears,
Journeying to the spirit land!

VISITS TO THE MONASTERIES IN THE LEVANT.*

"Staying by myself," says Mr. Curzon, "in an old country-house belonging to my family, but not often inhabited by them, and having nothing to do in the evening, I looked about for some occupation to amuse the passing hours. In the room where I was sitting, there was a large book-case, full of ancient manuscripts, many of which had been collected by myself in various out-of-the-way places, in different parts of the world. Taking some of these ponderous volumes from their shelves, I turned over their wide vellum leaves, and admired the antiquity of one, and the gold and azure which gleamed upon the pages of another. The sight of these books brought before my mind many scenes and recollections of the countries from which they came, and I said to myself, I know what I will do; I will write down some account of the most curious of these manuscripts, and the places in which they were found, as well as some of the adventures which I encountered in the pursuit of my venerable game."

And great reason, it seems to us, have the public to rejoice at the issue of this resolution. Mr. Curzon is incontestably the pleasantest of bibliographers. Although the topics on which he treats may be "caviare to the vulgar," and in these utilitarian days engage the interest of but comparatively few, we can fearlessly aver that the manner of treatment will ensure the amusement of every class of readers. The style, though perfectly native, has much of the airiness and felicity of Beckford's. The more musty the tomes which the Author disinters from their conventual graves, the more lively seems to grow his narrative. With all his antiquarian enthusiasm, he is never dry or unintelligible, but, on the contrary, contrives, by a perpetual play of gentle humour, to infuse into the most indifferent readers, a growing interest in his favourite topics. As our space, however, is limited, we will waste no time in empty panegyric, but enable the writer of this delightful book to address himself at once to the good taste of our readers.

Mr. Curzon, after a few Egyptian sketches, begins with the Coptic monasteries near the Natron lakes. Monasticism took its rise in Egypt, and the desert of Nitria was the first place to which anchorites retired from the world. Of these, St. Macarius was the great exemplar, and the principal monastery is still called after him. After a journey most amusingly detailed, from the Nile across the desert, Mr. Curzon reached the convent of Baramous, and thence proceeded to that of Souriani, the object of his bibliographical researches. He was shown one or two precious volumes; these served, however, but to excite his curiosity, and stimulate his address and perseverance to further acquisitions.

"The old blind abbot had solemnly declared that there were no other books in the monastery besides those which I had seen; but I had been told, by a French gentleman at Cairo, that there were many ancient manuscripts in the monks' oil cellar; and it was in the pursuit of these and the Coptic dictionary that I had undertaken the journey to the Natron lakes. The abbot positively denied the existence of these books, and we retired from the library to my room with the Coptic manuscripts which they had ceded to me without difficulty, and which, according to the dates contained in them, and from their general appearance, may claim to be considered among the oldest manuscripts in existence; more ancient certainly than many of the Syriac MSS. which I am about to describe. The abbot, his companion, and myself sat down together. I produced a bottle of rosoglio from my stores, to which I knew that all Oriental monks were partial; for though they do not, I believe, drink wine, because an excess in its indulgence is forbidden by scripture, yet ardent spirits not having been invented in those times, there is nothing said about them in the Bible; and at Mount Sinai and all the other spots of sacred pilgrimage the monks comfort themselves with a little glass, or rather a small coffee-cup, of arrack or raw spirits when nothing better of its kind is to be procured. Next to the golden key, which masters so many locks, there is no better opener of the heart than a sufficiency of strong drink,—not too much, but exactly the proper quantity judiciously exhibited (to use a chemical term in the land of Al Cheme, where alchemy and chemistry first had their origin). I have always found it to be invincible; and now we sat sipping our cups of the sweet pink rosoglio and firing little compliments at each other, and talking pleasantly over our bottle till some time passed away, and the face of the blind abbot waxed bland and confiding, and he had that expression on his countenance which men wear when they are pleased with themselves and bear good will towards mankind in general. I had, by the by, a great advantage over the good abbot, as I could see the workings of his features and he could not see mine, or note my eagerness about the oil-cellar, on the subject of which I again gradually entered.—'There is no oil there,' said he. 'I am curious to see the architecture of so ancient a room,' said I; 'for I have heard that yours is a famous oil-cellar.' 'It is a famous cellar,' said the other monk. 'Take another cup of rosoglio,' said I. 'Ah!' replied he, 'I remember the days when it overflowed with oil, and then there were I do not know how many brethren here with us. But now we are few and poor; bad times are come over us: we are not what we used to be.' 'I should like to see it very much,' said I; 'I have heard so much about it even at Cairo. Let us go and see it; and when we come back we will have another bottle; and I will give you a few more which I have brought with me for your private use.'—This last argument prevailed. We returned to the great tower, and ascended the steep flight of steps which led to its door of entrance. We then descended a narrow staircase to the oil-cellar, a handsome vaulted room, where we found a range of immense vases which formerly contained the oil, but which now on being struck returned a mournful, hollow sound. There was nothing else to be seen: there were no books here: but taking the candle from the hands of one of the brethren, (for they had all wandered in after us, having nothing else to do,) I discovered a narrow low door, and, pushing it open, entered into a small closet vaulted with stone, which was filled to the depth of two feet or more with the loose leaves of the Syriac manuscripts which now form one of the chief treasures of the British Museum. Here I remained for some time turning over the leaves and digging into the mass of loose vellum pages; by which exertions I raised such a cloud of fine pungent dust that the monks relieved each other in holding our only candle at the door, while the dust made us sneeze incessantly as we turned over the scattered leaves of vellum. I had extracted four books—the only ones I could find which seemed to be tolerably perfect—when two monks who were struggling in a corner pulled out a great big manuscript of a brown and musty appearance and of a prodigious weight, which was tied together with a cord. 'Here is a box!'—exclaimed the two monks, who were nearly choked with the dust; 'we have found a box, and a heavy one too!' 'A box!' shouted the blind abbot, who was standing in the outer darkness of the oil-cellar. 'A box! where is it? Bring it out; bring out the box! Heaven be praised! We have found a treasure! Lift up the box! Pull out the box! A box! A box! Sandouk! Sandouk!' shouted all the monks in various tones of voice. 'Now then, let us see the box! Bring out the light!' they cried. 'What can there be in it?' and they all came to help, and carried it away up the stairs, the blind abbot following them to the outer door, leaving me to retrace my steps as I could with the volumes which I had dug out of their literary grave."

After a most graphic account of certain Abyssinian monks, "black as crows, and anointed, not with the oil of gladness, but with that of castor," the scene is shifted to the "Convent of the Pulley" as it is called, which we well remember sailing past on a voyage up the Nile, and of the mode of ascent to which Mr. Curzon's is the first description we ever read. He narrates also his adventures at the Coptic convent of Thebes, and the White monastery, interspersing his narrative with a variety of amusing detail, legendary and otherwise. Thence he carries us to Jerusalem, and describes in fearful colours, and we believe for the first time, the terrible catastrophe that took place in the church of the Holy Sepulchre, occasioned by the blasphemous exhibition of the "holy fire." Several hundreds perished, our Author's escape being little short of miraculous. He next visits the convent of Sta. Saba, in the desert of the Jordan, of which he gives, as we can testify, a most veracious and striking sketch. Come we, however, to the most curious part of the book, his journey to the Greek monasteries of Meteora and Mount Athos. From Corfu he crossed over into Albania, and, as the country was disturbed, as a measure of precaution, obtained from the Pasha of Yanina an order upon the chief person at Mezzovo, at the entrance of the wilder parts of the mountains, to procure him an escort. How he fared when he arrived there we leave him to explain:

"As Mahmoud Pasha had supplied me with a firman, and letters to the principal persons at the several towns of my route, I looked out my Mezzovo letter, with the intention of asking for an escort of a few soldiers to accompany me through the passes of Mount Pindus, which were reported to be full of robbers and cattiva gente of every sort and kind, the great extent of the underwood and box trees forming an impenetrable cover for these 'minions of the moon.'

"Most of the population of Mezzovo turned out to see the procession of Milordos Inglesis as it entered the precincts of their ancient city, and defiled into the market place, in the middle of which was a great tree, under whose shade sat and smoked a circle of grave and reverend seignors, the aristocracy of the place; whereupon, holding the pasha's letter in my hand, I cantered up to them. On seeing me advance towards them, a broad shouldered, good-natured looking man, gorgeously dressed in red velvet, embroidered all over with gold, though something tarnished with the rain and weather, arose, and stepped forward to meet me. 'Here is a letter,' said I, 'from his highness Mahmoud Pasha, Vizier of Yanina, to the chief personage of Mezzovo, whoever he may be, for there is no name mentioned; so tell me who is the chief person in this city, where is he to be found, for I desire to speak with him?' 'You want the chief person of Mezzovo?' replied the broad shouldered man; 'well, I think I am the chief person here, am I not?' he asked of the assembled crowd which had gathered together by this time. 'Certainly, malista, oh yes, you are the chief person of Mezzovo undoubtedly,' they all cried out. 'Very well,' said he, 'then give me the letter.' On my giving it to him, he opened it in a very unceremonious manner; and before he had half read it, burst into a fit of laughing. 'What are you laughing at?' said I, 'is not that the vizier's letter?' 'Oh!' said he, 'you want guards, do you, to protect you against the robbers, the klephti?' 'Yes, I do; but I do not see what there is to laugh at in that. I want some men to go with me to Meteora; if you are the captain or commander here, give me an escort, as I wish to be off at once; it is early now, and I can cross the mountains before dark.' After a pause, he said, 'Well, I am the captain; and you shall have men who will protect you wherever you go. You are an Englishman, are you not?' 'Yes,' I said, 'I am.' 'Well, I like the English; and you particularly.' 'Thank you,' said I; and after some conversation, he tore off a slip from the vizier's letter, (a very unceremonious proceeding in Albania) and, writing a few lines on it, he said, 'Now, give this paper to the first soldiers you meet at the foot of Mount Pindus, and all will be right.' He then instructed the muleteer which way to go. I took the note, which was not folded up; but the badly-written Romaic was unintelligible to me, so I put it into my pocket, and away we went, my new friend waving his hand to us as we passed out of the market place; and we were soon trotting along through the open country towards the hills which shoot out from the base of the great chain of Mount Pindus, a mountain famous for having had Mount Ossa put on the top of it by some of the giants when they were fighting against Jupiter. As that respected deity got the better of the giants, I presume he put Ossa back again, for which I felt very much obliged to him, as Pindus seemed quite high enough, and steep enough, without any addition."

STATE OF THE IRISH CLERGY.—A FEW MORE FACTS.

While acknowledging with sincere gratitude the prompt and liberal manner in which our statement in the last number of this Journal has been responded to, we feel it to be due to those who have already contributed towards the relief of our distressed clergy, to place before them some of the additional particulars with which we have been supplied, respecting the management of the fund, and the nature of the distress to whose relief it has been applied.

The sums hitherto contributed have been dispensed under the direction of six persons, who act as trustees to the Fund, and who, while they use every precaution in the investigation of the facts of each case, have also to perform the difficult and delicate task of conveying assistance in such a way as to avoid inflicting a needless wound upon the feelings of those who shrink from disclosing the extremity of their sufferings. It is a remarkable fact that in no single instance has a clergyman been known to apply for relief on his own behalf; his privations, however great, have been invariably concealed, and it is only through the watchfulness of some friend that the truth has been at length discovered, and a communication opened with those who are able to tender assistance. Up to the present time the trustees have had it in their power to relieve the families of sixteen clergymen, of whom fourteen have received pecuniary aid, and all have been supplied with clothing. The Rev. C. Wolsley, Secretary to the Curates' Fund Society, 133, St. Stephen's-green, Dublin, acts as treasurer, and all the original communications connected with the several cases of distress are in his possession. It is scarcely necessary to add that he is not at liberty to disclose the names of any of the parties to whom assistance has been sent.

We shall now subjoin a few extracts from some of the correspondence which has taken place since our last publication. The reader will bear in mind that they are merely selections from a number of similar communications, and that the sufferings described in them prevail to a wide extent.

No. 1. A clergyman (with four children) in whose district the poor-rate amounts to eight shillings and ninepence in the pound, and whose income has not been paid for the last two years, thus replies to a letter, proffering assistance:—

"9th April.—You have our heartfelt thanks for your very kind letter received yesterday evening. I fear few can form an idea of the privations with which it has pleased our Heavenly Father to visit some of the clergy of the west of Ireland; and when I assure you it is with the utmost difficulty I can procure a sufficiency even of the coarsest description of food for the daily supply of this small family, I need hardly say how acceptable would be the boon of a few articles of clothing."

In the next letter, 14th April, he writes:—

"You have, in truth, the grateful thanks and fervent prayers of this poor family, for the truly munificent donation of ten pounds—so unexpected too! May our gracious and Heavenly Father abundantly reward you, and our kind Christian friends, for this acceptable token of their sympathy. Our hearts are too full to say more, than that, I trust, while life lasts, they shall never be forgotten by us at the throne of grace."

No. 2.—"13th April. I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your favour yesterday, and gratefully accept your kind donation of five pounds, which came at a most seasonable time, as it will enable me to put crops in my ground, which would otherwise have remained untilld. I cannot but recognise in it the hand of a bountiful and gracious Lord and Master, who has raised up friends for us in the hour of trial and of need. That I should be amongst the distressed clergy may appear extraordinary; but when it is known that out of an income of not quite £200, above £150 is absorbed in legal taxes and charges, and that I live in a most distressed locality, where there is no person above the rank of a peasant—none, except myself, to do anything for the starving and destitute people around, I trust that that distress will not be attributed to improvidence or extravagance on my part."

The following case is of peculiar importance, as it places in a distinct light what may seem unintelligible to our English reader—viz., the process by which, under the operation of existing laws, church property is at present suffering actual confiscation in many parts of Ireland. Here is a clergyman entitled to an income of £367 per annum, of which forty-one pounds alone are available to his own use:

No. 3.—"April 6. It is indeed a subject of great thankfulness that our good Lord has raised up for the suffering clergy such kind and benevolent friends in our time of need, and I trust it will not only make us grateful, but, also, devote ourselves more entirely to His service than we have ever done before. As regards my own circumstances, in a pecuniary point of view, I have no hesitation in stating, that, for the last six months, the providence of the Almighty alone has, by various little interpositions, kept me from the walls of a jail. The income of my parish is £367; but of that £94 a-year has been assigned by deed, for the liquidation of the charge of £1,000 upon the glebe-house. There is also a rent of £47 charged for the glebe land—a few acres, taken when land was at the highest value, for the purpose of building the house. These sums, with insurance, and other fees, deducted from my income, used, in former years, to leave me still about £200, a sum upon which I could, with economy, support my family in comfort; but the poor's rate last year amounted to £160, which utterly swallowed up all, with the exception of about £41 for the support of my family, consisting of my wife (in very delicate health), myself, and seven children."

We have already observed, that in no instance during this period of trial have any of our clergy been known to seek relief for themselves. It is a deeply touching fact, that in more than one case relief has been actually declined by those whose known privations had elicited the offer of it. One clergyman thus replies to a letter tendering assistance:—

"Whilst I could not for a moment feel justified in availing myself of the proffered boon, I cannot help rejoicing in the kindness and Christian love which prompted it. I venture to forward to you the names of three clergymen in this diocese, who, perhaps, would accept whatever might be at your disposal."

Another, in answer to a similar offer, says:—

"April 2. Thank God, I am not in want of either food or raiment. I have no family but my wife; and it has been always our fixed rule to live within our means. I only received £20 from my parish for the last year and ten months; but I am regularly paid £46 3s. 1d., by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, with a drawback for glebe-loan instalment. Within my stipend I do live, and, with God's blessing, shall live, until it shall please God to right matters on the earth. 'In his hands are the issues of life,'"

The reader cannot fail of being struck by the affecting realisation in the above of the Apostolic precept. A clergyman, with the education and habits of the upper classes, in an age of factitious wants, expresses himself content with "food and raiment," while the perfect sincerity of the sentiment is manifested by his incidentally mentioning that his entire means of support for himself and his wife amounts to about fifty pounds per annum.

Among the mingled feelings awakened in us by the perusal of these simple records of Christian faith and endurance—records which could only be brought under the public eye after removing from them every trace that could lead to the discovery of the writers—one, we confess, is uppermost in our own minds: it is the feeling of joyous hope in the future prospects of a Church which God, while he chastises, is at the same time thus blessing with the unmistakeable evidences of His own Spirit's presence.

In setting God before us, we cannot help keeping our eyes fixed upon his various gifts and numberless bounties: The gift of our lives, and the preservation of them; the sun that shines upon us; the bread we eat; air, earth and seas, all contributing their several shares to our maintenance and support, and ministering to our delight and comfort—these, and many others, are the common, daily benefits of a kind Providence. And if we consider farther how many wonders concur to furnish us with the smallest thing we want, and what an expense of power and wise contrivance there is in supplying us with a morsel of bread, or one drop of water, inasmuch that our thoughts are swallowed up at once in the contemplation, the whole must issue in this conclusion, that He who thus does good, is good; and that such unmerited favours and multiplied blessings can be nothing but the acts and workings of that love which gave us our being, and is continually proving itself to our senses by repeated miracles in the support of them. Well, then, may we be called to set God before us in this respect; to admire, to adore, to praise him; to depend upon him; to sit down contented and easy with our lot; to assure ourselves, at all events, that we are in good hands; that whatever he ordains for us, prosperity or adversity, health or sickness, crosses or the attainment of our wishes, proceeds from the kindest intention, is managed by the most perfect wisdom, and solely the effect of his fatherly care over us, and steady, tender concern for our welfare. Rev. THOMAS ADAM.

Every Christian soul is personally engaged, first to be enlightened, and then to shine; and we must draw our light for ourselves from that same source that furnishes the church with her public light.—Abp. Leighton.

CONVENTION OF NEW JERSEY.

As we were prevented, by other duty, from attending throughout the interesting session of this Convention, we are indebted to the New York Courier and Inquirer, for the following admirable report of the proceedings.

The only omission in this report is the statement of one interesting fact, overlooked in the pressure of other topics.

On the first day of the session, a unanimous resolution was passed that the Senior Presbyter present offer up the thanksgiving for a recovery from sickness, as expressive of the feelings of the Diocese on the restoration of the Bishop. This was immediately done by the Rev. John Croes.—Son of previous Bp of N.J.

We had the pleasure of witnessing the interesting scene of Thursday afternoon, when the Convention of New Jersey nobly asserted the dignity of its ecclesiastical character, and with one heart and one voice declared unshaken confidence in the Bishop, whose zeal and devotion had, under God, secured for it the measure of prosperity now enjoyed. We wish that every member of the Church had been present, especially those who have given a too ready ear to the slanders and calumnies which have come up from the lowest and vilest sources against a Bishop of the Church.

And here let us say an earnest word to the members of the Church of God, in reference to the awful sin of countenancing and supporting these miserable publications which pander to and pamper the worst passions and the most degraded tastes of a corrupt world. As long as these papers find that by such attacks they can make money, our Bishops and Clergy will be the favourite objects of their abuse. Any Christian who gives a six-pence to sustain them, in their work of moral destruction, commits a fearful crime and becomes an accessory in their guilt. Any Christian who admits one of these papers into his family circle invites the plague to desolate his household. Great efforts have been made of late to circulate such papers, especially those which contained anonymous attacks upon the Bishop of New Jersey. A copy was sent to most of the Clergy and Laity previous to Convention. The mover of the resolution against the Bishop confessed that this was the main source of his information.

We wish every member of the Church, every one who regards the high character of the press of this country, had heard Mr. King's noble and eloquent vindication of its dignity. In becoming language, right from the heart, as one long engaged in the press, he repudiated all association with such degrading fellowship. We have heard many speeches in Conventions, but we have never listened to one more powerful and impressive. Its energy was the magna vis veritatis. Its impressiveness was the effect of true feeling appealing to kindred sympathy, heart speaking to heart. Few who heard that speech will ever forget it.

To the subject which it concerns, though one near our heart, one in which the Church is largely concerned, we have been slow to refer. We have trusted in God that the truth would prevail over the outpourings of malice, and that the whisperers and false accusers would at length find that their efforts were vain. It is one of the saddest features in the character of our Christian day that men are so ready to believe evil reports upon the slightest evidence. As Mr. King truly said, "testimony that would not convict a petty thief is enough to condemn a Bishop."

For the present at least, we rest this matter upon THE UNANIMOUS VERDICT OF THE CONVENTION OF NEW JERSEY. Our readers must remember that the Convention which decided this question was assembled in Burlington. It was brought forward on the last day of the Convention, and the members had been distributed throughout the town for two days, and had heard all that was to be said. There was no check put upon the debate, the boldest challenges were given to produce evidence beyond the reports alluded to. The report of the Courier and Inquirer truly describes the impressive moment when the vote was taken. We think it due to Mr. Halstead to say that he disclaimed any unfriendliness to the Bishop in his course. His great design, he said, was to vindicate him from evil reports. His refusing to vote for his own resolutions was a proof of his sincerity, and evidenced the effect of the debate upon his own mind.

Many reports had been circulated in reference to the funds of the Diocese. The Treasurer's Report was not only audited by a committee, but read item by item to the Convention, and general satisfaction expressed in the statement.

We think it also proper here to state that some of those who have been named, as being deeply injured by the Bishop, have come out in the Burlington Gazette and denied the truth of these allegations in very strong language. Those who are inclined to dwell upon the losses of some individuals in Burlington, losses which it is hoped a little time will repair, might perhaps charitably and justly think of the gain which the whole City of Burlington has derived from the noble and prosperous Institutions there founded by the Bishop, without endowments and without help from the Church. In reference to this trying case, most trying to him who has encountered it, in what he has thought the line of duty, "let patience have her perfect work." Though a cloud is now overhanging, though mists and exhalations are rising from the earth, we doubt not that soon the truth and right will shine forth as clear as the noonday sun in a cloudless sky.

Before pronouncing the benediction, the Bishop made a most affecting and impressive address, and the Convention broke up amid the mutual congratulations of its members.

BURLINGTON, Friday morning, June 1.

The Protestant Episcopal Convention of this Diocese closed its stated annual meeting last night. The Convention assembled on Wednesday morning, in St. Mary's Church, Burlington, and after the performance of the usual religious services was organized about one o'clock, the Bishop in the chair.

The first day was occupied in routine business for the most part, and in a long discussion of a rule of order which gave to the presiding officer unlimited authority to decide all points of order. It was proposed to amend this rule by adding the words "subject to appeal from such decision to the Convention." This is an old bone of contention in the Diocese—the Bishop claiming that as he presides ex officio he cannot be limited in his decisions by the Convention, and those who differ with him claiming that the whole Convention is the creation of the Constitution, and that it and all its doings and officers are to be controlled by that Constitution and by the well established usages of deliberative bodies.

The point was resolved, as heretofore, in favor of the Bishop's views, by the failure of the two orders to agree: the Clergy sustained the Bishop; the laity—by a majority larger than heretofore—coincided with the views of those who contended for a right of appeal to the Convention.

The parochial reports were handed in, and the elections of the Standing Committee, of Delegates to the General Convention, and of Trustees to the Theological Seminary, were effected, without any change, it is believed, since last year—before the adjournment in the evening.

On Thursday morning, after prayers, the Bishop read his address—full of interest for all the churchmen of the diocese, and touching with simplicity and earnest feeling upon the severe and all-but fatal illness of the Diocesan since the last meeting.

At the close of the address another ancient point of contention in the Diocese was brought up on the report of a Committee, to which had been referred a proposed canon asserting the right of the Convention to verify the certificates of all its delegates, clerical as well as lay.

In respect of the lay delegates their right is undisputed, but in regard to the clerical members it was insisted on the one side that the list of the Bishop which he is required by the canon to furnish must be received as final—while on the other it is claimed that on objection to the accuracy of the list, an inquiry and decision may and should be made by the Convention. There were two reports, both admitting the abstract right of the Convention to ascertain the validity of every member's claim to a seat—but the one recommended the passing of the proposed canon as declaratory of the law; the other resisted its passage as useless—conferring no authority, if the constitution does confer it, and incapable of conferring authority, if the constitution does not.

The decision of the Convention was with the latter view, and the proposed canon was rejected. It was now half-past 6 o'clock, P. M., when the following resolution was offered by Wm. HALSTEAD, Esq., of Trenton:

Whereas, a Bishop should be blameless, and should have a good report of those that are without, lest he fall into reproach; and, whereas, public rumor as well as newspaper publications have made serious charges against our Bishop, impeaching his moral character, tending to impair his usefulness, and to bring the church of which he is Bishop into disrepute—therefore,

Resolved, That a Committee be appointed, consisting of three clergymen and three laymen, who, or a majority of them, shall make such inquiries as shall satisfy them of the innocence of the accused, or of the sufficiency of ground for presentment and trial; and that they do make report to this Convention at its present session, or at such other time as this Convention shall designate.

Previous to presenting the resolution, Mr. H. said that inasmuch as the proposition he was about to submit, nearly concerned the character of the presiding officer, he desired in courtesy to that distinguished gentleman to give him an opportunity of vacating the Chair by going into Committee of the Whole.

This being quite an unusual course in the Convention, and the Bishop indicating no wish to shrink from any duty as presiding officer, the motion was not pressed, and the resolution was presented.

Mr. HALSTEAD prefaced the resolution with a few remarks in calm and measured language, disclaiming any unkind feeling towards the Bishop, or any purpose other than one of enabling him to place formally and officially before the Diocese such explanation as he might be disposed and able to give of the charges, which in the shape of rumors, newspaper publications, and placards in our chief cities, were calculated so injuriously to affect his reputation.

An earnest debate ensued upon this resolution. It was opposed by Mr. A. GIFFORD, Judge DAYTON OGDEN, CHARLES KING, the Rev. Mr. PHILIPS, and the Rev. Dr. OGILBY, and supported by the mover, Mr. HALSTEAD.

By the two first named gentlemen it was shown that the Convention could not lawfully pass the resolution presented to them—that it was wholly uncanonical and unconstitutional; but those gentlemen, and all the others who spoke in opposition to the resolution, unreservedly declared that to charges specifying with reasonable precision the offences imputed by rumor, or any offence cognizable by the Convention, they would oppose no obstacle; nor to the receiving, referring and investigation of such charges, and that in no other way could the Convention lawfully reach or touch the subject.

Mr. KING spoke with great earnestness against the injustice and enormity of putting any man on his defence—and least of all a man such as Bishop Doane—upon vague rumor, and what was called "newspaper publication." Mr. K. said he felt his own personal character, and the calling to which the best years of his life had been devoted, concerned in rescuing newspapers—such as he understood what a newspaper should be, and what the obligation and duty of the editor of such a paper were—from any fellowship with or responsibility for such paper as that which had circulated the charges referred to in the resolution—a common receptacle for all that is vile, and pandering to the worst vices, passions and prejudices of our nature.

Mr. K. insisted that whereas, upon rumor or newspaper charges, the meanest criminal could not be arraigned, it was intolerable that a man of such eminent services as Bishop Doane, of such untiring devotion to this Church, and to the cause of Education as connected with the Church, of such self-sacrificing labors should be held up as a suspected criminal, though feeling, and admitting that if these or any charges should be made under a responsible name, and not by anonymous slanderers—the basest at once and most cowardly of mankind—there should, and would be no hesitation in raising a committee of investigation. The gentleman who presented the resolutions did not profess to know any thing of the truth of these rumors, or newspaper publications, and in no manner makes himself responsible, and this should, of itself, determine the Convention to reject the resolution.

The meeting of this Convention was no sudden meeting, nor clandestine meeting. It was a stated annual meeting, known of all men who might desire, months in advance; and its place of assembling equally well known to be at this town of Burlington, where the misdeeds which rumor imputed to the Bishop had been perpetrated.

If, then, there was truth in these rumors, how comes it that—after sitting here with open doors, with the eyes of all upon us, with the ears of all open to our discussions—no word of complaint, no charge of any sort had been made in any responsible manner, to this Convention, against the Bishop? The fact that none such had been made must, Mr. K. contended, under the circumstances of the case, be regarded as outweighing entirely, and discrediting, the rumors upon which Mr. H. wished us to proceed.

Mr. K., after reviewing rapidly the career of Bishop Doane in New Jersey, and his eminent success there in building up seminaries of learning and the church, called upon the Convention to stand by him and show by their vote this day that however over-sanguine Bishop Doane may have been in some of his anticipations, however even improvident in expenditures—made not for personal purposes, but for great public ends—nothing had been presented or was known to the Convention which could authorize any withdrawal of confidence or support from him, or impair the trust they had—that with renewed health and God's blessing upon his labors, the Diocese would yet reap in the prosperous and triumphant march of the Church, and the Church schools the most satisfactory reward for their steady and unshaken adherence to their Diocesan.

The Rev. Dr. OGILBY presented with great force his views of the injustice of the proposed proceeding, and finally at about 9 o'clock, the Bishop rose to put the question on the passage of the resolution.

When after a few brief, touching, steadily uttered sentences upon the extraordinary and trying position in which he stood, the Bishop said, "All who are in favor of this resolution will say Aye"—a silence deep as death fell upon the assembly—the beating of each heart was audible—but not a word was spoken. No solitary Aye broke this awful silence! The mover of the resolution himself was voiceless. After a due pause the Bishop again spoke—"All opposed to this resolution will say No." Then went up as if with one breath and from one heart, such a negative as no one could mistake the import of. Its tone, its fervor, its sincerity, were significant even more than its unanimity. The work was done, and after finishing some formal business the Convention adjourned.

CALAMITY AT ST. LOUIS.

In our deep regret for the general loss by which so many homes have been desolated, we must express our individual sorrow for the death of T. B. TARGEE, Esq., who perished in the flames. We only knew this gentleman as a faithful and punctual subscriber, for years, to the Banner, and we must mourn the loss of so good a friend. We argue that a man who is faithful in one duty, is true in all.

MR. P. CONNELLY.

Although we care little about this case, as far as it relates to the individual concerned, yet as it involves most important principles of no little interest at present, we feel bound to give a full report of the matter as it comes to us in the last English papers. This case is now attracting much attention in England.

Mr. C.'s late admirers have greatly changed their opinion of him, and show the amusing difference it makes in a man's essential qualities, according as his face or his back is turned towards Rome. Looking that way he is wise, virtuous, learned, &c., but when his weary gaze is turned again to look upon his abandoned privileges, he becomes at once foolish, vicious, ignorant, or perhaps, insane!

"The Tablet," the organ of Rome in England, informs us that Mr. Connelly was disappointed in not obtaining "a Cardinal's hat," and so he left Rome in disgust. But we are little interested in the motives which have impelled the late actions of one who has been so strangely moved in times past. One who has deliberately broken his ordination and marriage vows, is not much to be regarded. ✱

But this case brings up grave questions of principle, deeply affecting high and holy interests. Our blessed Saviour declares that but one cause can justify a divorce of man and wife. And what is the vow of celibacy, under which Mr. Connelly entered the priesthood of Rome, but a divorce in fact? It is a positive and express renunciation of the vow given in marriage, the promise made before God and man that death alone should separate the parties. What should be thought then of the Church which welcomes into her priesthood a man who has broken this vow? What shall be thought of the Bishop, who not only encourages such an impiety, but actually gives to it his sanction and in opposition to the great Head of the Church, separates "those whom God hath joined together?" On this point "the English Churchman" has the following admirable remarks:

"We are no lawyers, and are therefore unable to say what technicalities may prevent Mr. Connelly from attaining his wishes; but we are plain matter-of-fact Christians, and without entering into the subtleties of the Law Courts, we will simply state the facts as we believe they stand recorded on high, and draw our conclusions accordingly.

We know not in what year Mr. and Mrs. Connelly became man and wife, but we may presume it was sometime between 1825 and 1830. Whenever it took place, Mr. Connelly was asked in the most solemn manner,—

Wilt thou have this Woman to thy wedded wife, to live together after God's ordinance in the holy estate of Matrimony? Wilt thou love her, comfort her, honour, and keep her in sickness and in health; and forsaking all other, keep thee only unto her, so long as ye both shall live?

To which he replied, "I will." And immediately after, Mrs. Connelly was asked,—

Wilt thou have this Man to thy wedded husband, to live together after God's ordinance in the holy estate of Matrimony? Wilt thou obey him, and serve him, love, honour, and keep him in sickness and in health; and forsaking all other, keep thee only unto him, so long as ye both shall live?

To which she also replied, "I will." And then (as if the Church at that solemn moment placed all casualties prominently before the eyes of the bride and bridegroom) he must have given her his troth, saying,—

I, M. take thee N. to my wedded wife, to have and to hold from this day forward, for better for worse, for richer for poorer, in sickness and in health, to love and to cherish, till death us do part, according to God's holy ordinance; and thereto I plight thee my troth.

In the self-same words, with the addition of the word, "obey," she also pledged herself to be his wedded wife "till death us do part." Now we wish to know how any vow taken after this can nullify it. We shall be told, perhaps, that the Pope, as God's representative on earth, can loose as well as bind; and that, therefore, Mr. and Mrs. Connelly after their separation were no longer man and wife. But, as we very often hear of the superior purity of the Romish Church to our own, it will be well to enquire whether the Pope has virtually any power to act contrary to God's commandments. We know but one cause, which our blessed Saviour affirmed to be a sufficient reason for a man to put away his wife. And we know also that when He had cured the man who was possessed of the Legion of Devils, and the latter prayed Him that he might be with Him, our blessed Lord suffered him not, but said, "Go home to thy friends, and tell them how great things the Lord hath done for thee, and hath had compassion on thee."—(St. Mark v. 19.) That such an answer to Mr. Connelly's application for a separation from his wife should have been given by Pope Gregory XVI., in imitation of his blessed Master, who can doubt? If the vow of Matrimony is not secure from the Pope's interference, what oath may not be broken with his permission? What would become of our oaths of allegiance to our Sovereign, of our treaties and promises, if the Pope can nullify all? Who will trust to vows, if it be only the last-made vow that is binding? What an enthralling power that is, by which Rome holds her votaries! by which she fetters them with links of iron! How has she led one to remain within her bonds, who has feelingly and powerfully portrayed the disappointment which awaits those who exchange the mild sway of the English Church for the bondage of Rome!

As many of our readers are interested in this case, we add from the Guardian, the report of the proceedings before the Ecclesiastical Court.

CONNOLLY v. CONNELLY—SUIT FOR CONJUGAL RIGHTS.

"This was a suit promoted by Mr. Pearce Connolly against his wife, Mrs. Cornelia Augusta Connolly, for restitution of conjugal rights. The parties are both American subjects, and were married according to the rites of the American Protestant Church at Philadelphia on the 1st of December, 1831. The issue of that marriage was five children, three of whom are now living. Mr. Connolly, at the time of his marriage, was a minister of the Protestant Church, but in 1835 Mr. and Mrs. Connolly renounced the Protestant faith and embraced that of Rome, and then took the usual vow, each agreeing for the future to abide by the law of the Romish Church, and to live a life of celibacy. They agreed to a formal separation, and the wife, after taking a vow of chastity, went into a convent at Rome, while her husband became a minister of the Romish Church. In May, 1836, Mr. Connolly came to England, when he was appointed private chaplain to the Earl of Shrewsbury. Mrs. Connolly arrived in England in the previous year, and formed a religious community, of which she was made superior, at Derby, which community afterwards removed to Hastings. On the 25th of January, 1849, Mr. Connolly called at the convent for the purpose of seeing his wife, but she declined to receive him, at which he expressed himself much hurt, and wrote a letter to Dr. Aspert, expressing those feelings, and referring to Mrs. Connolly as his reverend mother. In 1848 he came to this court to ask it to grant him restitution of conjugal rights by compelling his wife's return to cohabitation after a separation of fifteen years by mutual consent. Mr. Connolly, it was suggested in argument, had again professed the Protestant faith.

Dr. Bayford appeared for Mr. Connolly. He would admit this to be a case of a very unusual character as regarded the matters contained in it. It had been laid down by Sir John Nicholl, in the case of Barley v. Barley, that a wife could not separate herself from her husband but upon two grounds, cruelty or adultery. In this case the only ground pleaded for a separation was, that a vow of chastity had been taken by the wife, with the consent of her husband, on their renouncing the faith of the Church of England and embracing that of the Church of Rome. The learned advocate contended that this court could not take cognizance of foreign laws. After taking these vows, the parties cohabited together only in board—according to their mutual agreement, it was true. Fourteen years of time had since elapsed, before the husband desired her to return to cohabitation, which she had refused to do; her husband, in consequence, now came before this Court to compel her. There were three grounds raised in this statement, which were important for consideration. The first was, the orders taken by Mr. Connolly; the second, the vows and position taken by his wife as a superior of a religious house in England; and the third, their private vow and consent to live a life of celibacy. With regard to vows of chastity, Bingham mentioned, in his history, that a law passed in 1692, whereby parties who were of the Church of Rome, and had lived separate, might return to cohabitation.

The Court observed that it had no evidence before it of the law on this question.

Dr. Bayford wished to show how the English law had dealt with the matter. He referred to the 2d and 3d of Edward VI. c. 21, which was the first act passed in reference to these matters; these repealed the act of the 32d of Henry VIII. He would also refer to the 5th and 6th of Edward VI., c. 12, and the 1st of James I. c. 25.

The Court wished for proof that these marriages were legal in England; if it were proved they were not, then the allegations would not be admitted.

Dr. Bayford said that as the parties had lived in this country two years and four months, he did not think it could refer to the rules of foreign countries in reference to the law of our Church, which admitted of their right to live together. It was the law of this court that no private arrangement for a separation between man and wife was binding. The learned advocate submitted that all the Court could do would be to put the parties under the same roof, and leave them to live together as they thought fit.

Dr. R. Phillimore appeared on the same side, and submitted that the very gravest questions of law and policy might arise from the admission of this allegation. He (Dr. Phillimore) objected to the whole of the allegation, on the ground that it contained in substance two pleas, which were set up in bar. One was, that the husband was a Roman Catholic priest, and another, that the wife had taken vows of chastity. The learned advocate would not trouble the court upon the subject of its jurisdiction in this case, for Lord Stowell had laid it down that the Court might examine into cases of marriage contracted in foreign countries, and both the English and American law agreed that, in cases affecting the marriage contract, the question was to be decided by the Court in which the remedy was sought. The allegation pleaded a sort of sentence of separation, but that was not the kind of sentence which could be taken notice of by the Court; but even assuming that this was admissible, it would not be any bar to a suit for restitution of conjugal rights, as the law would only compel cohabitation under the same roof, and the parties had done so already since the date of the agreement for separation. It was in evidence that this gentleman was an ordained minister of the American Church according to the rites of the Church of England. The American Episcopalian Protestant Church was founded upon the same principles as our own Church. If that were so, it did not appear that this gentleman had ever received liberty to leave the Church, and he (Dr. Phillimore) therefore submitted that Mr. Connolly's proceeding into the Romish Church was an act of illegality. They had seen, in the case of Mr. Shore, that gentlemen could not leave the Church and act as they pleased. Supposing Mr. Connolly chose to return to his original faith, the learned advocate contended there was no Court which would prevent his compelling his wife to return to cohabitation. He would abstain from troubling the Court at further length at present; but he (Dr. Phillimore) submitted that the whole of this allegation was inadmissible, both from precedent and principle.

Dr. Addams appeared on behalf of Mrs. Connolly, and contended for the admission of the allegation. These parties were American subjects; they were married in America; they came to this country, as it were, merely as birds of passage; and therefore, the Court might decline to entertain the suit altogether. This gentleman being in England, thought proper to sue his wife for restitution of conjugal rights. A libel had been given in which proved the marriage in the United States, that they were married according to the forms of the Church of England, and that Mr. Connolly was at such a time a minister of that Church; also, that the parties cohabited till 1835, and that in 1836 they came over to this country, and both had resided here ever since; but it went on to state, that the said wife, not having the fear of God before her eyes, and being unmindful of her conjugal vow, without any unlawful reason, had removed herself from the bed and board of her lawful husband, and had refused, and still did refuse, to return to him. It seemed to him (Dr. Addams), in this state of things, the Court might follow the example of Courts on the continent, and say the parties ought to go to their own country and settle the matter in their own way. He was prepared to say that, so far from it being necessary to go into strong matters of law, it was a matter of discretion altogether. The Court, he (Dr. Addams) contended, had the power to refuse to grant Mr. Connolly the relief which he sought, if the wife came and showed he had misconducted himself. However, his (Dr. Addams) party was not coming into that Court to make a complaint against Mr. Connolly, but to protest against being made to return to him. The acts of these parties were not hasty proceeding, but deliberate and solemn acts. The learned advocate then went through the facts of the case, and contended that Mrs. Connolly had bound herself under a very solemn obligation, through the instrumentality of her husband, and it would be perfectly frightful if the Court were to allow the suit to proceed and compel the wife to return to her husband. He submitted that the allegation furnished a complete answer to a suit for restitution of conjugal rights, and proved that Mr. Connolly was a person in whose favour the Court would not allow the suit to proceed. What would be the effect of a sentence? That this reverend mother would be taken from her convent and submitted to the contamination, for such she would deem it, of living with this person.

"Dr. Robertson, on the same side, submitted there had been a foreign sentence of divorce pronounced.

"The Court observed that proof of such a sentence might go to the whole root of the case.

"Dr. Robertson contended it would be at variance with all principles of law to interfere with a decree pronounced by a foreign court.

"The Court would not make one single observation as to what would be the result of this case, but would confine itself at present to the question of form. It must be admitted on all hands that this was a new case. The question was, whether some of the facts here pleaded were so pleaded as to entitle them to admission? It was pleaded that these parties were married according to the forms of the Church of England in America. Now, was that the Church of England? The Court did not exactly understand the meaning of the words, 'according to the rites and services of the Church of England in America.' Was there a separate establishment of the Church of England in America? The article upon this point required to be reformed. The sentence of separation which it was pleaded had been pronounced by the Cardinal Vicar-General and Judge Advocate of Rome had not been fully set forth. What was stated in that sentence? That sentence might go to the very root of the case; but, until the Court saw what it was, it would be impossible to say the effect which it would have upon the suit. The Court was clearly of opinion that it must have more pleaded in respect to this sentence than appeared in the articles, for the purpose of knowing whether a sentence had been pronounced by a competent tribunal. It was pleaded that a petition had been presented to Pope Gregory XVI., but that petition was not set forth. It would be impossible to admit the article referring to that petition in its present form. No copy had been produced to the Court of the vow of perpetual chastity which it was pleaded Mrs. Connolly took, and which was said to have been testified by the subscription of her husband. A copy of the protest Mr. Connolly had made against his wife's taking the vows which he subsequently retracted ought also to be before the Court. It must have these documents much more fully set forth than they appeared on the face of the present allegation. The Court wished to reserve to the advocates on both sides an opportunity of entering fully into the arguments which might arise on the pleas, and, therefore, while it directed these articles to be reformed, it would repeat that the Court would not make one single observation as to the possible result of the cause."

In addition to the above, we have no Ecclesiastical news from England of general interest. The following is a brief summary of the condition of things in Europe.

The French army has not yet been able to enter Rome. The Neapolitan army, of 10,000 men, headed by the King of Naples in person, is at Velletri, on its march to Rome. An Austrian army, of 10,000, has entered Tuscany, and is marching on Leghorn. Under these circumstances, it is supposed that the Roman Triumvirs will make terms with the French, rather than submit to the Austrians and Neapolitans. Time will show the result of these strange movements. The French, at present, certainly seem to have placed themselves in a false position.—A further complication has arisen from the seizure of Terracina by the Spaniards. The Pope may well say "Save me from my friends!"

The Austrians and Sardinians have not yet come to terms, but it is expected that they will soon do so. The Austrians have ceased to bombard Venice. Some arrangements are said to be in contemplation.

The Danes have been defeated by the Germans, who are besieging Frederica. But there are rumors of a settlement. Dresden surrendered on the 9th ult.; but all the Rhenish Provinces are in a very disturbed state. There has been a (false) report that the King of Hanover has fled to England.—In fact, the whole of Germany is in a flame, and the people are mad after German Unity. We think it is to be regretted that the King of Prussia did not put himself at the head of the movement, and endeavor to direct it into a safe channel. As it is, the excitement partakes entirely of a Republican character.

The Hungarians are again victorious at Altenburg and Oedenburg; and there is nothing now to prevent their march to Vienna. The Emperor has arrived in that city, and has placed himself at the head of his army. As the Hungarians have revoked the decree deposing the House of Hapsburg, and the march of the Russians has been stopped, it is hoped that some arrangement may yet be possible. The Hungarians will, without doubt, insist upon retaining their ancient constitution.

General Grabbe has been unsuccessful at Constantinople. The Turks will enter into no separate Treaty with the Russians, and demand their instant departure from the Principalities.

MY DEAR SIR:

I see in one of the daily papers a notice of the departure of the Rev. P. Connelly from the communion of the Roman Church. When Mr. Connelly left the ministry of the Episcopal Church, the Romish papers described him as one of the ablest divines of the American Episcopal Church. Having for many years diligently studied the learned writers of the Papal communion, and having been admitted as a priest in that body, after years of probation, it is to be presumed that his former ability has been increased, and if the decision of his as yet unripe judgment was counted formidable when arrayed against the Episcopal Church of America, his more matured decision must be reckoned still more serious, when given against a communion in which he has shown himself an active and zealous friend, and for which he has made the greatest sacrifice a man can well be called upon to offer. We knew Mr. Connelly well, and though we did not agree in that estimate of his standing formed by his Romish friends, we were impressed with a deep conviction of his entire integrity and honesty of character. We had frequent opportunities of conversing with him in Rome, after his change of faith—we discussed some points of theology with him walking under the glorious dome of St. Peter's, and ever felt that we were holding converse with an honest and true heart, a generous and earnest spirit. His reason for abandoning his connection with the Church of Rome will be looked for with great interest. We think we could anticipate them. We think we could write beforehand a narrative of his first full confidence and lively satisfaction in his new creed—of his fearful but willing sacrifice for its sake—of his rising doubts—of his sad discoveries—of his final convictions that he had left the fountain of living waters to sit down beside empty wells and broken cisterns, which men had sculptured with abundant ornament, but had broken in the vain attempt to beautify. We will not, however, undertake this work, but wait in hope of hearing from himself the history of his delusion and his deliverance.

THE TRUE CATHOLIC UPON ROMANIZING.

We are sure our Readers will peruse with satisfaction the following calm and admirable Review of this subject by one of the ablest Laymen in our Church, the Editor of "The True Catholic."

It seems incumbent on us to take some notice in this place of the extraordinary controversy which has been raised about Romanizing in the General Theological Seminary. It was begun by "The Calendar," a weekly Church paper, published at Hartford in Connecticut, and hitherto distinguished, as well by the calmness and quietness of its course, as by the soundness of its Church principles, and the ability displayed in its conduct. The responsible editor being absent from home, the charge of the paper was committed to a young parochial minister, who astonished the Church by an editorial, bursting from the ordinarily tranquil "Calendar," like thunder from a clear sky, which was universally understood to charge the students of the General Theological Seminary with Romanizing. The acting editor of "The Calendar," has since intimated that he has been misunderstood, and only intended to attack what he calls a "Romanizing clique," in New York; but he also takes the somewhat inconsistent ground, that the matriculation addresses of Professors Ogilby and Haight are evidence of Romanizing propensities among the students, and he does not, so far as we are informed, distinctly retract the charge, which friend and foe of the Seminary alike understood him to make. We are free to say that we do not understand how friend, or foe, or neutral, could have understood any thing else.

The article, it is true, begins by speaking of a Romanizing clique in New York, and undertakes to define what it means by Romanizing in such a way as to give the greatest possible weight to the accusation, by removing from the minds of the readers all suspicion of the unsoundness of the writer.*

Having thus rendered his charge important, by making it somewhat definite, and by showing his willingness to except those Anglican worthies who have been so often and so unjustly charged with Romanizing, because they accepted the Prayer Book in its true meaning, and were actuated by a love of its spirit; he goes on to produce it in the following words: "This is what we now feel our duty to point out, as infecting the neighborhood of our Theological Seminary, and rendering the labors of its able professors almost ineffectual, by the ensnaring influence which it exerts through young men, upon young men engaged in the study of divinity."

Now, whether there is or is not such a clique in the city of New York, as is here described, we have no means of knowing; but we do know, that if it exists, it must be composed of individuals, who are amenable to some ecclesiastical authority, and who manifest their principles, according to "The Calendar," by overt acts susceptible of proof. If the gentleman who has made the charges is in possession of proof of the facts he has alleged, it is his duty to lay them before the proper authorities, who can, and will, deal with individuals as such, and will give them the advantage of a trial, according to the wise provisions of the canons, and the principles of jurisprudence. This would put a stop to the course of these Romanizers within this Church, as a similar course, in Mr. Oakley's case, did in England. The Church would know precisely who were accused, and what each individual was accused of, and each case would be fairly investigated upon all the evidence which could be brought forward on both sides. As it is, the editor of a newspaper hears one side, and draws his own conclusions, decides, that is, as a judge, upon an ex-parte statement. It seems to us, that the least that this gentleman can do, is to publish his proofs, that the Church at large, and not himself, may judge of them. The objection to this, we suppose, is, that it would bring him, and his informers, into collision with individual character, and individual rights. But surely men can have no right to deal with individual character, without assuming that responsibility. As it is, no one knows who it is that has been convicted, before the acting editor of the Calendar, of Romanizing, and therefore every one suspects every man whose views are a shade more "High-Church" than his own. But with the clique we have properly nothing to do, our business is with the Seminary. The affairs of which are a part of the Church affairs, whose history we have undertaken to give.

But before doing so, we hope we may be excused for a remark or two on another subject connected with this matter. The remarks of "The Calendar" on the clique have brought out a young presbyter of the city of New York, in two letters, the most obvious interpretation of which would lead men to believe that he was really a Romanizer. The editor of "The Churchman" assures his readers, on the authority of Mr. Howland himself, that he does not hold the doctrines which his letters seem to maintain, and we have great pleasure in accepting and recording the disclaimer. But there is one position, most distinctly taken, and which does not appear to us to be included in the disclaimer, and that is, that the American clergy are not bound by the articles; of this we cannot avoid expressing our disapprobation. A distinction is taken between the doctrines of the Church, and her opinions, which seems to us entirely unwarranted. There is no opposition between the two ideas, opinion is one thing, one species, in scholastic language, faith is another, doctrine the genus which includes them both. The doctrines of the Church are those things which she teaches, her opinions are those things which she believes, the faith includes those of her doctrines, the belief of which she requires as the conditions of Communion. A priest at his ordination, vows that he will give faithful diligence always so to minister the doctrine and Sacraments, and the discipline of Christ, as the Lord hath commanded, and as this Church hath received the same. It seems to us impossible to doubt that this promise binds the priest in some degree, and that no small one, to the judgment of the Church in the matter of doctrine, and if the articles do not convey the doctrines of the Church, for what purpose were they set forth. They are not worship, they are not discipline, in any sense distinct from doctrine, what are they then, unless they are doctrine? We are told opinions; but has the Church, whose office it is to teach, any opinions which she does not desire to have taught, and what is doctrine but teaching?

With respect to the Seminary, we are glad to find that the charge against the students must be considered, not merely as not proved, but as disproved. The semi-withdrawal of the charge, by the acting editor of the Calendar, certainly shews something like the absence of evidence. His appeal, inconsistent as it is with the notion of his having made no charge against the students, to the matriculation addresses of Professors Ogilby and Haight, establishes the total absence of proof, for there is nothing in those addresses from which any such inference can be fairly drawn. But the case does not stop here. Professor Ogilby, himself, in a letter to Dr. Meade, published in the Churchman of May 5th, says, "I cheerfully answer the question, which you propose, in reference to the statement quoted from the 'Calendar,' viz., 'whether you know or believe that such a state of things exists in the Seminary, as would warrant the assertion to which I have directed your attention,' to this question I feel bound to answer emphatically, No. What influences may be attempting to operate upon the students, I either know not at all, or very little regard, because I do thoroughly believe that at no time since I have known the Seminary, have the students been so docile and dutiful as they are at present; and consequently that the labors of the Professors have at no time been less 'ineffectual' than they are at present."

But the strongest remains behind. Near forty of the students joined in a respectful address to the Bishop of Connecticut, the Bishop in whose diocese, and with whose countenance, "The Calendar" is published, making it their "earnest request that it may please you to institute a legal visitation of the Seminary, to the end that if there be traitors amongst us, or holders of unsound doctrine, the discipline of the Church may be visited upon the guilty, the reputation of the innocent may be protected, and the high claims of the Seminary to the confidence of the Church may be maintained." The Bishop of Connecticut wrote an answer to this appeal, from which it appears that he has seen the proofs upon which the acting editor of the Calendar relies, and while he considers them "amply sufficient to maintain his allegation," he yet "sees no reason to doubt the general soundness of the institution." This seems to our minds conclusive.

To the above we must add an extract or two from an editorial in the last "Gospel Messenger." This article, written in a calm and moderate tone, perhaps too moderate on the side of justice, takes the same ground we have assumed all along. It first implies that the Calendar has not made out its case. On the supposition that the anonymous accusers have proofs against the equally anonymous accused, the following sensible query is put:—

But we ask, why not bring the offenders to trial? Possibly we are in error, but we should think it the duty of those who have in their possession proofs of these facts, to take measures to bring the guilty before the ecclesiastical authorities. This would be the shortest and certainly the most satisfactory way to dispose of this painful subject. It would save much of that bitterness of feeling which we fear is beginning to exist among those who are brethren, and who, on all points where the welfare of the Church is concerned, ought to be harmonious.

It is asserted that there exists in the Church a Religious Order—the members of which have taken vows upon themselves. The proofs of this fact have not yet been made public. What kind of an order this is—whether it interferes with the canonical relations of its members or not—whether it is simply a brotherhood, established for some good purpose, or an institution which may be a source of danger to the Church, does not yet appear.

The article concludes with the following just remarks.

Without doubt the enemies of the Church will have much to say on this subject. It will be brought forward as an argument that the Church is in danger from Romanizers. Whereas an opposite conclusion should be drawn.—When evidences of Romanizing appear, the alarm is sounded, the Church is aroused, and by whom? Why not by those who through fear of Rome are ever wandering near the borders of Geneva, but by men who have been ranked among "Tractarians" and "Puseyites," who have ever been suspected of those very tendencies which they now seek to expose. And if it be said that these gentlemen have been censured by the Church papers, we reply that whatever censure they may have received, there has been but one opinion with regard to the charges made, viz: that if they can be sustained, church discipline should be exercised. From every quarter proofs have been demanded—no sympathy with the advocates of error has been expressed. The accusers have been censured, because instead of presenting the suspected for trial, they have only alarmed the public.

Churchmen may rest assured, that though there may occasionally be found those who are fascinated with Romanism, as well as those who decline to an opposite direction,—"Newmans," as well as "Noels,"—yet the clergy as a body, will be found faithful to their trust:—and it will be seen that none are more zealous against the errors of Romanism, than they who have been zealous in guarding their flocks against the errors of dissent,—that they will be most watchful against either extreme, who hold and teach that the Church is not a humanly devised society, but a divine institution, and as such claiming the love and the obedience of all whose earnest desire it is faithfully to do the will of our Heavenly Father.

We have only room this week to give the following notice, without any remark.

BISHOP WHITE PRAYER BOOK SOCIETY

At a meeting of the Board of Managers of the Bishop White Prayer Book Society on Monday evening, the following resolution was adopted.

Resolved.—"That the thanks of this Board, in behalf of the Society which it represents, be presented to the Rev. W. B. Stephens D. D., for the instructive and excellent discourse delivered by him at its Anniversary Meeting on Whitsun-Monday evening, and that he be respectfully requested to furnish a copy for publication."

The Board also appointed a committee consisting of the Bishop and other members to endeavour to obtain funds to carry out the resolution to appropriate one thousand copies of the Prayer Book to each Bishop in the United States for gratuitous distribution in his Diocese.

The committee was directed to prepare a suitable circular stating the object of the Board and soliciting contributions in aid of it; and to have printed for distribution, three thousand copies of the sermon of the Rev. Dr. Stephens, together with the annual report, and the circular.

A resolution was adopted requesting all persons who desire to contribute, to transmit the amount, with as little delay as possible to the Treasurer, Wm. Musgrave, Esq. No 129 Market St.

The Rev. G. Unionius has resigned the Rectorship of Christ Church, Manitowoc, Wisc., and taken charge of St. Ansgarius' Church, Chicago, Ill.

QUESTIONS ON THE BOOK OF GENESIS. Part I. Chapters 1-12. New York: GENERAL PROT. EPISCOPAL SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION.

The utility of Questions like these upon the Books of Scripture, as guides to Teachers, cannot be doubted. The Questions on the New Testament, put forth by the Episcopal Sunday School Union, have been widely used, and received with general favor. The present work is of the same character. It is prepared by a Presbyter of New York, eminently qualified for the undertaking. The questions are of such a character as to explain and enforce the right meaning of Holy Scripture, and in harmony with the teachings of the Church. We heartily commend it for the use of Bible Classes and Sunday Schools. The plan may be more clearly understood by the following preparatory note:—

*We omit the quotation, as our readers have seen enough of it.—Editor of Banner.

In preparing the following Questions and Notes, it has been the design of the author to explain and illustrate the Sacred Text so that it may be easily understood; and to develop the doctrines and precepts set forth therein, in accordance with other parts of the Holy Volume, and the teachings of the Church in her Offices, Catechism, Liturgy, and Articles. Hence constant reference has been made to the parallel passages of Scripture, and to such as bear upon the various subjects; and also to the formularies of the Church.

The Questions for which answers and references are not given, can be answered from the text; or are of such a character as at once to suggest the answer to a Christian of ordinary intelligence.

The Notes are designed primarily for the Teacher. It is expected that he will make himself familiar with the explanations which are given therein, and communicate the same orally to his scholars. It is also important that the Teacher carefully look out and study the several passages referred to, both in Holy Scripture and in the Book of Common Prayer.

This Part contains twenty-two Lessons, and will suffice for six months' instruction in a Sunday School or weekly Catechetical Class, allowing an occasional day for review.

May God grant His blessing to this effort to extend the knowledge of His truth, for His Son's sake!

THE COUNTRIES OF EUROPE DESCRIBED. With Anecdotes and numerous Illustrations.—By the Author of "The Peep of Day," &c. &c. Philadelphia, Geo. S. Appleton, 164, Chestnut street; New York, D. Appleton & Co. 200 Broadway. 1849.

This is not only one of the most beautiful, but also one of the most interesting and instructive books lately published for the use of children. "The Peep of Day," by the same author, so well known, and which, with such simplicity and beauty, teaches scriptural lessons, must give a favorable name to this work. Each country is illustrated with suitable engravings, and the descriptions are exactly suited to the understanding of children. The motto of the book is this, "The world which God made ought to be governed by the book which He wrote." In conformity with this, the author has endeavored constantly to instil religious knowledge. Of such a character, too, are the stories and anecdotes connected with the descriptions of each country. We are sure this book will have a wide circulation, and what is better, we are certain it deserves this.

We hope our readers will not think that we are donning "the motley," bestowed by our friend of the Calendar, in noticing a little work for our little friends, by the same publishers. It is called "MOTHER GOOSE IN HIEROGLYPHICS." Oh, what an age of improvement, we live in—how wise we grow! Time was when simple Mother Goose, dear Parent of our childish imaginations, was thought profound enough for the nursery student. Time was, not long ago, when "hieroglyphics," were left for venerable Champoleons. Now, babies must have, as toys, these puzzles of former sages! No matter, whether she comes in hieroglyphics or spectacles, she is still the same dear old "Mother Goose." And we care not to express our scorn for the man, woman or child, who refuses to do her reverence.

Dr. DUCHECHET LINES

Sent to a clergyman of this city by a parishioner who had complained to him that his sermons were too long.

Doctor, you say I'm in the wrong,
To think your sermons sometimes long;
But I will show, if you think fit,
How "brevity's the soul of wit."
Suppose that, for example's sake,
A parson's character I take,
And strive concisely to express
What qualities he should possess;
A heart of nature's noblest fashion,
Framed to receive each generous passion,
Open as day to every view,
Frank, manly, tender, kind, and true;
Learning without a touch of pride,
Genius with judgment for its guide;
Add action, voice, and eloquence,
To please each eye, and charm each sense:
Some faults too—but we must forgive him,
For he's the Rector of St. Stephen's
Not contumelious to the poor,
Nor cringing at the rich man's door;
Ready on sorrow to attend,
In joyous hours a cheerful friend;
Bold to maintain his Master's cause
When infidels attack His laws,
Yet leading with a gentle sway
Repentant sinners in His way.
Then, since in these short lines you find
Your character so well defined,
You must at last, dear friend, admit
That "brevity's the soul of wit."

TO PRAYER, SAD SOUL.

BY CHROMIA.

To prayer, sad soul!—Though by the world caressed.
Its empty smiles can soothe no heart oppressed;
Its kiss is Judas-like, its words are vain,
And from its wiles, thou canst not peace obtain.
Go ask the love of Christ, the conqueror King!
To thee, poor child of care, He'll comfort bring;
Beside reviving streams He'll lead thy way,
And Heavenly manna grant thee, day by day.

To prayer, sad soul! Nor trust to worldly friends,
When 'neath distressing fears thy spirit bends,
In sorrow's hour their aid is all in vain,
For hearts in gladness joined, in woe are twain.
But thanks to God, there is a friend, whose love,
Alike in joy, or grief, will steadfast prove;
And lo, He died, and bore the cross's shame,
To cleanse thy guilt,—blest Jesus, is his name.

To prayer, sad soul! When compassed by the snare
The tempter wily spreads—take heed—beware
His toils!—Though pleasant be the sunny way
He leads, 'tis lighted by a fickle ray
That guides the traveller to the gulf of despair,
Then fades away,—and leaves him weeping there,
Without one gleam of hope, until the cry
Of contrite grief, ascends to God, on high.

To prayer, sad soul! When trials throng thy path,
And all around doth bode o'erwhelming wrath;
In this dark hour of need,—rest on the "Rock,"
Which firm will stand, through each convulsive shock:
And murmur not,—for He is just, who sends Affliction's yoke;—thus stubborn wills He bends.
With patience bear each strife, till victory, won O'er passions base, proclaims, "God's will be done."

"ROMANIZING."

I, also, would like to pronounce my opinion, about the matter now pending before the Editorial "clique." It is introduced under the vague and indefinite term of ROMANIZING. A charge of inconsistency, error or crime, I suppose, is intended to be made by the use of this word, but to what extent, and against whom from all that has been uttered in this cause, has not yet appeared. To me the singularity of this mode of ascertaining the degree of favor or hatred, with which the objectionable features of the Church of Rome, is regarded by Anglicans, is equalled only by the celebrated experiment of Lorenzo Dow for detecting and bringing a thief to justice. It having been reported to him, that certain valuable articles were missing, he at once engaged to have them restored. Accordingly, on an occasion when he went to preach, having taken an axe with him into the pulpit; towards the end of his sermon, he elevated it with a threat and motion, as if he intended to precipitate it into the midst of the assembled congregation. He held it fast, however, but his purpose was gained. The man who dodged he pronounced, and even ascertained to be the thief. If Mr. Calendar could be as successful in his novel experiment, and have these, "ROMANIZERS," as he calls some persons, over whom he has assumed the oversight, but whose names are not made known to the world, if they be to himself, brought before the bar of the Church, that they might be examined, and the precise character and degree of their guilt could be ascertained and pronounced upon; it would tend to relieve the unoffending from suspicion, and fix guilt, if it exist—on those, on whom it ought to rest. I imagine, that even, if this motion of the ROMANIZING AXE did not satisfy one of our Bishops, who, by placing so light an estimate on a verdict of "NOT GUILTY," in this particular case, thereby seems to countenance the idea, that he would be willing to lay aside the usual mode of trial in causes, ecclesiastical and civil, and depend, I suppose, on public opinion; it would at least not disturb that "quietness" you seem to delight in, and could not fail of sending the glad tide of joy, into the editorial tribe, who would persuade us, of the deep interest they feel in our venerable School of the Prophets, by endeavoring to disturb the harmony and peace of the Church, throughout the land.

I would not have you think, that I am not in earnest, for though an alumnus of another seminary, to which I am much attached, I am no less than a trustee of the General Theological Seminary, and claim to feel as much happiness, in its prosperity, as any of its friends. Like "a most intelligent Clergyman, from a quiet country Parish," I was "greatly disturbed by the first article of the Calendar;" but not perhaps, in the same way—that is, if he was alarmed. To me the firing from the direction of Hartford, only set me to thinking—what could this mean; and not being able to satisfy my curiosity, it proved a source of annoyance to me, as one might suppose, until I called to mind, an occurrence of my youth, from which I was taught the lesson, that some things that seem dangerous, are not in reality. It was at a military academy, I became acquainted with the musket—how to load, take aim, and fire, with as much precision and dispatch, as if we had been drawn up into line, in the face of a deadly enemy. At first, however, I feared to touch the trigger; but having done so—after the loud report had died away, and the smoke was sufficiently removed, I looked to see, if we had not hit somebody or something. The secret of blank cartridges was soon made known to me, and I rejoiced to learn, we might have the pleasure of shooting without doing any mischief. The firing of small arms, at our noble G. T. S. an Institute to be venerated and cherished, and not to be unnecessarily disturbed and hindered in her work, at the last inspection, had made no perceptible impression on her walls; and simply for this reason, that there being no lead at command, only powder cartridges have been discharged, and even simple ones, with a little experience, know the difference.

Now, allow me to say to some of your brethren of the Press, in all kindness, that if they wish to deserve the good opinion and blessing of those who love "quietness," that they should endeavor to think, at least, twice before they speak once, and neither in writing or speaking, of individuals or things, should they substitute, prejudice for reason, suspicion for argument—what they happen to think on a rainy or dull day, without clear evidence, for truth. Though we, their readers, are sometimes quite ignorant, yet we are easily deceived, if we could indeed think, that such a purpose could be entertained by a religious editor.

O, sir, endeavor to maintain "quietness" and peace in the face of truth, and we will welcome "The Banner of the Cross," as our paper, and unfold it, as a dove spreads out its wings, to the soft breezes, that blow over the south.

MR. EDITOR:

Will you insert the following extracts from "Incidents of the Apostolic age in Britain," and oblige, M. H. T.

"We are ready enough to condemn all unbelievers but ourselves, and to exclaim with uplifted hands and eyes against Jews and ancient heathens, because they delayed for a single hour their gladsome acquiescence in the truth—their full obedience to all that was enjoined upon them by the first missionaries of the faith. When realizing the scene where these men delivered the new message of the gospel, we, as a matter of course, claimed to take our place in the ranks of those who 'received the word with joy.' But are we not too hasty here in judging both for ourselves and others? For, which of us is really willing to receive new instructions, even from Heaven? Is not the interpretation men have put upon the old and written word, more precious to them, if they would but confess it, than the word itself? and are not more costly, more frightful sacrifices made to the idol of self-opinion, than commonly fell to the share of any grim deity of the simple pagans? Are not love and joy, and peace and hope, truth and justice—yes, and faith itself, slain there before the eyes of all men from day to day?"

Let those especially who claim to belong to the peculiar fold of Christ, put a searching question to their consciences, and ask how they would treat a messenger, even with the credentials of miracles in his hands, who should rebuke their special sins? We know how certain elect infidels of the only church then existing, got rid of the evidence of facts they could not deny—miracles, they attributed to satanic agency, and is it much to be doubted whether large bodies of professors would not now do the same. It is impossible to tell under what degree, not of evidence, but of terror, our party men of Britain would surrender the cherished objects of their secret devotion even at the command of One who, wielding those terrors, should say—"Give up your gods."—True: things are not come to this pass yet, for 'The Master delayeth his coming.'

In these fair weather and capital times, when profession having elbowed a clear road for itself, struts a-kinbo before us.—When religion is to be managed on such advantageous terms, and the smallest possible deductions of cost and comfort are submitted to by multitudes of its present confessors—these favoured persons are little disposed to disturb their equanimity,—their self-complacency, by conning the page which records the stern incidents of early Church history. The discomfort is too great of contemplating the writhing form of martyrdom, even from the very safe distance at which time has placed it: the exercise might be profitable, but it is too painful, of reckoning the account, of summing the price, at which men of another age were willing to accept the Christian faith. Is there, then, any reproof conveyed hereby, to the men who are now so much at ease in Zion? 'O, no,' is the ready answer; 'but the fact is, that the rights of conscience are now fully understood, and the ancient church is no pattern for us—besides, the details of the stake—of death encountered amidst blood and flames—do not suit the feeling of the day—we have got beyond it all!'

And at what then have we arrived?—Why at the more awful period of an untried faith, on whose doubtful wing men are content, nay, resolved to venture their all hereafter. We live in times when religion is deemed to require no sacrifices at all. So professors have little to do, but to plume themselves, and line their nests with down. They will not allow a feather's point to intrude on their cushioned repose. There are masses of persons, claiming for themselves all religion, who will not endure a fast—who fear not to condemn an alms—who will confess no fault to man, nor take a rebuke from him, and who will confront the clear Scriptures on those heads, nothing daunted. Meantime, the ear is lulled under the soft impressions of smooth things discreetly worded. It seeks stimulants for its prurience, and anon demands the thunders of a horrible tempest on the world around. This is Modern Christianity, which impatient of every burden, shoulders the cross aside—spurns at its reproach, and vaunts and luxuriates in its own new path to heaven!"

THE CHURCH IN BARBADOES.—The rector has commenced, or rather, we should say, revived the custom of having prayers every morning at the cathedral. The rector is much to be commended for opening the cathedral for daily prayer. The public or private worship of God, with the hearing and reading the Scriptures, must be the best preparation for the due performance of the secular duties of the day.

Religious matters have greatly improved since the days of our youth; and much have we to be thankful for in the recollection of the spiritual benefits conferred upon us by placing a bishop at the head of our ecclesiastical establishment. Wonderful have been the improvements in all clerical matters since the arrival of the first bishop: Episcopal superintendence has infused a spirituality into our services, order, regularity, personal inspection, personal visitation of the sick and afflicted, &c., &c., of which it must be confessed we knew little or nothing in the days of yore. In this mighty change, however, are involved the greatly-increased responsibilities and the almost overwhelming labors of the clergy. The harvest is still very great, but the laborers are too few.—Barbadian.

NOTICE.

St. JOHN'S CHURCH, N. L.—This Church having been closed for several weeks, for the purpose of being repaired, cleansed and painted, during which time an important alteration has been made in the arrangements of the Chancel. The congregation worshipping there are informed that the Church will be re-opened, (by Divine permission,) for public worship, on the first Sunday after Trinity, (June 10th, at 10½ A. M. and at 3½ P. M., and all other persons who may wish to worship with us, are reminded that the privileges of the Gospel in this Church are free. June 9 GEO. BOYD, Rector.

The undersigned thankfully acknowledges the receipt of 50 Prayer Books, from the "Bishop White Prayer Book Society," and one dozen of a larger size from the "Female Prayer Book Society of Philadelphia." Also the receipt of several hundred pages of Tracts from the "Female Tract Society," and 14 volumes of Theological Works from the "Bishop White Parish Library Association," for the use of Zion Church, Tuscarora. A. BEATTY.

The undersigned begs leave to acknowledge the following donations in behalf of the Church of the Crucifixion, since the 1st of April—

Further donations to this church are much needed, and are earnestly solicited. RENE GUILLON, Warden, No. 214 Chesnut street.

ALL SAINTS' CHURCH, MOYAMENSING.

There will be an ordination in this Church on Friday, (June 15th,) at 11 o'clock, A. M.

FAIR.

The Ladies of the Episcopal Church, in the borough of Norristown, propose holding an Exhibition and Sale of Useful and Fancy Articles, together with Refreshments appropriate to the season, on Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday, the 12th, 13th and 14th days of the present month.

The large and commodious rooms of the Court House will be used on the occasion, and no pains will be spared to render them pleasant and attractive. The proceeds of the sale are to be appropriated towards defraying the expenses recently incurred by enlarging the Cemetery, building a Rectory, and otherwise improving the Church property. The object contemplated, therefore, being so commendable, it is to be hoped that this effort of the ladies will meet with a reasonable share of encouragement from a generous public.

The rooms will be open daily, from 10 o'clock A. M. until 10 o'clock, P. M. Admission 12 cents. Norristown, June 6th, 1849.

BISHOP POTTER'S APPOINTMENTS.

JUNE.

17th. Oxford and Frankford.
24th. Great Valley (Chester Co.)

PENNSYLVANIA.

MR. EDITOR:

I take great pleasure in informing you of the organization of another Convocation in this Diocese, on Wednesday, May 30th. At the request of Bishop Potter, a number of the clergy of Chester, Delaware, and Philadelphia counties met in Chester. There were present Bishop Potter, the Rev. Messrs. T. G. Allen, Clemson, Kirke, Hood, Quick, and J. B. Smith.

The Convocation being organized, and the Bishop in the chair, the Rev. Mr. Smith was appointed Secretary pro tem. The rules of Convocation of Northern Pennsylvania, as published in the Journal of Convention of 1848 were adopted, with some slight additions and alterations.

The Convocation embraces all the clergy of Chester and Delaware counties, and that part of Philadelphia county lying west of the Schuylkill, and is styled the "Chester and Delaware Convocation." The Bishop of the Diocese is president, ex officio, and in his absence, the presbyter longest resident within the bounds of the Convocation presides. That presbyter is Rev. Dr. Bull.

There are to be four meetings a year, in May, August, November, and February, at places appointed by the Convocation. The next meeting will be at New London X Roads, on the evening of the fourth Tuesday of August. It is hoped that all the members of the Convocation will be present.

After the adoption of the rules, the Rev. Mr. Smith was elected Secretary and Treasurer for the year commencing May 30th. The Bishop, in accordance with rule 7th, appointed Rev. Mr. Smith to preach the Convocation Sermon at the next meeting, and the Rev. Mr. Childs the alternate.

Besides the private meetings of the Convocation, there were several public services in the churches of Chester and Marcus Hook. On Tuesday evening, May 29th, Rev. Mr. Clemson preached in Chester. On Wednesday afternoon, the Bishop preached in the same place, and confirmed five young ladies,—members of "Aston Ridge Seminary." In the evening, Rev. Mr. Allen preached in Chester, and the Rev. Mr. Clemson in Marcus Hook.

In giving the intelligence of the organization of this Convocation, I cannot but express the sincere pleasure I experienced in attending its services. For one, I felt it was good to be there. And I trust that from this movement much good may be derived, not only to the members themselves, but also to the parishes over which they are placed in the Lord. May the blessing of God rest upon this, and every other undertaking, which has for its object the salvation of souls and glory of his holy name.

KENTUCKY CONVENTION.

The Convention of the Church in Kentucky assembled in Ascension Church, Frankfort, on the 31st of May. In consequence of the prevalence of the cholera in several parts of the state, the parishes were not fully represented, but the proceedings were highly interesting, and marked by a spirit of kindness and Christian love.

On the first day of the session, morning prayer was conducted by the Rev. Mr. Page, of Bowling-Green, and the Rev. Mr. Ozanne, of New Orleans. The Bishop preached an able, earnest, and appropriate sermon from St. Matthew xxviii. 20—"Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world."

The Convention was then called to order, and the Rev. E. F. Berkley re-elected Secretary. Among the lay-delegates was the Hon. Henry Clay.

Divine service at night was celebrated by the Rev. J. Craik and the Rev. Mason Gallagher, and a sermon preached by the Rev. W. Y. Rooker, from St. John iii. 3.

The Bishop's address showed that great and unexampled progress has been made by the Church during a few months past, and that we have every reason to thank God, and take courage.

On Friday, morning prayer was said at 9 o'clock, and the Convention proceeded to the election of the usual Committees, and the discussion of several important questions. A vigorous effort will be made to raise $1500 per annum, in order to support missionaries in the various promising fields now opening before us. At 8 p. m. the Rev. J. C. Talbot read prayers, and the Rev. T. H. Michell the lessons, and the Rev. E. F. Berkley preached from St. Luke ix. 26.

The session on Saturday began as usual with the regular service; the Bishop pronouncing the absolution and benediction. The parochial reports show a very manifest change for the better. The people of the commonwealth are beginning to see the beauty and strength of our system, and to desire to share in its advantages. Among the lay-delegates was Mr. Arthur Creighfield, for many years a prominent preacher among the Reformed Baptists or Campbellites. He has recently become a candidate for orders in the Church, and will soon publish to the world his reasons for making the change.

On Saturday P. M. the Rev. Dr. Waller presented an interesting report of the condition and prospects of Shelby College. By the most untiring energy and zeal, he has raised this institution from a state of decay and languishing, to a high degree of prosperity.

After singing the 107th Psalm, the Convention adjourned with the Bishop's blessing. The next Convention will meet at Louisville, on the last Thursday in May, 1850.

There are now about twenty-six clergymen connected with the diocese.

After Divine service on Saturday night, the Rev. J. C. Talbot preached from Acts xxiv. 25.

On Trinity Sunday, morning prayer was read by the Rev. H. H. Reed and Rev. J. C. Talbot, and a sermon preached by Rev. J. Craik from Deut. vi. 4, &c. The Bishop administered the Holy Communion, assisted by the Rev. Mr. Talbot, and Rev. John N. Norton, the Rector of the Church.

In the P. M. the Rev. Mr. Laird, of Versailles preached from St. Matthew vii. 26-27, and the Bishop confirmed twenty-two persons, and afterwards delivered an address.

At 8 o'clock, the closing exercises of the Convention were held. The Rev. Mr. Rooker preached from Philippians ii. 12 and 13, and the Bishop made an appropriate address to the clergy and laity.

All left the Convention gratified with what they had seen and heard, and animated, we trust, with fresh energy and zeal, to do their Master's work.

Rev. J. J. Page

THE CONVENTION OF NORTH CAROLINA.

The Convention of this diocese has adjourned after a session of four days. The bishop was unable to attend all its sittings, and in his absence, the chair was filled by the Rev. Dr. Mason, rector of Christ Church, Raleigh.

The usual committees were elected. Delegates to the General Convention, Rev. Dr. Mason, Rev. Dr. Drane, Rev. Mr. Baxter, Rev. Mr. McRae. There was nothing specially to be noticed in the reports of the committees, except that in the report of the committee on the state of the Church, allusion was made to "the agitation and alarm" in the diocese, created by the introduction of certain novelties of practice and doctrine. Immediately after the reading of the report, a special charge was received from the bishop, addressed to the clergy of the diocese, in which he authorized the clergy to say to their parishes, that no efforts would be wanting on his part, so long as God should give him jurisdiction in North Carolina, to resist any such introduction of novelties, come from whatever quarter they might.

This charge was heartily responded to by the convention in a series of resolutions, passed without a single dissenting voice. One thousand copies of the committee's report, the bishop's charge, and the resolutions of the convention, were ordered separate from the journal. It is confidently hoped that the proceedings of the convention in the above matter, will be received with general favour in the Church. The diocese of North Carolina, under the teachings of its beloved Ravenscroft and Ives, will never prove faithless to the doctrines of the Church, as recorded in the Book of Common Prayer. The Church at large may rely on that.

The sermons preached before the convention, generally, were of the highest order.

It was announced, in the report of the committee on the State of the Church, that the society called "the Society of the Holy Cross," had been dissolved—and dissolved, it should be known, by the voluntary consent of its members, who were unwilling to continue it, at the peril of creating division in the Church. The society is altogether distinct from the mission of Valle Crucis, having been formed more than two years after the establishment of that mission. It appears from the reports, that the missionaries there associated, two presbyters and one deacon, with two candidates for orders, are, under God's blessing, making most decided impression on the mountainous district in that quarter. May the heart of our bishop be rejoiced by the continued prosperity of a mission, which has cost him so much time and pains, and expense, in the effort to plant the gospel in the Church where it was never before known! The mission is self-supporting, but it is hoped that churchmen will not forget the trials of their brethren in their labor of love, but will freely minister to them of their substance.

We, who are old-fashioned North Carolina churchmen, cannot but think that a mistake was committed, in organizing a society in the Church, separate from the brethren, although such a society was pledged to uphold the vital doctrines of the Church. We had grown up under the teaching that the Church itself was as the true and best, so the only society intended for such a purpose. It was but natural, therefore, that suspicion and anxiety should arise over the diocese, in relation to the "Society of the Holy Cross"—and too much praise cannot be awarded to the members of the society, that, on learning the state of things, they promptly consented to its dissolution, and took their stand side by side with their brethren in the diocese. We trust now that Jerusalem shall be once more, as a city that is at unity with itself. We know of nothing that should keep us from striving together with one heart and mind for the prosperity of Zion.

It may be interesting to the numerous friends of Bishop Ives to learn, that he has so far recovered from his indisposition, as to start on his western visitation. The hearts of many go with him.

MARYLAND.

The Trinity ordination was holden in Grace Church, Elk Ridge Landing. After Morning Prayers by the Rev. W. W. Lord, and a sermon by the Rev. John B. Kerfoot, Rector of St. James's College, Joseph Newton Watson was admitted to the holy order of Deacon, on presentation by the Rev. Edward J. Stearns; and the Rev. Joseph C. Passmore, and the Rev. Alexander D. Jones, Deacons, were ordained Priests, on presentation by the Rev. Mr. Kerfoot, who, with the Rev. Mr. Stearns, united in the imposition of hands. Of the Priests ordained, Mr. Passmore is vice-Rector of the College of St. James, and Mr. Jones, assistant minister of Grace Church, Elk Ridge Landing. The Rev. Mr. Watson is to officiate as assistant minister in St. Luke's Parish, Queen Anne county. P. O. Church Hill.

Confirmation.—In the Patapsco Female Institute, the Diocesan school for girls, on the evening of Trinity Sunday, eleven persons, one a teacher and the rest pupils in the institution, were confirmed. The Rev. J. B. Kerfoot, Rector of St. James's College, preached. The Bishop briefly addressed the candidates before and after the laying on of hands. Several others of the clergy of the Diocese were present. Churchman.

CONNECTICUT.

CONSECRATION.—On Thursday, May 31st, the Rt. Rev. the Bishop of the Diocese consecrated to the worship and service of the adorable Trinity, Calvary Church, Stonington, it being the anniversary of the day on which its corner stone was laid.

The sermon was preached by Rev. R. A. Hallam, of New London, from Heb. 9: 24, "The Holy Places made with hands, which are the figures of the true;" the Bishop, aided by the Rector, performed the Communion service.

This Church is built of granite, taken from the lot on which it stands, after a plan gratuitously furnished by Richard Up-

John, Esq., by whom also its erection has been superintended and directed, as a work of Christian love. And it will not be doubted by any who view it with proper appreciation, that in its simple propriety and beauty, it will redound as much to the credit of his architectural skill and taste, as the larger and more stately edifices which are rising under his hand in various parts of the country. It is, indeed, an architectural gem, the model of a rural Church. It is in the early English style, and consists of a nave and chancel. The chancel is at the east, and a vestry stands in the north-east angle of the nave and chancel. The front is surmounted by a bell turret of stone, and the east gable of the nave and of the chancel, each by a cross. The walls are massive and sustained by buttresses, and the whole combines in an unusual manner, strength and solidity with ease and lightness. The windows are of brown enamelled glass, with a stained border. The chancel is lighted by two lancets combined and surmounted by a quatre-foil containing a ruby colored cross. The pulpit and desk are at the opposite angles of the chancel. The walls within are plastered and colored gray; the wood-work is painted of the color of black walnut, and the ceiling of the roof, which is open, is blue. The Church has an organ gallery at the west end, and contains sittings for about three hundred persons.—The seats have been leased for a handsome sum, and it is believed, that the parish has opened before it a prospect of growing usefulness and prosperity.

The gathering of such a congregation and the erection of such a Church in a place where two years ago the Church was almost unknown, in the face of a very determined and unrelenting opposition meekly and quietly borne, is but a specimen of what might be done in many other places by earnest and well directed endeavor, and calls loudly on the Churchmen of Connecticut to "go into the next towns and preach the Gospel;" for the fields around them on all sides are "white already to the harvest."

EPISCOPAL ACTS.

On the fourth Sunday after Easter, May 13th, at ten and a half o'clock, A. M., the Bishop preached in St. Mary's Chapel, Portsmouth. At 3 o'clock, P. M., he confirmed nine persons in Trinity Church, Newport. Sermon and address by the Bishop. The following day, two sick persons were confirmed, making eleven belonging to this parish. Monday, May 14th, GEORGE ANTHONY was admitted to the Order of Deacons, under Canon V., 1847, in St. Matthew's Church, Jamestown. The candidate was presented by Rev. D. R. Brewer.

May 15th, the Bishop preached in the Chapel of the Holy Cross, Middletown.

May 16th, the Bishop confirmed one person in St. Paul's Church, Portsmouth. A sermon and address were delivered by the Bishop. In the evening, the Bishop again preached in the same church.

Sunday after Ascension, May 20th, at ten and a half o'clock, A. M., three persons were confirmed in St. Mark's Church, Warren, and at three o'clock, P. M., three were confirmed in St. Michael's Church Bristol. At seven and a half P. M., the Bishop preached again in the last named Church.

May 24th, the Bishop preached at the Missionary station in Simmonsville.

Whitsunday, May 27th, seven persons were confirmed in St. Andrew's Church, Providence.

Trinity, Sunday, June 3d, seven persons received confirmation in St. Peter's Church, Rockville, at three o'clock P. M., and in the evening of the same day, at seven and three quarters o'clock, the same holy rite was administered to twelve persons in St. John's Church, Providence.

Letters of Dismission have been granted to the Rev. EMERY M. PORTER, and the Rev. JAMES MULCAHEY, to the diocese of Massachusetts.—Witness.

CHAPEL OF THE HOLY INNOCENTS.—At an early hour yesterday afternoon, a large assemblage congregated on and about the ground (corner of Colonic and North Pearl-sts.) on which a Church edifice is soon to be erected, for the purpose of witnessing the interesting ceremony of laying the corner stone.

The day was clear and beautiful, and the arrangement such as to give all present an opportunity of hearing and participating in this interesting service.

At the appointed hour, the procession reached the ground, when the Rt. Rev. Bishop WHITTINGHAM, of Maryland, now the officiating Bishop of this Diocese, commenced the service by reading the 122d Psalm:—"I was glad when they said unto me, we will go into the house of the Lord." Prayer was then offered up, after which the Rev. Dr. KIP read the inscription on the stone and a list of the deposits contained within the leaden box. It was then laid in its proper place, when the Bishop, striking the stone three times with a hammer, pronounced it laid in the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, to be devoted to the service of Almighty God, agreeably to the principles of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States, and the edifice to be erected to be known by the name of the Chapel of the Holy Innocents.

This was followed by the reading of some appropriate sentences from the Bible.

Owing to the recent illness of the Bishop it was not thought advisable to have him address the audience in the open air, and this pleasing task was assigned to the Rev. Dr. KIP, who, for upwards of twenty minutes commanded the almost breathless attention of the entire audience. The address was well suited to the occasion and was delivered in his usual fluent forcible manner.

After prayer by the Bishop, Gloria in Excelsis was sung by the Choir of St. Paul's, in which the entire assemblage joined, when a concluding Prayer and Benediction closed the services.

The procession was then reformed, headed by the clergy and Vestrymen of the different Churches in the city. They returned the house of Wm. H. De Witt, Esq., who is the senior warden of St. Paul's, and to whom the residents in that portion of the city are indebted for the building of this structure. Besides the Right Rev. Bishop WHITTINGHAM, of the diocese of Maryland, the clergy present were the Rev. Dr. KIP, of St. Paul's; Rev. Dr. POTTER, of St. Peter's; Rev. Mr. SELKIRK, of Trinity; Rev. Mr. DAVENPORT, of Grace Church; Rev. Mr. VAN KLEECK, of Troy; Rev. Mr. WEAVER, of West Troy; Rev. Mr. TWING, of Lansingburgh; Rev. Mr. HUBBARD, of Stillwater, and Rev. Mr. REED, of Niagara Falls.—Albany Evening Journal.

Clerical Changes.

The Rev. R. C. Shimeall has resigned the Rectorship of St. Jude's Church, in New York. The resignation to take effect on or before the close of the session of the next Diocesan Convention, in September next; and it has been unanimously accepted by the Vestry.

VISITS TO THE MONASTERIES IN THE LEVANT.

He had not proceeded far when he fell into the hands of the robbers, and, as a dernier ressource, bethought him of the paper, which he accordingly presented to his captors, who dragged him up the mountain to the captain of the gang:—

"The captain was evidently a poor scholar, and he spelt and puzzled over every word. At last, a thought struck him; shading his eyes with his hand from the glare of the fire, he leant forward and peeped into the darkness, where we were awaiting his commands. Not distinguishing us, however, he jumped up from his feet, and shouted out, 'Hallo! where are the gentlemen who brought this letter? what have you done with them?' At the sound of his voice the rest of the party jumped up also, being then first aware that something out of the common way had taken place. Some of the palicari jumped towards us, and were going to seize us, when the captain came forward, and, in a civil tone, said, 'Oh, there you are! welcome, gentlemen; we are very glad to receive you. Make yourselves at home; come near the fire and sit down.' I took him at his word, and sat down on the boards by the side of the fire, rubbing my hands, and making myself as comfortable as possible under the circumstances. My two servants and the muleteer, seeing what turn affairs had taken, became of a sudden as loquacious as they had been silent before, and, in a short time, we were all the greatest friends in the world.

"So," said the captain, or whatever he was, 'you are acquainted with our friend at Mezzovo. How did you leave him? I hope he was well.'

"Oh yes," I said; 'we left him in excellent health. What a remarkably pleasing person he is! and how well he looks in his red velvet dress!'

"Have you known him long?" he asked.

"Why, not very long," replied my Albanian; 'but my master has the greatest respect for him, and so has he for my master.'

"He says you are to take some of our men with you wherever you like," said our host.

"Yes, I know," said the Albanian; 'we settled that at Mezzovo, with my master's friend, his excellency, Mr. What's-his-name.'

"Well, how many will you take?"

"Oh! five or six will do; that will be as many as we want. We are going to Meteora, and then we shall return over the mountains back to Mezzovo, where I hope we shall have the pleasure of meeting your general again.'

"Whilst we were talking and drinking coffee by the fire a prodigious bustling and chattering was going on among the rest of the party, and before long, five slim, active, dirty looking young rogues, in white dresses, with long black hair hanging down their backs, and each with a long thin gun, announced that they were ready to accompany us whenever we were ready to start. As we had nothing to keep us in the dark, smoky hovel, we were soon ready to go; and glad, indeed, was I to be out again in the open air, among the high trees, without the immediate prospect of being hanged up upon one of them. My party jumped with great alacrity and glee upon their miserable mules and horses; all our belongings, including the half of the cold fowl, were in statu quo; and off we set. Our new friends accompanied us on foot. And so delighted was our Caliban of a muleteer, at what we all considered as a fortunate escape, that he lifted up his voice, and gave vent to his feelings in a song. The grand gentleman in red velvet to whom I had presented the pasha's letter at Mezzovo was, it seems, himself the captain of the thieves, the very man against whom the pasha wished to afford us his protection; and he, feeling amused probably at the manner in which we had fallen unawares into his clutches, and being a good natured fellow, (and he certainly looked such,) gave us a note to the officer next in command, ordering him to protect us as his friends, and to provide us with an escort."

Conducted by this respectable body guard, our Author, after being taken himself for a robber, reaches the base of the extraordinary convent of Meteora, perched upon an isolated rock, accessible only by a rope and net let down some twenty-five fathoms, or by a most villainous collection of half rotten ladders planted against the perpendicular face of the crag. Our limits compel us to pass by his capital description of the place, his research for bibliographical treasures which he was compelled to leave behind, the offer of his banditfriends, on his descending, to storm the convent, and carry them off for him, (a proposal he was considerate enough to decline,) and of his parting from the robbers, who invited him to make one of the gang. The next scene of his researches was Mount Athos, or the "holy mountain," that magnificent promontory which Dinocrates of Samos, who built the temple of Ephesus and the Pharos of Alexandria, is said to have proposed to hew into a statue of Alexander the Great. Of the state of this isolated stronghold of monkery and celibacy, from which every animal of the feminine gender is studiously excluded, he gives us a most curious and interesting account. No traveller had been there since the days of Dr. Clarke, and thus Mr. Curzon, armed with a letter from the archbishop of Canterbury, sought out the Greek patriarch at Constantinople, who, after much puzzling as to the nature of his ecclesiastical brother of England, gave to the enterprising bibliographer a letter which opened to him the gates of the numerous convents with which the "holy mountain" is studded. Here his researches were destined to be crowned with most gratifying success, but not without certain trials and temptations most humorously enumerated. Take for instance the following:—

"I slept well on my divan, and at sunrise received a visit from the agoumenos, who came to wish me good day. After some conversation on other matters, I inquired about the library, and asked permission to view its contents. The agoumenos declared his willingness to show me everything that the monastery contained. 'But first,' said he, 'I wish to present you with something excellent for your breakfast; and from the special good will that I bear towards so distinguished a guest, I shall prepare it with my own hands, and will stay to see you eat it; for it is really an admirable dish, and one not presented to all persons.'—'Well,' thought I, 'a good breakfast is not a bad thing;' and the fresh mountain air and the good night's rest had given me an appetite; so I expressed my thanks for the kind hospitality of my lord abbot, and he, sitting down opposite to me on the divan, proceeded to prepare his dish. 'This,' said he, producing a shallow basin half full of a white paste, 'is the principal and most savoury part of this famous dish; it is composed of cloves of garlic, pounded down, with a certain quantity of sugar. With it I will now mix the oil in just proportions, some shreds of fine cheese, (it seemed to be of the white acid kind, which resembles what is called caccia cavallo in the south of Italy, and which almost takes the skin off your fingers, I believe,) and sundry other nice little condiments, and now it is completed!'—He stirred the savoury mess round and round with a large wooden spoon until it sent forth over room and passage and cell, over hill and valley, an aroma which is not to be described. 'Now,' said the agoumenos, crumbling some bread into it with his large and somewhat dirty hands, 'this is a dish for an emperor! Eat, my friend, my much respected guest; do not be shy. Eat; and when you have finished the bowl, you shall go into the library and anywhere else you like; but you shall go nowhere till I have had the pleasure of seeing you do justice to this delicious food, which, I can assure you, you will not meet with everywhere.' I was sorely troubled in spirit. Who could have expected so dreadful a martyrdom as this? The sour apple of the hermit down below was nothing—a trifle in comparison! Was ever an unfortunate bibliomaniac dosed with such a medicine before? It would have been enough to have cured the whole Roxburghe Club from meddling with libraries and books for ever and ever. I made every endeavour to escape this honour. 'My lord,' said I, 'it is a fast; I cannot this morning do justice to this delicious viand; it is a fast; I am under a vow. Englishmen must not eat that dish in this month. It would be wrong; my conscience won't permit, though the odour certainly is most wonderful! Truly an astonishing savour! Let me see you eat it, O agoumenos!' continued I; 'for behold, I am unworthy of anything so good.'—'Excellent and virtuous young man!' said the agoumenos, 'no, I will not eat it. I will not deprive you of this treat. Eat it in peace; for know, that to travellers all such vows are set aside. On a journey it is permitted to eat all that is set before you, unless it is meat that is offered to idols. I admire your scruples; but be not afraid, it is lawful. Take it, my honoured friend, and eat it: eat it all, and then we will go into the library.' He put the bowl into one of my hands and the great wooden spoon into the other: and in desperation I took a gulp, the recollection of which still makes me tremble. What was to be done? Another mouthful was an impossibility: not all my ardour in the pursuit of manuscripts could give me the necessary courage. I was overcome with sorrow and despair. My servant saved me at last; he said 'that English gentlemen never ate such rich dishes for breakfast, from religious feelings he believed; but he requested that it might be put by, and he was sure I should like it very much later in the day.' The agoumenos looked vexed, but he applauded my principles; and just then the board sounded for church. 'I must be off, excellent and worthy English lord,' said he; 'I will take you to the library and leave you the key. Excuse my attendance on you there, for my presence is required in the church.' So I got off better than I expected; but the taste of that ladleful stuck to me for days. I followed the good agoumenos to the library, where he left me to my own devices."

Roaming from one convent to another, he is sometimes successful in rescuing some invaluable MSS. or monkish curiosities from oblivion. At one place he learned that the library had been destroyed during the Greek revolution, and, peeping down into an old tower, he beheld its melancholy remains:—

"This was a dismal spectacle for a devout lover of old books, a sort of biblical knight-errant, as I then considered myself, who had entered on the perilous adventure of Mount Athos to rescue from the thralldom of ignorant monks those fair vellum volumes, with their bright illuminations, and velvet dresses, and jewelled clasps, which for so many centuries had lain imprisoned in their dark monastic dungeons. It was, indeed, a heart-rending sight. By the dim light which streamed through the opening of an iron door, in the wall of the ruined tower, I saw above a hundred ancient manuscripts lying among the rubbish which had fallen from the upper floor, which was ruinous, and had in great part given way. Some of these manuscripts seemed quite entire, fine large folios, but the monks said they were unapproachable, for that floor also on which they lay was unsafe, the beams below being rotten from the wet and rain which came in through the roof. Here was a trap ready set and baited for a bibliographical antiquary. I peeped at the old manuscripts, looked particularly at one or two that were lying in the middle of the floor, and could hardly resist the temptation. I advanced cautiously along the boards, keeping close to the wall, whilst every now and then a dull cracking noise warned me of my danger; but I tried each board by stamping on it with my foot before I ventured my weight upon it. At last, when I dared go no further, I made them bring me a long stick, with which I fished up two or three fine manuscripts, and poked them along towards the door. When I had safely landed them, I examined them more at my ease, but found that the rain had washed the outer leaves quite clean, the pages were stuck tight together in a solid mass, and when I attempted to open them, they broke short off like a biscuit. Neglect and damp and exposure had destroyed them completely."

It has been observed that nothing feminine is allowed to profane the precincts of Mount Athos, and at the convent of Xeropotamo Mr. Curzon fell in with a certain monk, a magnificent looking man of thirty, who, he tells us,—

"did not remember his mother, and did not seem quite sure that he ever had one; had never seen a woman, nor had any idea what sort of things women were, or what they looked like. He asked me whether they resembled the pictures of the Panagia, the Holy Virgin which hang in every church. Now, those who are conversant with the peculiar conventional representations of the Blessed Virgin, in the pictures of the Greek Church, which are all exactly alike, stiff, hard, without any appearance of life or emotion, will agree with me that they do not afford a very favourable idea of the grace or beauty of the fair sex."

... He listened with great interest while I told him that all women were not exactly like the pictures he had seen, but I did not think it charitable to carry on the conversation further, although the poor monk seemed to have a strong inclination to know more of that interesting race of beings from whose society he had been so entirely debarred."

Mr. Curzon now prepared to leave Mount Athos, calling however, before he went, on the Turkish aga who is placed there at the small town of Cairez to collect the revenues due to the Porte, and here he met with one solitary violation of the sanctities of the place.

"The aga," he says, "gave me some breakfast, at which repast a cat made its appearance, with whom, the day before I had made an acquaintance, but now it came, not alone, but accompanied by two kittens. 'Ah!' said I to the aga, 'how is this? Why, as I live, this is a she-cat, a cat feminine! What business has it on Mount Athos? and with kittens too! a wicked cat!'"

"Hush!" said the aga, with a solemn grin, 'do not say anything about it. Yes, it must be a she cat: I allow, certainly, that it must be a she-cat. I brought it with me from Stamboul. But do not speak of it, or they will take it away: and it reminds me of my home, where my wife and children are living far away from me.'

"I promised to make no scandal about the cat, and took my leave, and, as I rode off, I saw him looking at me out of his cage, with the cat sitting by his side. I was sorry I could not take the aga, cat and all, with me to Stamboul, the poor gentleman seemed so solitary and melancholy."

In aiming to make our author speak for himself, we have been unavoidably compelled to leave out much curious information about the Oriental convents, their past and present condition, and the bibliographical treasures they contain, and which it is highly desirable should be rescued from the certain destruction that awaits them in the custody of the drowsy votaries of a fast waning system, "in which ignorance and superstition walk hand in hand." How far a more extended account of these establishments than he has given, may be, as Mr. Curzon suggests, a desideratum, we leave to the judgment of others; for ourselves, we have a strong suspicion that he has given us the cream of the matter in his admirable and amusing volume.

From the Irish Ecclesiastical Journal.

THE ENCYCLICAL LETTER OF POPE PIUS IX.—THE PAPAL THEORY.

The lately-issued encyclical letter of Pope Pius IX. does not appear to have as yet attracted much notice. There perhaps still lingers in the public mind that suspicion of its authenticity which induced several journalists at first to regard this epistle as a stupid forgery. There is, however, now no doubt of its being a genuine document; we therefore give such extracts from it as will fully convey its substance.

The letter is addressed to "The Patriarchs, Primate, Archbishops, and Bishops of the whole Catholic universe," and opens with an expression of the satisfaction experienced by Pius IX. at learning "In what marvellous manner, under the pontificate of our predecessor, Gregory XVI. of venerable memory, an ardent desire had been awakened throughout the whole Catholic universe to see it, at last decreed, by a solemn judgment of the Holy See, that the thrice holy Mother of God, who is also the tender mother of us all, the immaculate Virgin Mary, was conceived without the original stain." The Pope adds that the existence of this desire is proved by constant requests of bishops, chapters, &c., "that it should be permitted to add, and to pronounce aloud in the holy liturgy, and especially in the preface to the Mass of the Conception of the Blessed Virgin, this word Immaculate. To these requests," continued Pius IX., "our predecessor and ourselves have yielded with the utmost readiness. It has come to pass further, venerable brethren, that a large number of you have not ceased to address to our predecessors and ourselves letters in which they have urged us to define, as a doctrine of the Catholic Church, that the conception of the Blessed Virgin had been immaculate, and absolutely exempt from any soil of original sin." After stating the special veneration with which, from his earliest years, he had regarded the Blessed Virgin, the Pope takes occasion further to observe:—"For you know perfectly, venerable brethren, that the foundation of our confidence is in the thrice holy Virgin; since it is in her that God has placed the fulness of all good, so that if there is in us any hope, if there is any favour, if there is any salvation, we know that it is from her that we receive it, because this is the will of Him who has willed that we shall have all things through Mary." The letter goes on to direct that prayers be offered up for Divine guidance in coming to a decision on the point, and expresses a desire to receive information as to the wish of the clergy and people "to see the Apostolic See issue a decree on this matter;" meanwhile liberty is given to use an office in which the question is already decided. This letter is dated "Gaeta, 2d of February, in the year 1849."*

* Some years ago, in the 47th number of this journal, we had occasion to give a history of the controversy which existed on this point among the members of the Church of Rome, from

The Catholic Christian, on perusing this most extraordinary specimen of doctrine, may well ask himself, "In what will Popery terminate at last?" When Mr. Newman, at p. 407 of his Essay, under the title "Deification of St. Mary," conceded the novelty of the worship paid to her, where he states "I have said that there was in the first ages no public and ecclesiastical recognition [as if there could be any other] of the place which St. Mary holds in the economy of grace, this was reserved for the fifth century,"—he nevertheless restricts the honour due to her to that degree of veneration which the Arians allowed to Christ. Such was the Romish opinion in 1845. But in 1849 a further "development" has taken place, and the Pope himself has declared that in her "God has placed the fulness of all good, so that if there is in us any hope, any salvation, we know that it is from her that we receive it." Where, we again ask, is this to end?

We do not propose to make any further remarks on the subject matter of this most melancholy epistle. It affords an additional proof, if such were required, that the question of the papal supremacy, in its wide and modern acceptation, is really the fundamental point at issue between the Church Catholic and Rome. We have made mention of the modern theory respecting the papacy, as the Ultramontane view which maintains that the bishop of Rome is not only the centre of Catholic unity, but that being personally infallible, he also possesses in himself, by divine right, the power of infallible judgment, irrespective of the Church at large or a General Council, is the only rational ground on which it can be argued that it is essential for all men to be in communion with the particular Church of Rome.

It seems, indeed, difficult to conceive how the school of Bossuet could ever have maintained the strictly Roman view of the unity of the Church; for surely nothing can be more absurd than to endeavour to uphold the dogma that it is an essential article of faith to be in communion with an individual who, as Bossuet's theory admits, may fall into doctrinal error, and who may even be a heretic—who is to be controlled by a General Council, and who may be deposed by its authority, and have his decisions reversed. The Ultramontane, indeed, is now the only theory received by Romanists; on such a theory alone is the promulgation of the papal letter noticed above even conceivable: and we may, perhaps, be permitted to remind our readers of a few considerations bearing on that question.

To multiply historical facts against the Romish claims were easy, did our limits permit; but from nothing can stronger inferences be drawn than the silence of the first Christian writers. None of the advocates of our holy faith, none of the Apologies of the early Fathers, of Justin, Origen, Tertullian, Arnobius, or Cyril, allude to the importance of this doctrine; nor did these writers find it necessary to defend against the cavils of their adversaries, a dogma which Pope Boniface VIII. declared to be "altogether necessary for salvation." In the same silence, so unaccountable, if the doctrine be true, does the painstaking accuracy of Eusebius pass over this whole subject, and we are compelled to descend to Pope Innocent III., and his Lateran synod, for the first synodical decision of this essential article of faith. The authority of the Bishops of Rome was frequently questioned, their opinion disregarded, their pretensions opposed—men excommunicated by them have been canonized as saints, and they themselves have been excommunicated as heretics;* nevertheless, in the face of such facts (constituting, on the Ultramontane hypothesis, the most audacious presumption on the part of the Church, as well as the most pernicious and fatal error), we find Epiphanius and Theodoret, who composed elaborate treatises on all the heresies that vexed the Christian world, observing on this head a silence equally profound. The great a priori argument for expecting a visible head of Christ's Church on earth is a constant appeal to the melancholy divisions which distract her, since by the simple intervention of Christ's Vicar, it is asserted, all such troublous scenes must pass away. But what trace of such an authority do we discern in early times? Did the Gnostics, or Marcionites, or Arians, or Macedonians, admit it? or, what is more to the point, did the Church, or even the Bishop of Rome himself, ever advance this power, based on divine appointment, as an argument against them? St. Augustine, in his great work on the Unity of the Church, is altogether silent as to the papal power; while the period of the doctrine being broached for the first time in the twelfth century. To that article we refer those who may be curious in such matters; we would only now observe that the Council of Trent refused to decide the question in its decree concerning Original Sin; it being found impossible to reconcile the views of the Franciscans, who maintained the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception, with those of the Dominicans, who as strenuously opposed it; the canon De Peccato Originali, ending as follows:—"Declarat tamen hæc ipsa sancta synodus, non esse suæ intentionis, comprehendere in hoc decreto ubi de peccato originali agitur, beatam et immaculatam Virginem Mariam, Dei Genetricem." We may observe that a clause was designedly inserted in the Ninth Article of our Church's condemnation of this doctrine, where it is declared that original sin "is the fault and corruption of the nature of every man that naturally is engendered of the offspring of Adam."

* Notwithstanding all the efforts of the Bishops of Rome, the Eastern Church refused to adopt the Western rule as to the observance of Easter, until the question was put to rest by the Council of Nice, A.D. 325. When Pope Stephen had excommunicated St. Cyprian, St. Firmilian of Cappadocia, thus addressed the infallible head of the church:—"Thou hast cut thyself off; deceive not thyself; when thou thoughtest that all could be excommunicated by thee, thou didst only excommunicate thyself from all."—(St. Cyprian, Ep. 75.) Meletius, the orthodox Bishop of Antioch, died out of communion with Pope Damasus; nevertheless he was subsequently canonized by both Eastern and Western Church. When Pope Liberius signed the Arian symbol of Sirmium, St. Hilary of Poitiers did not shrink from writing "Anathema tibi Liberi;" and Pope Honorius, in the seventh century, who had adopted the Monothelite heresy, was excommunicated by the sixth General Council. The Council of Constance in the fifteenth century, actually deposed three popes, and the Council of Basil endeavoured to depose one.

in the treatise of Vincentius of Lerins (written for the express purpose of deciding controverted points, and of laying down rules for the settlement of all doctrinal matters in dispute) the writer merely appeals to the Canon of Scripture and the inviolable doctrines of the Catholic Church.

Scripture is equally unsatisfactory in support of Ultramontanism. One of the most prominent arguments put forward to support the hypothesis of the divine appointment of an infallible monarch of the Church on earth, is based on the passage (Matt. xvi. 18, &c.): "Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my Church. . . . I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven, and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth," &c.; whence it is strangely inferred that a peculiar power was there and then actually conferred on St. Peter, and, in him, on all his successors in the See of Rome; while it is manifest that these words, as well as the similar declaration subsequently made to all the Apostles (chap. xviii. 18), expressed, too, in the same future tense, merely imply the promise of a power to be bestowed at some future time;—a promise which was at length fulfilled, in the ordination of the Apostles to their ministerial office, when spiritual power was given to all alike (John xx. 21-23) on the evening of the Resurrection—"Whosoever sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them; whosoever sins ye retain, they are retained."* Equally silent is the rest of the New Testament respecting the spiritual superiority of any one Apostle over the others; and equally clear are the inspired records as to the equality of the privileges of each member.

In the entire extent of the epistles, it is not too much to say, that there is not the slightest intimation of any superiority of any apostle, much less of St. Peter, over the others. St. Paul himself, in fact, terminates the question:—

"I suppose I was not a whit behind the very chiefest apostles." "In nothing am I behind the very chiefest apostles, though I be nothing."

If certain of the apostolic churches did single out some individual as their chief, and say, "I am of Paul, and I of Apollos, and I of Cephas, and I of Christ," St. Paul at once rebuked this spirit as at variance with the entire idea of the true unity of the body of Christ:—

"Surely," wrote Pope Gregory the Great to John the Faster, Patriarch of Constantinople, who had assumed the title of Universal Bishop—"Surely the Apostle Paul, hearing some say 'I am of Paul, I of Apollos, I of Cephas,' exclaimed in exceeding horror at this rending of the Lord's body, by which his members attached themselves, as it were, to other heads, saying, 'Was Paul crucified for you? or were ye baptized in the name of Paul?' If he then rejected the members of the Lord's body being subjected to certain heads, as it were, besides Christ, and that even to apostles themselves, as leaders of parts, what will you say to Christ (who is, as you know, the head of the universal Church) in the examination of the last judgment, you who endeavour to subject to yourself, under the name of universal, all his members."—Lib. v. 18.†

The whole theory, in a word, of the episcopate, which Scripture and the primitive Church present, may be summed up in the memorable words of St. Cyprian—"Episcopatus unus est, ejus singulis in solidum pars tenetur." "The episcopate is one, of which every individual (bishop) participates, possessing it entire;" or, as the venerable Martyr elsewhere expresses it, "From Christ there is one Church, divided throughout the whole world into many members; and one episcopate, diffused by the harmonious multiplicity (concordi numeritate) of many bishops,"‡ which grand statement of Catholic polity is thus beautifully expressed by one, alas! no longer among us:—

"The Church of God, owning—according to her uncorrupted polity—no single earthly head, and beholding in all her authorised governors the deputies and images of authority not their own, looks straight to heaven for her monarch. Until carnal ambition had marred the majestic vision, in presuming to finish the edifice, her gradations of power (from her thousands of inferior ministers, to her few vast patriarchates), lessening in number as they rose, and thus insensibly narrowing to a single head, yet acknowledging none on earth, served as a continued and impressive confession of the absence of the one completing Power; and man wondered the more at the symmetry of the

* Bishop Horsely, in his sermon on Matt. xvi. 18, takes a different view of the passage. He considers that St. Peter exclusively was the object of our Lord's discourse. He says that St. Peter's custody of the keys was "a temporary, not a perpetual authority. Its object was not individuals, but the whole human race. By virtue of this special commission the great Apostle applied the key, pushed back the bolt of the lock, and threw the gates of the city open for the admission of the whole Gentile world, in the instance of Cornelius and his family. To this, and to this only, our Lord prophetically alludes when he promises to St. Peter, the custody of the keys. . . . The gates of the kingdom of heaven are thrown open, and the successors of St. Peter in the See of Rome can give neither furtherance nor obstruction to the business."

We may here refer to another often-quoted text in order to show how little the early Fathers dreamed of the existence of any power over the Church conferred by Christ on St. Peter:—"Why," writes St. Cyril of Alexandria, on John xxi. 15-17, "why does he ask Simon only, though the other disciples are standing by? What can the words 'Feed my lambs,' and the like, signify? We say, then, that St. Peter had previously been appointed, with the other disciples, to the divine Apostleship, but when the plot of the Jews was effected, and he fell in some measure (for St. Peter being seized with great fear, thrice denied the Lord), he heals the disorder, and by questions elicits the triple confession, setting this against that, and fitting the restoration as a counterpoise to the fall." So also St. Jerome:—"Trinam negationem, trina confessione delevit."

† Nor can we omit here the memorable words of Gregory, in a letter to Anastatius, Bishop of Antioch, in which, after stating that this title of Universal Bishop was invented "by the first apostate," he adds, "not to speak of the injury done to your honour, if one bishop be called universal, the whole church comes to pieces if that one, being universal, falls."—Lib. vii. 27.

‡ De Unit. Eccl. and Ep. lv.

visible structure, when the keystone that crowned the arch was hidden beyond the clouds."*

The subversion of this divinely appointed polity was essential to the establishment of a monarchy in the Church on earth; and accordingly the depression of the episcopal order has for many centuries been the object of Papal ambition. With this view the monastic orders have invariably been supported against episcopal authority; with this design, the Bishops of Rome have not scrupled to base their claims on the "the False Decretals,"† as long as that shameless fraud was undetected; and when no Roman Catholic could any longer defend that forgery, with the same unswerving determination to establish their power, the Popes employed the Order of Jesuits to build up the breach; and by their arbitrary distinctions between orders and jurisdiction, the lost ground had been regained. It is now the orthodox doctrine among Romanists, that bishops are the successors of the apostles only as to orders, not as to jurisdiction; that the Pope's jurisdiction comes from Christ immediately, while any that is conceded to other bishops is derived from the Pope.

Brief as the statement is which we have given of some of the suggestions afforded both by Scripture and the history of the primitive Church against the Papal usurpation, we think we have fully established the wisdom as well as the truth of the decision of the English Convocation of 1534: "Quod Romanus episcopus non habet majorem jurisdictionem sibi et Deo collatam in hoc regno quam alius quisvis externus episcopus."

GOSPEL TRUTH, AND PRIMITIVE ECCLESIASTICAL ORDER.

SATURDAY, JUNE 16, 1849.

THE LATE REV. J. W. BROWN.

Although we published, without remarks, the notice of Mr. Brown's death in a distant land, our silence was not expressive of a want of deep interest in this affliction. We only awaited more particular information concerning the circumstances of his death.

As a fellow-student in the General Theological Seminary, Mr. B. by his kind manners and many excellent qualities, had secured our esteem. This regard for him was the general feeling of his fellow-students. Nor was our private friendship diminished, we are most happy now to say, by the fact, that as Editors we upheld opposite views upon subjects of much importance. Over the ashes of a brother and friend the remembrance of all such differences are forgotten. And it is well for those who have thus to differ, wisely to think how suddenly the grave may be made the end of controversy.

We have had the pleasure of conversing with a clergyman of the Church, who was much with Mr. Brown during the time immediately preceding the closing hours of life. While at home and in health they had been divided in sentiment. Sickness in a land of strangers united them as brothers. It was the privilege of this clergyman to minister much to his suffering brother, and to relieve the dreariness of a lonely bed of sickness. From him we learn the deep regret with which Mr. B. referred to the controversies in which he had taken part. In the expressive words of our informant, "it would have done you Editors good to have heard the dying man review his own editorial course. He said, all bitter feelings were at an end, and he had nothing but thoughts of love and peace for all men." With the greatest earnestness, and with a zeal much beyond his failing strength, he embraced all the privileges of the Church of his love, in that foreign land. He was constant in his attendance upon all her services, and expressed in glowing language the delight and comfort thus received. May the peace which thus filled the heart and mind of this dying brother, be poured more richly upon the living. And may the consolations which cheered his lonely death-bed, support his afflicted family in their desolation. We

* This passage is taken from an unpublished sermon of the lamented W. A. Butler. We are happy to be able to state that a volume of Mr. Butler's sermons and remains will shortly be published; and the distinguished ability, learning, and sound judgment of the editor—the Rev. Thomas Woodward, of Fethard—afford every guarantee that the work will be brought out as the author's friends could desire. We are authorised to make use of the following extract from a letter of the Bishop of Lichfield to a friend of Mr. Butler's, who had submitted to his lordship one of the sermons in question:—"I am much obliged to you for the opportunity which you have afforded me of again reading the very masterly sermon now returned by me. If the theological and literary remains of Mr. Butler contain much that is equal to, or even approaches in power and wisdom to that admirable sermon, I am sure that it will be greatly to be lamented if they are kept back from the public."

† "About the conclusion of the eighth century," writes Mr. Hallam, in the seventh chapter of his History of the Middle Ages, "there appeared, under the name of one Isidore, an unknown person, a collection of ecclesiastical canons, now commonly denominated the False Decretals. These purported to be rescripts or decrees of the early bishops of Rome; and their effect was to diminish the authority of metropolitans over their suffragans, by establishing an appellant jurisdiction of the Roman see in all cases, and by forbidding national councils to be held without its consent. The whole episcopal aristocracy had abundant reason to lament their acquiescence in a system of which the metropolitans were but the earliest victims."

rejoice that we can close this brief tribute with the following notice. Works like these, which bless the widow and the orphan, are better than words of most extravagant eulogy.

From the Protestant Churchman.

"The following appeal to the benevolent tells its own story, and we trust that it will meet with such a hearty response as will cheer the hearts of those who are at one blow deprived of a beloved and tender husband and parent, and left destitute of the means of support. Though from the inadequate compensation afforded to clergymen, they seldom, if ever, are enabled to provide for their families in case of death, yet in the good Providence of God the seed of the righteous are not seen to beg their bread. Friends are raised in the hour of need. May the family of our departed brother be thus protected, and this effort now being made to care for them meet with rich success:—

The friends of the Rev. J. W. Brown, in common with his attached parishioners, and the Church at large, have recently received the melancholy intelligence of his decease at Malta on the 9th April last.

In enfeebled health, at the earnest solicitation of his vestry, and with the approbation of his physician, all indulging the cherished hope that relaxation from duty would restore his wasted energies, he embarked for Europe in October last. In the first few months of alternate travel, and sojourn abroad, appearances were favorable, and his family and friends were cheered by the prospect of a happy re-union within the period proposed for his return. But these fond anticipations were doomed to disappointment. A letter, advising of the return of unfavorable symptoms, induced by a cold taken while travelling in Italy, was only the precursor of his rapid descent to the grave. Far away in the land of strangers now rest the mortal remains of our beloved friend and associate.

It is not the province of those from whom this emanates, to write the eulogy of the deceased—that duty will be performed by other and abler hands. But may it not be said with much emphasis, a faithful soldier of Christ has fallen in Israel? Will not the walls of Zion miss from their ramparts the zealous watchman who never slumbered at his post?

To all who knew our lamented friend in his connection with the Church and the religious world, it will only be necessary to call up, for their review, the self-sacrificing ardor with which he labored in her service. Health and strength, and everything but his firm trust in God, gave way, and yet, at the call of duty, his ready response was ever, here am I!

In this spirit he ever labored, nor did he retire from the field until the remonstrances of his friends, who were daily witnesses of his physical prostration, and a paramount duty to a beloved family, compelled its temporary abandonment.

And now while we bow in humble submission to the afflictive dispensation which removes him from us, and are pained at the thought that in the flesh we shall see no more the face of our departed brother, comes there not to us, from his dying couch, in that far distant land, an appeal, more eloquent than words can paint, in behalf of those whom this bereaving Providence has deprived of their earthly stay. What, in his lonely hours of depressing sickness, when thoughts of home and the loved ones he had left behind, would crowd upon his mind, could have sustained him but a firm trust that the gracious God whom he had served would raise up friends in their hour of need? Be it our privilege to assume this sacred trust. Recognizing the views here taken, and doubting not that the Church at large will feel a lively interest in the object, it is proposed to raise a fund of $10,000, the interest of which is to be applied to the maintenance of the family and education of the children of the late Rev. JOHN W. BROWN.

Messrs. Robert M. Blackwell, Edward J. Woolsey and John Schenck have been appointed trustees, and the undersigned a Committee to solicit subscriptions.

JOHN C. JACKSON,

JOHN B. REBOUL.

Astoria, May 28th, 1849.

A subscription list will be found at the Office of the Protestant Churchman. It affords the Committee great pleasure to state that upwards of $3000 have already been subscribed by the congregation of St. George's church, Astoria, and other benevolent individuals resident at Astoria and its vicinity."

BISHOP ELECT OF MISSISSIPPI.

We have been waiting for some kind friend to furnish us with an account of the late Convention. The result is most gratifying. We hear but one expression of satisfaction regarding the wise and judicious choice made by the Convention of Mississippi. We copy the following from the New York Churchman:—

"MISSISSIPPI.—We have received at a late hour a letter from an esteemed brother, a member of the Convention, which met at Trinity church, Natchez, on Thursday, May 17.—Ascension Day.

The Rt. Rev. Bishop Otey presided.

The Rev. William M. Green, D.D., Professor in the University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill, was unanimously elected Bishop of the Diocese of Mississippi. This is an excellent appointment as we hear on all hands, and we may congratulate the Diocese and the Church at large on such an accession to the Episcopate."

DEATH OF MISS EDGEWORTH.

How many hearts, of young and old, will be saddened by this announcement. Few writers had a stronger hold upon the affections of the best class of readers than Maria Edgeworth. This generation needs not to be told of her praise, and her name will outlive many generations yet to come. She died after a few hours' illness, on Monday, May 21st, at Edgeworthstown, in the county of Longford, Ireland. She was in her 83d year.

CHURCH AT GLOUCESTER, NEW JERSEY.

As the consecration of this church occurred at the time of the Pennsylvania Convention, we were prevented from being present and giving a description of it. The edifice reflects great credit upon those engaged in its erection. It is a substantial stone building, of the Gothic order, and the interior is in very good taste. It is but a short time ago that the services of the Church were first held in this place, and it is most gratifying to see a building like this so soon completed. We are happy to understand that the building itself is entirely paid for. This spirited congregation are now endeavoring to raise the money to pay for a new organ. To induce the friends of this laudable object to come and see the church, and give their aid in its behalf, we understand a gentleman in the vicinity has given them a bountiful supply of strawberries, wherewith to treat the liberal. These will be ready on Wednesday afternoon next, after 3 o'clock. The place will be advertised on board the Gloucester Point Ferry Boats, which run every half hour from Walnut and Almond streets.

THE EMIGRANT AND AMERICAN CITIZEN.

We have been favored with a specimen number of a paper bearing this title. The object of this weekly publication is to convey useful and interesting information to emigrants. Having a good opportunity of knowing the evils suffered by this large class, from their own lack of information, and the superior knowledge of those who prey upon their ignorance, we are disposed to favor every effort which may tend to improve their condition. This paper makes fair promises, and we doubt not, honest ones in this behalf. It will be afforded at the price of $2 per year. It will not be published unless a sufficient number of subscribers are obtained to secure the proprietor against loss. Apply at the Emigrant Office, 99 South Front St., Philadelphia.

From late English Papers.

THE SCOTCH CHURCH.—In the House of Lords, last night, Lord BROUGHAM presented a petition from a body of the Episcopalian Church of Scotland, praying that all clergymen of the Church of England and Ireland, on being appointed to chapels in Scotland, might be inducted to the charge of their congregations by the Archbishop of Canterbury, or some other English Bishop; and that there might be periodical visitations in Scotland by the Bishops of the Established Church; and, finally, that the petitioners might be placed upon such a footing as would give them the advantages of the discipline of their own Church.

This led to a debate in which Lord Brougham and the Bishop of Exeter took the principal part. The ex-chancellor made rather an amusing exhibition of his vanity and ignorance.

We were deeply interested in reading the account of the following meeting. It shows that the higher orders in England are not unmindful of the claims of the lower classes.

SERVANTS' PROVIDENT AND BENEVOLENT SOCIETY.—A public meeting was held on Wednesday, the 16th, in Hanover-square Rooms, to advocate the interests of this Society, which has recently been established under the auspices of the Queen, the Queen Dowager, Prince Albert, &c., and whose objects are—to enable servants to secure annuities for themselves in old age on Government security; endowments for their children at fourteen or twenty-one years of age; a sum of money at death to cover the expense of burial; a home for female servants out of place; a model lodging for male servants; and a registry for servants.

The meeting was of the most brilliant description: there could not be fewer than 1,500 persons assembled in the spacious hall—the great majority females—and the following distinguished persons appeared on the platform:—His Royal Highness Prince Albert, His Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury, Lords Bishops of London, Oxford, Salisbury, Exeter, and Norwich; Archdeacons Manning and Wilberforce; Lord J. Russell; Earls of Effingham and Nelson; Marquis of Westminster; Lords Ashley and Adair; Viscounts Fielding and Campden, M. Guizot, General Ewart, Colonel Buckley, Captain Sir F. Mansell, Sir Walter Stirling, Sir Thomas Dyke Acland, Bart., Sir P. P. Acland, Bart., Sir James Colquhoun, Captain the Hon. F. Layard, Dr. Chambers, Dr. Mackintyre, Hugh H. Lindsey, M. P., Majors de Winton and Campbell, Revds. Sir H. Dukinfield, J. Jackson, H. Howorth, R. Burgess, J. S. Brown, D. Vaughan, D. Butler, C. Banatyne, J. H. Hamilton, E. Hawkins, R. Harvey, T. Bowdler, H. Murray.

His Royal Highness Prince Albert, attended by the Archbishop of Canterbury, Lord John Russell, &c., entered the room punctually at three o'clock, amidst the enthusiastic cheers of the meeting.

His Royal Highness having taken the chair, proceeded to address the meeting. He said—Ladies and gentlemen,—the object for which we have met here to-day is not one of charity, but is one of friendly assistance and advice to a very large and important class of our fellow-countrymen—the domestic servants of this country. Who does not feel the deepest interest in the welfare of domestic servants—whose heart does not feel sympathy for those who minister to us in all the wants of daily life—who attend us in sickness, who receive us on our first appearance in the world, and who extend their care even to our mortal remains (hear, hear)—who live under our roofs—who form our household, and a part of our family? And yet, on inquiry, we find that in this metropolis the greater part of the inmates of our workhouses are domestic servants (hear, hear.) I am sure this startling fact is no proof either of a want of liberality and kindness on the part of masters to their servants, or of vice in the latter. But it is the natural consequence of the peculiar position in which domestic servants are placed. During considerable periods in their lives they share in all the luxuries of their opulent masters; at other periods they have not the means even of earning sufficient to sustain them from day to day. It is the consideration of these peculiar vicissitudes which makes it the duty both of masters and servants to try to discover and agree upon some plan by which domestic servants may be carried through life safe from the temptations of a prosperous and from the sufferings of an evil day (cheers.) On that account I rejoice in this meeting (loud cheers,) and I gladly consented to take the chair at it (continued cheering) to assist the objects of the Servants' Provident and Benevolent Society. Ladies and gentlemen, I feel convinced that this Society is based upon a right principle, as it follows the dictates of a correct appreciation of human nature, which requires every one, by his own exertions, to work out his own happiness (cheers,) which prevents us from valuing, nay, from feeling satisfied, with a prosperity which others have made for us. It is based upon a right principle, because it endeavors to trace out a plan according to which, by previous self-denial, providence, and perseverance, not only is the servant raised in his physical and moral condition, but the master is taught how to direct his efforts so as to aid his servants in acquiring resources which shall be sufficient to sustain them in sickness, old age, and in want of employment (cheers.) It is based upon a right principle, because it does not hold out a temptation to servants, either by the prospect of possible extravagant advantages which would tend to transform their providence into a species of gambling, or by convivial meetings, which would lead them to ulterior expense, or by a system of balloting for a few prizes which would draw them into all the waste of time and excitement of electioneering contests (cheers.)

Resolutions were introduced and seconded by Lord John Russell, the Bishop of Oxford, Lord Ashley, Archdeacon Manning, the Bishop of London, Sir T. D. Acland, the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Marquis of Westminster.

INTERESTING CEREMONY.

On Monday evening, in the Sunday School room of Trinity Church, Southwark, the teachers and pupils of the female department presented to their superintendent, Miss Ann Cowpland, a rich and beautiful silver pitcher. After the usual services, in which the teachers were addressed by the Rev. F. Ogilby, the Rector in behalf of the donors made the presentation accompanied by some pointed and affecting remarks.

Peter Williamson, Esq., received the beautiful gift, in behalf of Miss Cowpland, and expressed in a just and fitting manner her gratitude and pleasure in accepting this testimonial. The inscription upon it states the interesting circumstances under which this gift is made. It is the memorial of TWENTY-SIX YEARS devoted labour in the office of superintendent. A period of such faithfulness richly deserves to be thus commemorated, and the gift speaks well both for the donors and the recipient.

CHURCH OF THE REDEMPTION, FAIRMOUNT.

We hope the following brief and earnest appeal may be responded to in a liberal manner.

Mr. Editor:—It will be recollected by your readers that some months since the Rector of this mission made an appeal to the friends of the Church for $1400 to relieve his parish from embarrassment, and enhance its usefulness. About $1200 of this amount is pledged, the greater part payable when the whole amount is subscribed. As this church is increasing in importance and usefulness, will not a few generous hearted individuals make up the remainder, and place the church, (as it should be) free from debt?

GEO. A. DURBOROW, Rector.

New Publications.

We have received the PASTORAL LETTER OF BISHOP COBBES to the clergy and laity of the diocese of Alabama, too late for insertion this week. We will publish it in our next number.

We have also received the two first numbers of the republication of Dean Boys's OFFICIAL CALENDAR OF THE CHURCH, with addenda, by a presbyter of Ohio. Also from LEA & BLANCHARD, in a very handsome and well printed volume, with maps and numerous illustrations, A NARRATIVE OF THE UNITED STATES EXPEDITION TO THE RIVER JORDAN AND THE DEAD SEA, by W. F. LYNCH, U. S. N., Commander of the Expedition. Also, through G. S. APPLETON, SACRED RHETORIC, or Composition and delivery of Sermons, by Henry P. Ripley, Professor of Sacred Rhetoric and Pastoral duties in the Newton Theological Institution, to which are added, Hints on Extemporaneous Preaching, by Henry Ware, Jr., D. D. Published by Gould, Kendall & Lincoln, 59 Washington street. Also, through G. S. Appleton, from STANFORD & SWORDS, New York, THE DOUBLE WITNESS OF THE CHURCH, by the REV. WM. INGRAHAM KIP, D. D. Fourth edition, and FACTS IN A CLERGYMAN'S LIFE: by the REV. CHARLES TAYLER, M. A.

The above works require more than a passing notice. A crowd of matter compels us to reserve, for another week, a more extended account of them.

We copy with pleasure, the following statement from the Missionary.

A BRIEF NARRATIVE.

The undersigned was elected Bishop of New Jersey, on the 3d day of October, 1832; being then Rector of Trinity Church, in the city of Boston. He had no knowledge that it was intended to use his name, in that connection; the first intimation on the subject, being the arrival of the committee, sent to announce to him the result. In the matter of support, the committee stated that nothing had been done by the Convention; but that it was understood that it should receive attention at the next session.* Accustomed to leave the guiding of his ways to Almighty God, regarding the solemn act of the Convention, as done under His direction, and urged to acquiesce in it by those of the Bishops on whom he had habitually relied for counsel, he consented; and was consecrated, on the 31st day of October, 1832. In the summer of 1833, being then at lodgings in the city of Burlington, but on the point of establishing himself permanently in the city of Newark, on strong representations of advantage to the Church, from such an arrangement, the venerable Dr. Wharton died; and, at the urgent solicitation of the Vestry and Parishioners, he accepted the rectorship, thus vacated. The salary offered was $440 per annum, with the Parsonage; increased afterwards to $700. During the whole period of his rectorship, an average of more than one half of this sum has been paid for the services of others; rendered necessary by his occupation with the duties of the diocese. From the diocese itself, his annual receipts, to 1 June last, including travelling expenses and postage, have averaged $241. These two have been his only sources of official income; and, together, have not exceeded $500 per annum.

At the date of the consecration of the undersigned, the Church in the diocese of New Jersey was in a most feeble and depressed condition. As an illustration of it, the whole amount of the Missionary Collections, from all the parishes, reported at the Convention of 1833, was $121 05½. It was obvious, that, to revive the work of the Lord, and have more than a name to live, something was called for, beyond the slow and distant hope of parochial improvement. A rally of churchmen was needed, on church principles, for the work of the Church. The natural reliance, with God's blessing, must be on Christian Education; and the plan of a Diocesan School for boys was proposed, at a very early day. While this was in contemplation, the proprietor of a long established Female Seminary, in the city of Burlington, desiring to retire from its charge, proposed to the undersigned, to purchase the establishment, as a Church School for Girls. This was in 1836. On consultation with judicious friends, here and elsewhere, who advised the enterprise, and offered their aid in carrying it into effect, it was undertaken. And "St. Mary's Hall, for Female Education on Church Principles," was opened on the first day of May, 1837. The announcement was received with acclamation, throughout the Church. But who does not remember the waves and billows which, that season overran the land? What strongest house, what most established institution, which, at that time, was not shaken? The wrecks still lie along the shore. Its first effect upon the undersigned, was to arrest the subscription to a loan of $25,000, towards an endowment, before two thirds of it had been obtained; and leave him to supply the deficiency, as he best could. Its further effect was to keep down the patronage of the institution, for several years, to a point, far below the cost of maintenance. Nevertheless, it did not stop. And, at one time, when there were but twenty-six pupils, more than one quarter of them were free; being orphans, or children of poverty. To go on, at such a rate, of course, involved a debt. The undersigned had faith in God: and merging in the work his whole resources and his credit, it went on. As prosperity returned to the country, patronage flowed in upon St. Mary's Hall. And, then, success became embarrassing. Buildings were to be erected, and fixtures and furniture were to be supplied: and, to do this, there was no resource but current income, or pledge of credit. Of course, the debt increased. To provide for it paper must be used. To be procured it must be paid for. And, then, in a majority of cases, its discount must be had, at extra cost. A perfect confidence, that continued success would ensure ultimate relief, encouraged exertion; and made trials tolerable for the work's sake, which no personal interest would have sustained one week.

The acceptance of the Christian School for Girls created a demand for a Christian School for Boys. People said, "Why not provide for our sons, as well as for our daughters?" There was waste water, that might help to turn another mill. In 1845, special circumstances seemed to indicate, that the time had come for such an undertaking. A movement was then made, for a school, for boys, such as St. Mary's Hall already was, for girls. The proposition met with signal favour. It was at once said, "Why not make it a College! The time is propitious. At any rate, procure a charter; and use it, when you are ready?" A charter was procured. A site was purchased. The pressure of patronage forced on the work, beyond its time. So that, at the end of two years, the Catalogue enrolled an hundred and twenty-seven students. There was no endowment. There was no monied patronage. Every thing was to be done; and nothing to do it with. Every thing was done; and done with nothing. For what was a subscription of $8000, towards the grounds, the buildings, the fixtures, the furniture, the apparatus—the entire provision, religious, scholastic and domestic—for an hundred and twenty-seven children, and the whole staff of teachers? Nevertheless the provision has been made, and the children have been collected; and there they are. The examination, just closed, has secured, as it deserved, the highest approbation. And he, who, with God's blessing, has accomplished these things, after two most dangerous attacks of illness, which confined him for nearly five months, having exhausted, in his enterprise for Christian education, his means and his credit, is left with two most successful Institutions, whose annual receipts are not less than $70,000; and, with an unmanageable debt.

* This understanding was acted on. At the Convention in 1833, measures were commenced for increasing the provision for the support of the Episcopate. The amount of the Fund, at present, is $8951 17.

When the undersigned first owned the mercy of Almighty God, in turning back his face and feet from towards the grave, his instinctive impulse was, to provide for the reduction of this indebtedness. It was well established, that, if the two Institutions were subjected to nothing more than their proper expenditure—freed, that is to say, from the disadvantages of a credit system of business, and of an extravagant outlay for the maintenance of credit—a very large percentage of their receipts, after paying the whole cost of carrying them on, might be applied to that object. He therefore invited three of his friends to accept the transfer of his whole interest in both, numbering together, two hundred and eighty-seven pupils, in trust, to secure their most effective and economical administration; and, then, to distribute the surplus receipts, from time to time, among the creditors of both; he himself devoting himself, as heretofore, and more, to their continuance and success; and waiving all claim for consideration or compensation, till every form of indebtedness should be extinguished. At two large meetings of the persons chiefly interested, this proposition was approved, and its prosecution earnestly recommended. Ultimately, however, it was frustrated, by the refusal of two or three to sign the necessary agreement; not because they did not desire that it should be carried into effect and believe that it might be done successfully; but, from expectations unreasonably entertained, of relief, from other quarters. At a council of his friends, called to consider what should be done, in this state of affairs, the undersigned was unanimously advised to make an assignment of all his property, for the benefit of all his creditors; and to arrange for the carrying on of the Institutions, under his own conduct and supervision, but on the financial responsibility and business direction of others, as before proposed. This has been done. The undersigned gives up his property, of every form; to meet, so far as it may, a debt, not personal to himself—his private income being more than equal to his private expenditure—but growing out of his venture for Christian Education, in the two Institutions, above named; and only desires the time and opportunity, to meet and pay the whole amount of debt, in principal and interest. Nothing daunted or discouraged, by any thing which has occurred, he renews the devotion of the strength, now graciously restored to him, to the same sacred cause. So far from being daunted or discouraged, he considers that the foundation of his great work is now first made sure; and he firmly believes that, with the continuance of the heavenly favour, heretofore vouchsafed, every form of embarrassment, in a very few years, will be removed; and two great Institutions remain, to be perpetual blessings to the country and the Church.

It is now more than sixteen years, since the undersigned left home and friends, for service in a poor and feeble diocese. He has given himself unreservedly to the work. The Lord hath blessed it, in his hands. The fourteen clergymen, who were present at his election, have been more than four times multiplied. The little Church, of which he took the pastoral care, has increased its capacity fourfold; and is yet too small. A noble structure is far advanced towards completion: the portion which is done, paid for; and the property of the parish equal in value to three or four times the amount required to finish it. Thirty-three Churches have been built, and ten repaired and improved. Ten parsonages have been added. Thirty-five deacons have been ordained, and thirty-three priests. Three thousand one hundred and seventy persons have been confirmed. These results are chiefly due, through God's blessing, to the confidence and influence which the two Institutions have created. And they have but begun their work. But they are well established. They are most extensively and favourably known. Pupils, from the elder of them, are dispersed through the whole land: every where, as samples and commendations of the Church work here. There is thus a patronage, actual and potential, which gives a guaranty for their continued and increased success: and which warrants the confident belief, that a very few years of the administration now proposed, will extinguish the whole indebtedness, not fully represented by property.

The undersigned submits this simple statement to those whom it may concern. All that it presents, of the past and of the present, is real and actual. Of the conclusions which it warrants for the future, he may not judge for others. In his own judgment, it is filled with a hope, which needs but time, with God, to be triumphant certainty. He asks for nothing, but the opportunity, to make the perfect demonstration. Hitherto the Lord hath helped him; and He will hereafter. The work is His. It is only to be patient, and to wait. He will vindicate it, in His time; and graciously redeem His promise, that not even a cup of cold water shall be vainly given to one of His "little ones."

GEORGE W. DOANE.

Riverside, 29 March, 1849.

* The foregoing narrative was prepared, as its date shows, before the close of the last term, and shown to several friends. Since that time, the new term has opened, with 143 girls, at St. Mary's Hall, and 123 boys at Burlington College. Others are yet to come in. The business department, at the Hall, is under the direction of Judge Ogden, and Messrs. Garthwaite and Condit; and at the College, of Judge Ogden, and Messrs. Garthwaite and Field. Robert B. Aertsen is the fiscal agent for both Institutions. Both are under the conduct and supervision of the undersigned; who takes a much larger share in the course of instruction than his duties permitted heretofore.

ACKNOWLEDGMENT.—The editor of the Banner has received and handed to the treasurer five dollars for the Bishop White Prayer Book Society, from a subscriber at Brooklyn.

Why should I cause uneasiness to others by reasoning or reproaches, however just, unless it be for their spiritual good; and when it can have no other effect but to inflame their passions, provoke their ill-will, and disturb the frame of my own mind.

ANNUAL MEETING.—The annual meeting of the Board of Missions will be held on Wednesday, the 20th inst., in St. Bartholomew's Church.

The Rt. Rev. the Bishop of New Hampshire will preach the annual sermon on the first morning of its session, on which occasion also, the Holy Communion will be administered. On the second evening a public Missionary Meeting will be held under the direction of the Senior Bishop present, assisted by the Secretary of the Board, and the Secretaries of the Committees. Due notice will be given of the hour, place, and other particulars.

JUSTICE.

The Banner of the Cross was lately accused of "trifling with issues of deeper seriousness," and said to be in "the position of a harlequin, intruding upon the scenes of a tragedy," because of the manner in which it treated the question, thrust upon the Church by the Calendar. The Episcopal Recorder was pleased to copy in full this charge of the Calendar, without a line of explanation, although its injustice had been shown in our columns.

We have now to express our deep gratitude to the last named paper, for showing us in the following article the manner of expressing this deeper seriousness, and also for giving us clearer views of the seriousness of the matter which requires such tragic gravity.

The issue of "deeper seriousness" now is, "who killed the bear?" The glory of the achievement lies between "Jonathan Brooks and his wife Betsy!" The odds, we must admit, are in favour of Betsy. But it seems by the introduction to this tragic story that there is a question of antecedent "seriousness" to be settled, viz.—who first saw the bear, or as the animal was originally called, the wolf? Had we fully apprehended the grave nature of the questions involved we should have been more careful in maintaining a proper degree of seriousness. We admit that we did feel that this kind of thunder belonged so exclusively to one class of papers in the Church, that it was hardly honest for another class to appropriate it.

We must sympathize with the feelings expressed by injured "justice" in the paragraph beginning, "it is amusing or rather we may almost say it is provoking, to hear the Calendar boasting," &c. However we will let our serious friend express his sense of wrong in his own way. We extract the article word for word, from last week's Recorder.

THE CALENDAR.

The recent course of the Calendar, in exposing Romanizing tendencies in certain quarters, and in rebuking those tendencies, has gratified and cheered many in the Church who have regarded these legitimate fruits of the Tractarian movement with sorrow and alarm. It is indeed gratifying and cheering that a voice of admonition and warning on this subject should come from the diocese of Connecticut, and from such a paper as the Calendar; for that diocese and that paper have been regarded as deprecating any agitation of the questions which for several years past have been disturbing the peace of the Church. The Calendar has not in times past condemned or discountenanced Tractarianism. It has, on the contrary, encouraged the Oxford movement, until it saw the fruits of the system, and then it raised the cry of alarm, and warned the Church of its danger.

It is amusing, or rather, we may almost say, provoking, to hear the Calendar boasting of its recent fidelity and boldness in bringing to light the New York Romanizers, as though its warning voice were the only one that is or has been heard on this momentous subject. In years past those of our Church papers that foresaw the natural tendencies of the Tractarian system, and spoke out fearlessly concerning them, were considered, by such men as are now speaking in the columns of the Calendar, as alarmists, and disturbers of the peace and quiet of the Church. They were condemned as party papers, and in not a few instances efforts were made to discourage and prevent their circulation. But now, because Connecticut has one eye open to the dangers of the Church, and because the Editor of the Calendar has said what he ought to have said long ago, he seems to feel that the Church at large is indebted to him for its salvation from Romanism!

Let us be thankful that Connecticut has spoken, even at the eleventh hour; but at the same time it is proper that those who have borne the burden and heat of the day should have their due. It cannot be doubted that the faithful labourers in the editorial corps who have long been at work in this field, will be willing that their brother of the Calendar should have a reward equal to their own; but others may demur, when they see the proud boasting of one who comes in at so late a period to the help of the Lord against the mighty.

It may seem like trifling with serious things to relate the following anecdote; but it illustrates so well what we have been saying of the Calendar, that we cannot withhold it in this connection:—"Jonathan Brooks and his wife Betsy were quietly seated in their log cabin, when the door was unceremoniously opened by a huge bear. The courageous Jonathan no sooner saw the sable monster approaching, than by a marvellous feat of agility he was safely perched upon one of the beams above, where he sat trembling with fear. Betsy, not being quite as agile as her protector, and being made, moreover, of better materials, immediately looked about for a weapon of defence to receive Mr. Bruin. Nothing but a shovel was at hand. This she seized; and as the enemy advanced she gave him a blow on the side of the head which made him a little doubtful as to the final issue. She then gave him another on the other side; and then, as he was rubbing the wounds with his huge paws, she aimed a blow with the edge of her weapon at the top of his head, which had the effect of laying open a considerable portion of the interior of the cranium, and brought his majesty to the floor.

"Jonathan's courage had somewhat risen by the reception his better half had given their unwelcome visitor; and when he saw she had the advantage in the contest, he cried out, 'That's right, Betsy, that's right, give him another, hit him once more, and he won't come again!' With that he ventured down, the bear lying on the floor almost dead, and seizing a butcher knife, he gave him a stab which settled the business.

"Jonathan immediately put on his best coat and hat, and sallied forth to the village, and when he got to the post office, where the idlers had assembled, he thrust his hands and arms up to the elbows in his pockets, and strutting around with consequential air, muttered in a low tone, 'great business! biggest one I ever did see! such tushes! what claws he had!'

"The bystanders, hearing these expressions, inquired what the matter was. 'Matter?' said Jonathan, 'why a bear up to our house; he walked right into the room where me and Betsy were sitting.' 'Why, why, what did you do?' asked the eager crowd. 'Why we killed him, to be sure,' said Jonathan; 'me and Betsy killed him, yes, me and Betsy, we killed the bear.'

JUSTICE.

We feel constrained to add a friendly word of caution. In the first place, before the parties begin to contend for the palm of victory in this bear-bait, they should be sure that the bear is dead. Suppose Jonathan and Betsy had put down their "knife" and "shovel" to dispute about "who killed the bear," when Bruin was only a little stunned and not killed entirely?

Again, before these champions go "strutting around with a consequential air," muttering "great business!" &c., they ought to have some proof positive to show that there was an actual "bear up to our house." Suppose "the idlers" had returned with Jonathan and found he had been unable to show any carcass, or even one of "the claws" or "tushes," what would have become of the victors' glory? Would they have been satisfied with the united assertions, both of Jonathan and Betsy, that they had in their possession "satisfactory proofs" that there had been a bear "the biggest one I ever did see."

Altogether, we must say, this bear story is the severest thing which has been written against those who have sought distinction in this war against "Romanizing."

And the paltry dispute which is thus set forth as one of its "issues" belittles this small affair and reduces this "tragedy" to a very shallow "seriousness."

A PRAYER.

Grant me, Great Lord, thy Graces three,
Faith, and Hope, and Charity;
Faith that on the Cross relies,
And trusts but in thy sacrifice;
Hope that, when by woe oppress'd,
Points upward to a Heavenly rest;
And last, the greatest of the three,
O! give me gentle Charity;
To suffer all, to know no pride,
To strive another's fault to hide;
To answer with a soothing smile
When men with angry words revile;
To envy not that happiness
Thy hand denies me to possess;
The rich man's wealth to covet not,
Though poverty should be my lot.
Teach me, through every earthly ill,
To be submissive to thy will;
And let me too thy Grace receive,
As I my enemies forgive.
Then Faith, and Hope, and Charity
Will lead me on to Heaven through thee.

A PARALLEL WITH EXPLANATIONS.

We copy from an old number of the Christian Advocate and Journal, the paper published for the Methodist Episcopal Church, the following remarks. In order to understand them it will be necessary to bear in mind, the separation which has occurred in that body. It now exists in two divisions, the one of which bears the name formerly borne by the whole body, "The Methodist Episcopal Church;" the other is denominated "The Methodist Episcopal Church, South."

"We call ourselves, 'The Methodist Episcopal Church,' and this we think is right. If this implies that 'the Methodist Episcopal Church, South' is a secession, who can help it? If it is an unwelcome conclusion to our Southern brethren, still the misfortune is in their position, and not in the logic from the inference. We do not say they are not a Church, but we do say they are not the Methodist Episcopal Church, nor any part of that Church."

We have thought that this extract, embodying the defence of an original society, might help to a clear comprehension of the churchman's defence of the original society. He believes that "there is one body," Eph. iv. 4, which is the Church, Eph. i. 22, 23; that God hath set apostles in it—set them first, 1 Cor. xii. 28, and put it under their care and government, even unto the end of the world, Matt. xxviii. 20; that bishops de-living their authority in uninterrupted succession from the first Apostles, though those who were bishops before them, are the only lawful governors of the original, perpetuated, divine society, and that only those societies in the world, at this day, which are under the care of such bishops, have any valid claims to be regarded as part of the one church. All this he thinks is evident from Holy Scripture, and ancient authors. His reasoning then will be analogous to that of the extract. "We call ourselves, meaning the ten-twelfths of all those who profess and call themselves christians, the proportion of christendom, which, at this day recognizes, and is subject to the authority of such bishops as we have described, we call ourselves 'The Church of the Living God,' and this we think our right. If this implies that the various religious denominations are secessions, who can help it? If it is an unwelcome conclusion to our brethren of those denominations, still the misfortune is in their position, and not in the logic of the inference. We do not say that they are not churches. We admit they are what they call themselves, Presbyterian, Methodist, Baptist, Lutheran Churches; but we only say they are not the one body or Church of Christ, nor any part of that Church."

The individual members of those churches may be serious minded, devout, exemplary persons; all of them who have been baptized are members of the one body, though not in communion with it, but as organizations. As societies, they neither are the one body, nor parts of it.

The author of the extract, probably would say, when we maintain that the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, is not the Methodist Episcopal Church, nor any part of it, we do not mean to intimate that union with the Methodist Episcopal Church is an indispensable condition of salvation, whereas when the churchman says that "the other denominations" are not the one body nor parts of it, he means that where the gospel is proclaimed, communion with the church, by the participation of its ordinances, at the hands of the duly authorized ministry, is an indispensable condition of salvation. True, we do mean to say so. We distinctly, and we trust with a clear perception of our responsibility in penning the assertion, repeat it, that "where the gospel is proclaimed, communion with the church, by the participation of its ordinances, at the hand of the duly authorized ministry or priesthood, is one indispensable condition of salvation." And we believe the position to be made good by these inspired declarations, "He that believeth and is baptized, i. e. receives the sacrament of admission into the one body, shall be saved," Mark xvi. 16. "And the Lord added to the church daily such as should be saved," Acts ii. 47. But in justice to the truth, in justice to us, who for conscience towards God, feel bound to maintain it, let not the declaration we have made be construed to mean "all out of the one body, all not under the care and government of lawful bishops, will be cast away."

The two propositions are not identical, the latter is not a necessary inference from the former. We have used the expression, "an indispensable condition of salvation," let the bishops now dead, from whom it has been derived, explain it.

A condition of salvation may be considered as indispensable, either with respect to God, who imposes the condition, or with respect to MAN, on whom the condition is imposed. There are certain conditions of salvation, which the Almighty Himself will not dispense with. He will not, for instance, dispense with holiness—for, "without holiness, no man shall see the Lord." There are other conditions of salvation, in regard to which, though man does not possess the right of dispensation, we may be assured, that in certain cases, a merciful and sovereign God will exercise this right. Of this description are all the positive institutions of religion; among which are the church, its ministry, and its ordinances. When, therefore, communion with the church, through its duly authorized ministry, is ranked as an indispensable condition of salvation, the meaning is that MAN has no authority to dispense with this condition to fulfil it or not, as he pleases." We call it an indispensable condition of salvation, not because God will not, but because MAN may not dispense with it.

The question naturally arises, in what case may we hope God will exercise this dispensing power, that He will excuse separation from the divinely authorized ministry, from the one body which it serves? To this question, the bishop already quoted, furnishes the reply. "Separation from this priesthood, is in my judgment excusable whenever it proceeds from involuntary and unavoidable ignorance or error." "Unavoidable error" can only be committed where there is no access to the means of instruction. But "involuntary error" may be committed even where instruction sheds the full blaze of light. They fall within the exception of unavoidable error, who have not access to the means of information. And they fall within the exception of involuntary error, who, possessing the means of investigating truth, do not neglect these means, nor wilfully resist the light of conviction.

In my judgment, THEY are excusable for rejecting the authorized ministry of the church, who either do not possess the means of information, or are prevented from availing themselves of these means—for their ignorance is unavoidable and involuntary: THEY are not excusable, who, neither neglecting the means of information, nor wilfully resisting the light of conviction, remain still in error—for their error is involuntary, is neither negligent nor wilful, and must be referred to that power of prejudice, to that force of early prepossessions, or to some of those inscrutable causes, which, we know, often blind the understanding, and pervert the judgments of some of the greatest and best of men. In admitting that involuntary error absolves from guilt, I have prepared a broad shield of charity, which will cover all the sincere inquirers after truth. Involuntary error arises from mistaken judgment, and leaves the heart sincerely desirous to embrace the truth. It is, therefore, compatible with the most sincere attachment to truth, and the most diligent investigation of it. Most eloquently does the bishop add—"When the humiliating conviction of the weakness of the human mind, and the power of prejudice, overwhelms me with doubt and apprehension, the firm persuasion that my merciful Judge will not impute involuntary error to me as a crime, is my hope and solace. The contrary supposition, revolting to every principle of justice, is instantly repelled by every view which reason or Scripture affords us, of the goodness, mercy and justice of that Almighty Being, who "knoweth whereof we are made, and remembereth that we are but dust." "He is not a hard master, reaping where He has not sown, and gathering where He has not strewed." "And where a man has a willing mind, it is accepted according to what he hath, and not according to what he hath not."

The churchman, then, while as that charity requires which rejoiceth in the truth, he must ever contend earnestly for these views, which he regards as part of the faith once delivered to the saints, judges nothing before the time, but refers to the just judgment of the Omniscient God, who only can infallibly decide such a point, and whose prerogative it is to do so, what cases of error, in the matter in question, are cases of unavoidable and involuntary error. Only he would say earnestly, and in the spirit of love, to all who are not in the one body, not subject to the divinely authorized ministry, what the church continually says to him and all her children, "Judge yourselves, brethren, that ye be not judged of the Lord." N.

THE ANNIVERSARIES.

We were almost tempted to give a review of the doings and sayings of the remarkable period, known as the Anniversary week. We have only been withheld by our unwillingness to expose to the ridicule, which truth demanded, any who profess and call themselves Christians. We cannot, however, refuse a place for the following correspondent.

The following is extracted from an Editorial, headed "Anniversaries," in a late Number of "The Southern Presbyterian," published in Milledgeville, Geo., the Rev. Washington Baird, Editor.

After a few introductory remarks, the article proceeds as follows:—

"To our mind, the time has come when the Christian public should look well to this business. Are those public displays necessary?—those morbid excitements upon the whole beneficial? That societies should make their reports to the churches and to the Christian public which sustains them, is freely admitted. But if "Anniversary Week" is hereafter to be such a season as it has latterly been; if it is to be the signal for the raking together of all sorts of material for all sorts of purposes; if any sort of man, woman or hag may intrude upon the whole world every sort of wordy disorgament; if those occasions are to be seized upon for effecting, for offensive and injurious purposes, what could not otherwise be at all accomplished—the worst putting themselves upon the same footing and giving themselves the same prominence with the best—we have no hesitation in saying that the sooner it is stricken from the calendar the better.

"It is a lamentable fact also that during these exciting seasons, even good men, in hitting off hand—and every man must make a hit at the state of things—are carried into great extravagances, forget the courtesies due to their fellow-men, and, whether intentionally or not, grossly insult at times those with whom, for the most benevolent ends, they are associated. Of this we have a most striking example at the anniversary of the American Tract Society, and in no less a man than Dr. Tyng. The correspondent of the Christian Observer informs us that Bishop Meade, of Virginia, was one of the speakers at that meeting, and the audience were congratulated by Dr. Tyng that a genuine Bishop of the true Apostolic stamp, had honored them with his presence, &c. &c.!! Now when it is recollected that this is not only an American Tract Society, and that several different denominations, without distinction and with equal cordiality, are united in it; but that none of them, as he very well knows, for a moment admit the arrogant assumptions of his sect; that this, above all others, was an occasion on which all that is sectarian should be laid aside, and the most cordial christian love should abound—when all this is called to mind, every reader will agree with us that it was an indignity which was not to have been expected from from any man claiming to be a gentleman—much less from Dr. Tyng, who has hitherto let few such opportunities pass of professing great liberality! It is doubtless well, however, for the Christian public that the Doctor has allowed for once his real sentiments to come out—has in a word informed all the other denominations that he does not consider their bishops genuine, or their churches Apostolic. For two reasons it is well. They will no longer be deceived by professions of liberality from that quarter. It proves also what we have long maintained, that a full embrace of the doctrine of the Apostolic succession not only lays in these respects, the exercise of common sense under embargo, but it wholly excludes all fraternal feelings towards those not regarded as in their line. As it was in ancient times, "We have Abraham to our father," so it is now. "We are of the succession;" with others, therefore, there can be no fellowship."

Now here are two distinct stabs under the fifth rib, under which one would think, but for the Doctor's veteran experience, that he would feel particularly sore. The first is, the unhand-some opinion expressed by the Doctor's new "Brother" as to the character and value of the far famed "Celebration week." According to this, the Doctor would seem to be eagerly clutching at an old threadbare garment which dissent, after, perhaps, some twenty years' use, is getting heartily sick and ashamed of, and is about pitching into the beggar's press. But to return: The other stab at the Doctor is most singularly ungracious. To find such provoking obtuseness in his new allies! After going so very far as he did, to invite, as it were, the tramp of the whole Tabernacle upon the prostrate neck of the church,—after designating his distinguished colleague on the occasion, as "a successor, (not "of the Apostles," but according to the report I have seen,) "of St. Peter!" thus courting for the Church's ministry all the peculiar odium which attaches, in the popular mind, to the very Pope himself; after all this, I say, to be so provokingly misunderstood, in the superlative leatherheadedness of this said Editor, to be held up as offering an "insult" to the affiliated "societies," as cruelly marring the "cordial Christian love" which consecrates the platform, (where, by mutual compact, all denominational peculiarities are to be sunk, and all sharp angles carefully rasped down,) by insolently congratulating the audience, "that a genuine Bishop of the true apostolic stamp was honoring them with his presence, &c. &c." as if, according to the intimation of the Editor, the Bishop, ushered in with this flourish of trumpets, was a whit more genuine a one, than several scores of Presbyterian "Bishops" then present, in short that Dr. Tyng is "every inch" a High Churchman still, maugre all his honied phrases; that his Tabernacle harangues are mere gammon; that he still believes in "the Apostolic succession," carrying about with him the genuine Simon Pure mark in the "arrogance" and "exclusiveness" which are its appropriate fruits; and that, until he distinctly repudiates that obnoxious and most "ungentlemanly" dogma (a favorite epithet, this latter, with "the Rev. Washington Baird" as applicable to "Episcopacy,") and that, too, by some more "overt act" than an occasional "looking over the wall" from the stand-point of a Tabernacle platform, until, in fact, he disavows and abandons it by some such act, consistent with his professions, as Mr. Barnes once hinted at, the Doctor might as well spare himself the trouble of any farther overtures.

And indeed, to speak in all seriousness, Mr. Editor, it must be extremely difficult for the Dissenter to attribute entire honesty to concessions on the part of the Clergy of the Church, on the important question of the ministry and the apostolic succession. To a Presbyterian, e. g. who reads attentively; in succession, the 19th and the 23d of our articles of Religion, and the Preface to our Ordination office, it must be a difficult thing to believe that any mind, as clear as Dr. Tyng's, can possibly fail to extract from them the following propositions and conclusion, viz. that the Church of Christ is to be known by true sacraments, (art. 19,) that true sacraments are to be known by being ministered by a true ministry, (art. 23,) that a true ministry is to be known by being ordained by a (Diocesan) Bishop, the highest of three "divers orders" (Pref. to Ordination office,) and, ergo, that the Church of Christ is to be known by, and is identified with, an Episcopally ordained ministry. I say it must be extremely difficult for an intelligent Dissenter to believe that any ordinarily clear mind can fail thus to read the Church's standards on this subject; and thus believing, the consequent train of thought with him seems irresistible, that if an Episcopal minister does believe this, then, and most especially as being pledged to it in his ordination, he is solemnly bound to maintain it, and that he cannot, as an honest man, compliment it away, as in other forms, so by a coalition like the American Tract Society, whose very fundamental article requires him to hold his peace on this question, and to foster publications which carefully suppress as "the arrogant assumptions of a (particular) sect" a truth which his Branch of the Church has solemnly pronounced to be "evident to all men diligently reading holy Scripture and ancient authors;" while, on the other hand, if he does not believe it, he ought not to remain in an Ecclesiastical Body which has placed this doctrine in the very fore-front of her system. F.

We copy the following from the New York Churchman:

THE VOICE OF THE ANGLICAN CHURCH.

We have been honored with another very kind letter from the estimable Bishop of North Carolina, which we now insert: TO THE EDITOR OF THE CHURCHMAN;

Reverend and Dear Sir:—I have only this moment seen your too flattering notice of my letter to the clergy of North Carolina, on the Tract styled, "The Voice of the Anglican Church on Confession,"—and, I fear, from the inference you seem to have drawn, perhaps justly, from that letter, that a false impression of the responsibility I intended to have assumed in it, in regard to the adoption and publication of the tract, may be made upon the public mind to the injury of others. I supposed that responsibility would have been sufficiently admitted by me, and understood by others, in the sentence, "A new arrangement was made, by which after its publication, the Tract was to have been appended to my sermons, about to be put to press."

Since my examination of the letter as published, I am convinced this sentence neither meets my own intention, nor guards sufficiently against misapprehension. I wrote the letter in haste, and under some irritation, and my real object was, to protect myself against the imputation which had just been cast upon me, of having aided in the compilation of the said Tract, to answer a party end. I now frankly avow myself responsible for the arrangement by which the Tract was published, and my conviction, that no responsibility can attach to the reverend author, beyond its simple compilation. Of this compilation I knew nothing, till after it was made. Before publication, however, it was submitted to me, and, under the idea of its entire fairness, received my approval.

Had I known of the acknowledgment of the compiler in the Churchman, though I have not seen his letter, I should have withheld mine. I owe it to him, however, thus publicly to declare my belief—while I differ with him as to the unfairness of many of the extracts—that he is utterly incapable of an intentional misrepresentation of any matter, and to promise, that, so soon as I have opportunity, I will carefully and deliberately examine every extract for myself.

Very faithfully, your friend and brother, L. S. IVES.

THE BEAUTY OF HOLINESS.

It is a great mistake of a portion of the religious world to look upon ornament, as a sin or a superstition. Religion is not a bare and unadorned thing, nor can it be so received without debasing, without making too low and mean, the worshipper for the worship. The "wedding garment," was not the every day wear. The poorest must not, of a choice, appear in rags before the throne of Him who is in glory, nor with less respect of their own person, than they would use, in the presence of their betters. It was originally of God's doing, command, and dictation, to sanctify the beautiful in art, by making his worship a subject of all embellishment. For such a purport were the minute directions for the building of His temple. And yet, how many "religious," of our day, contradict this feeling, which seems to come to us, not only by a natural instinct, but with the authority of a command. It is a deteriorated worship, that prefers four bare, unadorned, whitened walls of a mean conventicle to the lofty and arched majesty and profuse enrichment of a Gothic minster. We want every aid to lift every sense above our daily grovelling cares, and ought to feel that we are acceptable and invited guests, in a house far too great, spacious, and magnificent for ourselves alone. Even our humility should be sublime, as all true worship is, for we would fain lift it up as an offering to the heaven of heavens. It has its aspect towards Him, who deigns to receive, together with consciousness of the lowliness of him that offers. It is good that the eye and the ear should see and hear other sounds and sights than concern things, not only of time, but of that portion of it which hems in our daily wants and business. Beauty and music are of, and for eternity, and will never die; and in our perception of them we make ourselves a part of all that is undying. These are senses that the spiritualized body will not lose. Their cultivation is a thing forever; we are now, even here, the greater for their possession in their human perfection. The wondrous pile, so elaborately finished; the choral service, the pealing organ, and the low voice of prayer, and, it may be, angel forms and beatified saints in richly painted windows: we do not believe all this to be solely of man's invention, but of inspiration; how given, we ask not, seeing what is, and acknowledging a greatness around us far greater than ourselves, and lifting up the full mind to a magnitude emulous of angelic stature.—Blackwood's Magazine.

GREAT MEN.

The following notices of the early life of some of the great men of modern Europe and America, is from Redfield's "Tracts for Cities."

Hans Sachs, the poet of the Reformation, and the Burns of Germany, began life as did Burns, a poor boy; he was a tailor's son, and served an apprenticeship, first to a shoemaker and afterward to a weaver; and continued to work at the loom so long as he lived.

The great dramatist, Ben Jonson was a working bricklayer, and afterward a soldier.

Linnaeus, the father of Botany, was once on the shoemaker's bench.

Henye, the voluminous commentator on Homer and Virgil, was the son of a poor weaver, and when he wanted to learn Latin, engaged to pay a schoolfellow fourpence a week for teaching him; but even this pittance would have been too much if it had not been for the kindness of a baker who was his godfather.

Herschell, whose name is inscribed on the heavens, was the son of a poor musician, and at the age of fourteen years was placed in a band attached to the Hanoverian guards. After going to England he undertook to teach music and there became an organist. But while he was supporting himself in this way, he was learning Italian, Latin, and even Greek. From music he was naturally led to mathematics, and thence to optics and astronomy.

John Dollond, the inventor of the achromatic telescope, spent his early years at the silk-loom; and continued at his original business even for some years after his eldest son came to an age to join him in it.

Gifford, the founder and editor of the Quarterly Review, was an orphan and barely escaped the poor-house. He became a ship-boy of the most menial sort on board of a coasting-vessel. He was afterward for six years apprenticed to a shoemaker. In this last employment he stole time from the last, for arithmetic and algebra, and for lack of other conveniences, used to work out his problems on leather, with a blunted awl.

SUMMARY OF FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

The following is a summary of European intelligence.

The state of affairs in France is becoming exceedingly critical. The elections terminated on Friday last; and, out of 750 Deputies, at least 250 Socialists have been returned. The Ministry have been defeated on the motion for giving General Changarnier the double command, of the National Guard and the army of Paris, for three months longer. The command of the National Guard has therefore been given to General Perrot. The Ministry have resigned; and it is said that the task of forming a new Cabinet has been committed to Marshal Bugeaud. The French funds have gone down six per cent., and every thing betokens alarm and disturbance. It is feared that the Republican party will force the government into a war with Austria.

General Oudinot was about to make another attempt to capture the city of Rome on the 11th inst., but was stopped by a telegraphic despatch from Paris. On the 9th inst. Garibaldi defeated 7,000 Neapolitans at Palestrina. It is said that there has been another conflict at Valmonte. Though we have no sympathy with the Roman Republicans, we shall nevertheless be glad to see them baffle the French, Neapolitans, and Austrians, none of whom had any right to interfere with them. Had there been no intervention, the Pope would have soon been restored by his own subjects. As it is, the whole population are turned against him, because they believe that he has invited foreign troops into the country.

It is said that the Austrians have taken Leghorn and Bologna; and Palermo has submitted to the King of Naples. Venice is closely besieged, but still holds out. It is reported that peace has been made between Austria and Sardinia.

A Hungarian army of 90,000 men is at Goding, within twelve miles of Vienna. Buda has been taken by storm, and the Russians have been defeated in the defiles of Jablunka. It is rumored that negotiations for peace have commenced between the Austrians and Hungarians, but we fear that matters have now proceeded too far for this. Nothing but the sword will settle the dispute.

The Holstein troops are bombarding Frederica; and the Prussians have advanced to the north of Jutland. Strong hopes, however, are entertained of a peaceable solution of this matter.

Germany is still in a very unsettled state. The Badish troops have fraternized with the people, and the Grand Duke has fled into France. It is said also that some Prussians have wavered in their allegiance. The Archduke John has chosen a new Ministry, but it does not seem likely to last long. The Rhenish Provinces are by no means in a satisfactory state.

from anything of the kind you ever saw. We asked him when they would be done. He told us to come the next day at noon, and we could see him walk in the snow with them. In this wigwam, I first met the noble Es-ta-or-son. He is a young Indian, of stout, athletic frame, and tolerably good features. Mr. S— thought I would make him a good squaw. He asked him what he thought of it, and he quickly replied in his mixture of his own tongue and ours—“The fire burns low in my wigwam,” meaning that he was ready to take a squaw. He then said my name should be Ne-ba-din, or “the black-eyed girl of the North.” I gave him a little trinket with which he seemed much pleased. In the evening, several of them came up to see us. We danced, jumped rope, and played on a melodion for their amusement, and they seemed much diverted by each of these different exploits.

Some of them are great flatterers, and I was both delighted and surprised to see with what ease they would utter some delicately turned compliment; but if you say anything to them in a flattering way, they will look up and say “they know it.”

Saturday, according to appointment, we started once more to visit them. We first turned our steps to the place where we were to see the hunter start on his snow shoes. We found him all equipped for his journey. He was at first a little unwilling to put on his shoes till he got to a certain place when he was to join the rest of his party, but by dint of persuading he was finally induced to put them on where he was. I was much amused to see him run along on the top of the snow, every now and then looking back to see if we were observing him. We watched him till his form was lost in the woods, and then turned our steps towards the old chief's. Here we passed an hour very pleasantly in learning to do the porcupine quill work which when nicely done is really beautiful. They told me that the chief's son had given me a new name; that of Ne-be-no-qua,* being more appropriate. My companion they named Woz-she-qua, “the fox woman.” We did not stay long among them as it was very cold and the wigwams were filled with smoke. It would not be at all necessary for a romantic young couple to go out of doors “on a cold afternoon to look at the moon,” for all that is necessary is just to turn the eye upward and you can see the azure sky. What they do when it rains and snows I cannot tell. Coming back we stopped at Ad-en-i-ram's the interpreter's. He is much more civilized than any of the others—lives in a log house (the same Mr. S— formerly had,) uses dishes and has a bed. He told us much of the manners and customs of the Indians and made our stay a very pleasant one.

In the evening two Indians came up, one of whom was Es-ta-or-son, and the other She-wa-ent. About nine we went down on the lake and the Indians drew us over the smooth ice on a sled. It was quite romantic to be on that beautiful lake, on a calm moonlight night with two rude uncouth Indians who would every now and then utter the shrill war whoop of their tribe which would ring in our ears long after the sound of their voices had ceased. When I first came here I would not have been persuaded to have trusted myself to their care, but all fear of them has worn off and I would not be afraid to go anywhere with them.

Yesterday was Sunday, and I was much disappointed to find that Mr. S— must be absent, as I expected to enjoy much the services at Church. We, however, went up to the Indian prayer meeting. The Church is a very plain, neat building of wood, small, yet commodious. The inside is finished, not elegantly, but nicely and warmly. They have a large and very handsome organ, on which Mr. S— plays when he is here. When we went in, the house was nearly full. The old chief seemed to be talking to them very earnestly. He talked to them all separately till large tears rolled down the faces of some and others buried their faces in their hands. The service of the Episcopal Church was read in Indian by Ad-en-i-ram, and responded to by the people. It all seemed strangely beautiful to me, especially the singing. Some of the squaws had very sweet voices and sung with amazing accuracy. The afternoon service was much the same as the morning's, and would be a useless repetition were I to go through with it.

This morning I am to start for home. I am really sorry to leave so soon, as I should like to see more of them, and I may never have an opportunity of seeing them again. Although much has been said of the poetry of Indian life, I think, if you have any such ideas, one week's residence among the Indians would completely dissipate them. I have not yet out of an hundred and fifty Indians seen one of those beautiful, youthful faces that we so often read of. They are a dirty, filthy race, and will long remain so. I have written you quite a lengthy description of my trip here, and will close by saying that I trust it is not all uninteresting to you.

Your affectionate sister,
Christian Witness.

FAMILY GOVERNMENT.

In looking into human life, and seeing how entirely dependent for happiness and character the child is upon the parent, we cannot but consider it one of the greatest of the innumerable mysteries of Divine Providence, that one being should be so completely in the hands of another. The wonder is increased by thinking how much skill, how much knowledge, how much firmness, what decision at one time, and what delicacy of moral truth, if I may so express it, at another, are necessary, in order to succeed in training up the infant mind as it ought to be trained. It would sometimes almost seem that God has given to parents a work to do, of such intrinsic difficulties, as very far exceed the capacities and the powers of those whom he has commissioned to execute it.—There seems at first view, to be a want of correspondence between what, in a wisely balanced plan, we might suppose ought to be nicely adapted to each other,—the moral capabilities of the parent, and the moral necessities of the child. We say at first view, for on mature reflection we can discover similar principles which common sense and honest faithfulness will always suggest, and which, steadily pursued, must secure favorable results.—Among the lower classes of society, we find many, very many, families of children well brought up; and among the higher classes, and those too where virtue and Christian principles seem to reign, and where religious instruction is profusely given, we find total failure. The children are sources of trouble and wretchedness to their parents, from the time when they gain the first victory over their mother, by screaming and struggling in the cradle; to the months of wretchedness in later life, during which they are brought home night after night, from scenes of dissipation and vice, to break a mother's heart, or to bleach the cheek of a father with suppressed and silent suffering.

Why are cases so frequent in which the children of virtuous men grow up vicious and abandoned? There are many wise delicate adjustments necessary to secure the highest and best results in the education of a child, but the principles necessary for tolerable success must be few and simple. There are two, which we wish we had a voice loud enough to thunder in the ears of every parent in the country;—there are two, the breach of one or the other of which will explain almost every case of gross failure on the part of virtuous parents, which we have ever known. They are these:

1. Keep your children from bad company; and
2. Make them obey you.

There is no time to enlarge on these points; but it seems to us that habits of insubordination at home, and the company of bad boys abroad, are the two great sources of evil, which undo so much of what moral and religious instruction would otherwise effect. The current of parental interest is setting towards mere instruction to such an extent as to overrate altogether its power; and the immense injury which comes in from such sources as insubordination and bad company, is overlooked and forgotten. What folly to think that a boy can play with the profane, impure, passionate boys, who herd in the streets, six days in the week, and have the stains all wiped away by being compelled to learn his Sunday-school lessons on the seventh; or that children who made the kitchen or nursery scenes of riot and noise, from the age of three to eight years, will be prepared for any thing in after life but to carry the spirit of insubordination and riot wherever they may go. No; children should be taught most certainly, but they must also be taken care of. They must be governed at home, and be kept from contaminating influences from abroad, or they are ruined. If parents ask, how shall we make our children obey? we answer, in the easiest and pleasantest way you can, but at all events MAKE THEM OBEY. If you ask how shall we keep our boys from bad company? we answer, too, in the easiest and pleasantest way you possibly can, but at all events Keep them out of the streets.

The alternative, it seems to us, is as clear and decided as any which circumstances ever made up for man; but you must govern your children, and keep them away from the contamination of vice, or you must expect to spend your old age in mourning over the ruins of your family. Abbott.—Lutheran Standard.

RESPONDING.

BY THE REV. FRANCIS JACOX, B.A., CURATE OF WELLINGBOROUGH.

We find St. Paul, in the fourteenth chapter of his first epistle to the Corinthians, denouncing the use of an unknown tongue in public worship. His principle is to show that to pray in Latin before a congregation of Greeks, or to conduct in Arabic the litanies of an assembly of Illyrians, would be most unreasonable because most unprofitable. And at the sixteenth verse he says, in effect, If you return thanks at church in a language which your neighbours and fellow-worshippers know not, how can they enter into the reality of your ascription of praise? what scope is there for sympathy and communion between you and them, since you use words of which they are wholly ignorant, and to which, therefore, they can make no response. To expect them to say “amen” to a collect or prayer put up in a foreign language were like expecting a man to sign his name to a deed of which he had not read one syllable, or to become bail for a person whom he never saw, in a cause of which he knew nothing. And therefore St. Paul demands, as a matter of plain good sense and practical benefit, that the service of Christians at Corinth be conducted in such a language as the people at large best understood; and that those who addressed the assembly, or led their devotions should not do so in sentences unintelligible to the rest.

Now, it is observable that St. Paul here takes it for granted that the congregation at large are anxious, as a matter of course, to say “amen” at the end of the prayers in question. He argues that the Corinthian teachers had no right to debar the congregation of this privilege, by offering up those prayers in an unknown tongue. He thus implies that such a custom as he assailed had the effect of spoiling the beauty and the efficiency of the service of the sanctuary; for by it the people at large, “the unlearned,” being ignorant of what the minister was saying, were prevented from responding, from taking their part—that part which they had a right to take, that part which it was their duty to take, in the Catholic worship—and were excluded from saying “amen” when the minister had ceased, because they were absolutely in the dark as to the purport of his utterances. Hence, the responses of the unlearned of the people at large are a main part of Christian worship. The service is incomplete without their active participation: there is an essential feature wanting: it is not common prayer in its full sense. The apostle was hurt to think that the poor, who made up the bulk of congregations then, as they do now, should be shut out from lifting up their voices in God's house, on account of the foreign language adopted by certain injudicious persons. He protested against this mutilation of the service. He protested against the few responses, faint and feeble, or the silence that ensued when the unknown and unintelligible effusion had ended. He loved better to hear a good cordial outburst of voices from all sides—voices of men who had been praying in spirit while the minister used plain and earnest words, and who now, when he had fulfilled his part, fulfilled theirs by a hearty and unanimous “amen,” to signify that they too were churchmen and petitioners, that they agreed in the terms of his pleadings before God, and adopted the sense of his address and the breathings of his soul, by assenting, with one accord, in a “so be it” at the end. The poor and unlearned felt that they had some part to take in church-gatherings; that their voice had a claim and privilege to be heard, as well as the voice of him who led their devotions. And St. Paul stood up for this right, and blamed and showed the folly of those who would restrain its due and decent exercise. He admonished the assembly to encourage such prayers and praises as were easily understood, that simple minds might come in for their share in the service, when the time for responses came round, and be able, as they were willing, to say “amen” at the giving of thanks.

Times have altered. The discord which St. Paul rebuked does not exist in our reformed Church. We have an Article (the twenty-fourth) drawn up expressly against this abuse. While the Church of Rome continues to pray before English people in the Latin tongue, the Church of England invites her members at home to pray together in their own dialect, and, on the same principle, in her missionary settlements abroad, uses the language of the people of the different stations, that all may unite with one mouth to glorify God, and that the natives, be they Hindoos or Chinese or New Zealanders, may understand the liturgy, and respond assent at its close. But at home, in our English churches, where our own company meet and use the words of their sires, there is often, very often, found an utter coldness as to the responses: a painful silence, when the people have their part to take, instead of a ready utterance of fervent words. Nothing can be better adapted for an animated worship than the liturgy of our Church, if properly carried out. But if, instead of being a joint act of minister and people, it degenerates into a private reading, where the people are listeners, not fellow-worshippers; sitting to hear, not kneeling to pray; then it is robbed of that excellency which adorns its scheme. The scheme is abortive, because it has not a fair chance. The service is pronounced tame and formal because it has been presented only in a fragmentary shape. There is no liveliness, no fervency, no animation, no interest; because although one man is doing his part, some hundreds are not doing theirs. A single voice prays, collect after collect, and versicle after versicle; and a single voice, an official voice, one that should be drowned in the union of many, is heard to say “amen.”

Habit has a great deal to do with this indifference. Not accustoming oneself to respond, and not being willing to break in upon an old cherished silence, whether such infraction be an improvement or no—this is one leading cause of the neglect; but neglect it is, and indifference it does show. The service is drawn up for the congregation at large, and by them is frequently passed over to minister and clerk. It is designed for one purpose, and used for another. It is meant to be taken up by voices of old and young, to be made a harmony of full and pleasant chords: instead of this we have no concert, no chorus: but a monotonous strain, in one unbroken key. In the early Church the responses sounded like distant thunder. Each man felt that he had something to do with the service, actively as well as passively, by outward and audible sign as well as by inward and spiritual grace; and he did it accordingly. He felt that he was a member of the Church, and joyously asserted that membership in the creed, and evidenced it in litany-cry and hymn of jubilee. But now, partly because the love of many is waxed cold, and partly from a drowsy custom of leaving it all to the clergyman as their mouth-piece and deputy, the worship is become quite another thing. It might be animated from beginning to end; but the ideal is rarely personified and realized. And it is hard to suppose, in fact, that our service can present much attraction, or be of much use, to those who sympathize not much with the spirit of the prayer book, and not at all with the letter; who are not sufficiently impressed by prayerful wants to kneel when they make those wants known to their Father; and are willing to give up their own share in the temple-service, their own priestly caste, (for priests they are called to be,) and to delegate to another, who shall be their hired substitute and organ, that homage of the lips which it is unscriptural thus to repress.

It is true there are exceptions. A few congregations here and there, are notable for that efficient responding which tends to constitute a cheerful service. But, in the majority, it is not so; and the minister is thankful for one or two voices that shrink not from their allotted share in the liturgy, and are willing to sustain what some hundreds repudiate. Yet the Book of Common Prayer becomes a shrivelled skeleton—without flesh, without substance, without animation—when that prominent section apportioned to the people is abandoned by them. When, however, they accompany the minister “with a pure heart and humble voice unto the throne of the heavenly grace;” when there is “a general confession of the whole congregation, after the minister, all kneeling;” when to his sentences, “in an audible voice,” they respond, in versicle and canticle, with a voice as of many waters, with hearty emphasis, with energy and love; when to his greeting prayer, “The Lord be with you!” they affectionately reply, “And with thy spirit!” then is there imparted to the Prayer Book a vivacity, a holy charm, a pregnant meaning, and a breathing power, that make its letters stand out as if written in gold, and around the sanctuary below is shed a lustre dated from the sanctuary above. Can we fancy one silent in the chorus of angels and archangels? one without a voice among the circles of the glorified? one without a shout of jubilee? one without care for the rolling tide of the anthem's rich music? Why, then, such a contrast here below? It cannot be said of the tongue, “Therewith bless we God the Father,” unless we use it in the blessing. The same holds good of that other text, “With the mouth confession is made unto salvation.” And an apostolic intercession entreats that Christian believers may not only “with one mind,” but also with “one mouth,” glorify God, even the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ.

SELFISH RELIGION.

Man is naturally a selfish being, and many persons carry their selfishness even into their religion. They would strike a bargain with God, and serve him for pay. They say to God, “if thou wilt pardon me and make me happy and reward me with heaven, I will submit to thee, but if not, I will continue to rebel.” They love not piety nor practice virtue for their own sake, but because they suppose them necessary to promote their own interest. They obey not God because it is right, but like a hireling who expects his pay. The great philosopher Robert Boyle has well said, "Piety was to be embraced, not so much to gain heaven, as to serve God with." Well would it be if this sentiment were more generally entertained by Christians. It is very common to hear persons say, "I want a religion that will make me feel happy," but very seldom indeed is the wish uttered, "I want a religion that will crucify the flesh, subdue my lusts, mortify my feelings, humble my pride and make me holy."

SUNDAY RIOTING.

It is the plain duty of all, who can exert any influence over the public mind, to call attention to those evils which threaten to destroy the peace and order of society. A neighbouring city has exemplified, in a fearful manner, the dreadful result of not checking in time the riotous disposition which now manifests itself in every quarter of the world. The spirit which, in Europe, breaks out in revolutions, in many of our cities contents itself with the ignoble warfare between rival firemen, and gangs which delight in calling themselves bad names.

Philadelphia has unfortunately obtained no little notoriety of this latter description. It is most unjust to charge this upon the city of Philadelphia. The city proper, under its excellent municipal laws, administered with prompt energy and bold decision by its worthy mayor, is as free from riot and disturbance as any city in the world. The city, however, is surrounded by districts under separate authorities, and these districts have not only an insufficient body of police, but also an inefficient magistracy, for the enforcement of law and order.

The district of Moyamensing has, for the last month, been the scene of repeated riots. Although these have been of limited extent, yet they have alarmed and disturbed large numbers of our citizens. Although they have also broken out on other days, Sundays are the favourite days for these miserable exhibitions. For three Sundays in the last month, has a large portion of this district been disturbed not only with the shouts of these contending factions, but the quiet of the Lord's day has been broken with the frequent report of fire arms. Living most unfortunately in a place which has been chosen as the centre of these operations, we speak from observation and not from report. And we have never seen one effort made by the authorities to quell the disturbance. Last Sunday morning, in the full light of God's blessed day, one of these riots occurred. Many families found it difficult to reach their homes from the house of God.

In company with a brother clergyman we went to visit an afflicted family, gathered round the lifeless remains of a son and brother, who had been shot through the heart, and thus without one moment's warning ushered into the presence of that God whose holy day he was desecrating. Several others were dreadfully injured. And yet not one effort on the part of our authorities was made to quell the disturbance. Under such circumstances, it is time for the lovers of order and peace to inquire what shall be the end of these things? Must we shut up our churches, as it has been found necessary to do in the evening, and leave our streets to be occupied by rioters? Let the shameful facts be no longer hidden. Let not our assembled magistrates impose upon the credulous, by declaring such a district in "a peaceful state," while our ears are pained with the noise of these profanations, and our lives endangered by these disgraceful conflicts.

Let us not boast of the success of our Sunday Schools, and our Christian efforts, while such fearful evils are unchecked. Let every Christian citizen use his influence to stop an evil which is growing with dangerous rapidity. And let every paper echo the alarm, and sound the note of warning. The good name of our city, and the safety of our citizens are at stake, and those who shrink from duty in such a case are faithless to their most solemn responsibilities.

We had intended to close with these general remarks, before we saw the account in Tuesday morning's papers. Not as an act of hostility to any individual, but as an act of justice to the public, we are compelled to add the following statement. We find this notice of the affair in "the Public Ledger."

The Action of the Court on the Moyamensing Riot.—The Sheriff, on the opening of the Court, on Monday morning, made a statement to the Court in relation to the recent disgraceful scenes in the district of Moyamensing. He said, that for some time past he had been receiving anonymous communications bearing upon the state of affairs in that district, but that he had paid no attention, because not coming from the proper source, and also because it was within his knowledge that at a late meeting of the Board of Commissioners a resolution which had been offered, requesting the co-operation of the Sheriff in putting down the riotous spirit of a portion of its firemen, was laid upon the table, one of the members asserting that there was no necessity for the aid of the Sheriff, and that the district was as quiet as any other section of the county. The Sheriff proceeded to state that after church he was waited upon by certain citizens of Moyamensing, who notified him of the state of affairs there, which he briefly detailed. He desired to call the attention of the Court so that it should be inquired into whether the Moyamensing Board of Commissioners had complied with the provisions of the act of 1845, in maintaining the requisite police force, and, if not, to claim such action as might be deemed necessary.

The Sheriff also stated that he had called upon the Mayor of the city to place the police under his control, for the preservation of the peace in the adjoining district, but that this had been peremptorily refused, he seeming to doubt that he had any authority to let his police cross the city boundary.

Now we have to say, in relation to the above, that it was a matter of common notoriety, not only known to every man, woman and child in Moyamensing, but also known by every citizen of Philadelphia capable of reading, known almost throughout the land, that for two Sundays in succession, as well as during the week, there had been riots in this district, accompanied with the free use of firearms. It is also well known that the gentleman who moved to lay on the table the requisition for the co-operation of the sheriff, had, in a public speech, defended these riots as "manly sports," and had taken the ground that it was improper to interrupt these exercises by which our American youth were trained to shed military glory upon their country!

It is in this aspect of the case that we feel it our duty to speak out, more especially as this same gentleman still maintains boldly this view, and, we presume, will consider it an honor to have his name publicly associated with it. At a meeting of the Board of Commissioners of Moyamensing, the guardians of our lives and properties, certain resolutions, appointing a Committee of Inquiry, &c., were offered.

Pending the consideration of these resolutions, Mr. Miller took the opportunity to protest against the censure that had been undeservedly cast upon the Board of Commissioners and the police authorities of the district, as if they were to blame for the riots that had occurred in their streets, on sudden impulses, between two belligerent fire companies. He contended that the authorities were no more to blame than were those of the city or the districts of Kensington and Southwark for the riots of 1844. He argued that the late scenes were entirely different in their character; that the members of the Franklin were perfectly right in endeavoring to protect their carriage when attacked on Sunday morning on their way home from a fire; and he much regretted that they had not succeeded in driving off their assailants. They would have been cravens if they had not done so, and no one can blame them for the resistance they offered. On the other hand, the members of the Moyamensing House, understanding that a mob of persons were on their way to burn their house or destroy their carriage, were also perfectly right to protect their property to the utmost, and should not be responsible for any acts committed while thus engaged.

Now, according to the argument of this "just judge," both parties in the riot "were perfectly right." And we are in the wrong who ask for protection, when our wives and children are in imminent danger of being shot down at our own doors! Is it not full time for good citizens to speak and act, when such opinions come from those to whom we must look for defence? It is also stated that the Mayor had refused his police force at the command of the Sheriff.

"Judge Parsons expressed astonishment at the conduct of the mayor of the city, and the police officer of Southwark. He said the Sheriff has a right to summon all the citizens of the county, from the highest to the lowest, to his aid in quelling a disturbance; the law, irrespective of the Act of 1845, expressly puts the whole police force under his control, and he was therefore at a loss to conceive why the requisitions upon those officers had been refused.

"He thought that the sheriff had acted with great moderation in conducting the affair of Sunday, as he had the power to cross the city boundary, arrest the city police and force them to follow him and assist in maintaining the peace."

We fully admit that the sheriff "acted with great moderation" in the case. This "moderation" consisted in keeping aloof until the work of death had been completed, and the rioters, after some hours uninterrupted warfare, had ceased of their own accord. It was also very great "moderation," in this officer, not to arrest the "city police," for that would have had the extreme effect of depriving the citizens of Moyamensing of their only protection! For during the afternoon, and most of the night, while there existed great apprehension in every mind, the only protection we had in Moyamensing was from the two hundred men, under the Mayor's personal command, drawn up along South street. The mayor himself came over into our district, and entered into some of our houses, and assured us that if disturbances broke out, he would at all hazards, employ his force for our protection. It was this fact alone which inspired our citizens with confidence. And we firmly believe that this show of an effective force at hand, was the means of preserving us from another Sunday night of apprehension, riot and outrage.

We should frequently count our days, and observe how our lives waste and draw near to eternity.

DEATH OF EX-PRESIDENT POLK.

The telegraph informs us that this distinguished citizen died at his residence near Nashville, on the evening of June 15th.

How soon have the cares and the dignity of earthly office been exchanged for the quiet and lowliness of the grave. At such a time all political differences should be lost sight of, and the Nation should unite in a general testimony of respect to the memory of one so lately its Chief Ruler.

CONVENTION OF MISSISSIPPI.

We are indebted to the Rev. N. W. Camp, D. D., of New Orleans, for the following account taken from the "Concordia Intelligencer."

The Protestant Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Mississippi held its annual Convention at Trinity Church, Natchez, commencing on Thursday the 17th inst., and adjourned on Saturday evening the 19th inst. at about 10 o'clock P. M. The Convention, by the request of the Standing Committee, was called to order by the Right Rev. James H. Otey, D. D., Bishop of Tennessee, formerly Provisional Bishop of Mississippi.

Clergy of the Diocese of Mississippi present, as follows:

Rev. B. M. Miller, of St. Paul's Church, Columbus.

Rev. N. W. Camp, D. D., of Trinity Church, Yazoo City.

Rev. Stephen Patterson, of Christ Church, Vicksburg.

Rev. David Kerr, of Christ Church, Church Hill.

Rev. W. Presbury, of the Church of the Epiphany, Claiborne county.

Rev. E. H. Downing, of St. Philip's Church, Kirkwood.

Rev. F. W. Boyd, of St. James' Church, Port Gibson.

Rev. Edward Fontaine, of Grace Church, Canton.

Rev. W. P. C. Johnson, of St. Andrew's Church, Jackson.

Rev. G. W. Sill, of Christ Church, Holly Springs.

Rev. Dr. Alex. McLeod, of St. John's Church, Lake Washington.

Rev. W. J. Lynd, of Trinity Church, Natchez.

Rev. D. C. Page, D. D., from the Diocese of Tennessee.

Rev. John F. Fish, from the Diocese of New York.

Lay delegates from nine parishes.

The organization being completed by the election of the Rev. B. M. Miller, of St. Paul's Church, Columbus, as president, and Capt. James S. Johnston, of Jefferson, as secretary and treasurer, the Convention proceeded to business.

Much important business was transacted, not the least of which was the election of the Rev. Wm. M. Green, D. D., (president of the University of North Carolina,) as Bishop of the Mississippi Diocese.

Bishop Otey preached the convention sermon on Thursday morning at 11 o'clock, A. M.; also a funeral sermon of the late Rev. William Mason Giles, late Rector of Trinity Church, Natchez, on Saturday at 11 o'clock, at which time he baptized two adults. He confirmed thirteen persons on Sunday morning.

Rev. D. C. Page, D. D., former Rector of Trinity Church, Natchez, preached on Sunday to one of the largest congregations ever assembled in the walls of a church in Natchez.

Rev. N. W. Camp, D. D., preached on Friday evening an eloquent and impressive sermon.

This Convention has had a fine effect upon the P. E. Church in the diocese. The harmonizing influence that prevailed over its deliberations seemed both to centre in and radiate from the breast of every member present. All the business before the Convention was satisfactorily adjusted. One important proceeding was the adoption of resolutions by the Convention creating a society, to be under the authority of the Church, for the diffusion of christian knowledge in Mississippi, and also for the establishment of a depository at Vicksburg, for the distribution and sale, at low prices, of Bibles, prayer books, and other religious works.

Not the smallest source of gratification to all of the members of the Church in this Convention, was the presence of Bishop Otey among them. He was Provisional Bishop of Mississippi for twelve years, and, on account of his then declining health, and his earnest solicitation, was released from that charge by the annual Convention held in May, 1848. When, in 1848, he said "farewell," in Natchez, neither he nor any one else expected that he would be present at another Convention of the diocese; and it is believed, now, that nothing less potent than his zeal for the Church could have induced him to undertake this journey, although his health is much improved,—almost wholly restored.

Previous to the adjournment of the Convention, Bishop Otey addressed a few impressive remarks to the members, and congratulated the diocese upon the election of the Rev. Wm. M. Green, D. D., to the office of Bishop, a gentleman whom he pronounced eminently well qualified to fill an office so important.

The consecration of the Bishop elect will take place in the state of Mississippi, probably in November next. A resolution was passed in which the presiding Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States is requested to fix the time and place as above stated. Thus far, but one Bishop of the Church in the United States has been consecrated west of the mountains.

We cannot close this notice without giving expression to the general gladness both in and out of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Natchez, caused by the presence, in fine health, of the Rev. Dr. D. C. Page. This gentleman, having been Rector of Trinity Church, Natchez, for many years, endeared himself to the people of that vicinity, to an extent never before realized by a clergyman of any denomination; and when, last week, he came down among the people hereabouts, he was received with the warmest cordiality and sincere gratitude for former well appreciated clerical attentions. Many of the best people, of both sexes, in Natchez, will never forget "Mr. Page," (as Dr. Page they may not so easily recognize him). When he comes among them, he will ever be their most welcome guest; and when he departs from among them, their most sincere desires for his welfare will be sure to be offered.

CONSECRATION OF THE NEW BISHOPS OF VICTORIA AND PRINCE RUPERT'S LAND—CANTERBURY, TUESDAY EVENING.—His Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury having appointed this day for the consecration of the Bishops designate of Victoria and Prince Rupert's Land, a large number of prelates and other dignitaries of the Church assembled at the Cathedral shortly after ten o'clock, whilst the Cathedral-close was crowded with visitors anxious to be present at the solemn and interesting ceremony.

The main reason which accounts for the ceremony of consecration taking place at Canterbury Cathedral to-day, is the recent establishment of St. Augustine's Missionary College in this city. It was thought appropriate that the two new Bishops, being, strictly speaking, missionary Bishops, the setting apart of them to their high office should be performed near to the college founded for the express purpose of raising up a body of efficient Missionary Clergy.

Full choral service was performed, and at its close the Archbishop took his seat within the rails of the Communion Table, which stands on a commanding ascent at the eastern end of the Cathedral.

The Right Rev. George Smith, D. D., of St. Mary Hall, Oxford, Bishop elect of Victoria (Hong Kong), and the Right Rev. David Anderson, D. D., of Exeter College, Oxford, Bishop elect of Prince Rupert's Land, were then introduced to the Archbishop, and the usual preliminary formalities having been proceeded with, the two Bishops designate retired. Up to this time they were vested in their rochets, the Episcopal habit without the lawn sleeves, &c. After the lapse of a few minutes, during which time perfect silence reigned throughout the sacred edifice, the Bishops designate returned habited in full Episcopal robes. The remaining portion of the consecration service, as set out in the Book of Common Prayer, was proceeded with, and the Archbishop, by the imposition of hands, admitted Dr. Smith and Dr. Anderson to the office of Bishops in connection with the English Church. *— See page 213.

CHURCH BUILDING SOCIETY.—The annual meeting of the subscribers to this Society was held on Friday, at the offices, No. 4, St. Martin's-lane; the Archbishop of Canterbury in the chair. The report stated,—

"The Committee have granted during the past year sums of money in aid of the building of forty new churches and Chapels, the building with enlargement of eleven, and the enlarging or otherwise increasing the accommodation in forty-three parish churches, making ninety-four in all. The amount of these grants is 12,910*l.*, which will secure an addition of 27,968 seats, of which 23,071 will be free for the use of the labouring classes and the poor generally. Several of the districts recently constituted by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners have, as usual, been among the cases under the consideration of the Committee, and have largely participated in the distribution of the Society's funds; the sum of 4,215*l.* being granted towards the erection of Churches in seventeen of these newly formed parishes, containing together 63,798 inhabitants, with scarcely any means of attending Divine service, but that furnished in rooms hired for the purpose by the new incumbents. One hundred and thirty-six districts, which either have been, or are expected to be, endowed by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, have now been aided by grants from this Society towards the erection of Churches, their aggregate population being 399,295 souls; for whom will soon be provided Church accommodation to the extent of 81,206 seats, 62,293 of which will be free. The total amount contributed from the Society's funds towards securing to this extent the means of religious worship to nearly 400,000 persons, chiefly of the poorer classes, is 38,235*l.*

STATE OF EUROPE.—The National Assembly of France closed its career on Saturday night, and the Legislative Assembly commenced its labours on Monday morning, with much more quietness than was anticipated. It consists of 200 Legitimists, 300 Orleanists and moderate Republicans, and 250 Socialists. How such a Parliament will work together remains to be seen. The new Ministry is not yet formed.

The French army has not yet been allowed to enter Rome, notwithstanding all the fine promises of M. Lesseps, the French Envoy. Garibaldi has left the city at the head of 12,000 men, with the intention of attacking the Neapolitans at Velletri. This may be a trick of the Triumvirs to get him out of the way, whilst they betray the city to the French. If Garibaldi is shut out of Rome, he will no doubt proceed into the Neapolitan territory, and endeavour to excite a Republican movement. In the meantime, if the Triumvirs are firm, the malaria will soon oblige the French to decamp.

The Germans are still bombarding Frederica. It is said that a Russian fleet, of 60 sail, has gone to the assistance of the Danes. This will hasten the negotiations for peace. The Germans, too, want to have their own troops at home. Had the Saxon regiments not been marched into Schleswig Holstein, the emue at Dresden would never have taken place.

The Emperors of Russia and Austria have had a meeting at Warsaw.

We have no particular news from the seat of war in Hungary. The Magyars apparently are going to follow their old system of tactics, by withdrawing into the Marches, where they know all the intricacies of the country, and are seasoned against the ague and March fevers, from which strangers are sure to suffer. Here they may laugh the Russians to scorn, and attack them when they please.

Venice still holds out against the Austrians, who have sent several of their Italian regiments into Hungary.

A FAIR START.

The following, from the Christian Advocate, shows that our Methodist friends are losing something of the character which has made them popular. In our judgment it is one of the strangest things that the dedication of a house of worship should be twice postponed on account of a little rain. However we are assured that when the good people referred to get fairly under way, they will "be amply rigged for all sorts of weather." We hope so, but fear they have made a poor beginning.

THE WEATHER-BOUND CHURCH.

It will be recollected that an appointment for the dedication of the new church in Lattintown, on the 8th of May, was published in the Advocate; and that the dedication failed in consequence of the rain. Three weeks from that day we made another effort to meet our engagements—this time in connection with Rev. J. B. Wakely; but, alas for us! the rain poured down on this day likewise, from morning to evening, and the dedication was postponed to Wednesday, the 13th of June. Services at 2 and 7½ o'clock, P. M., officiating ministers as per former notice.

A certain old clergyman is said to have made the following announcement to his congregation:—"On Wednesday of this week, God willing, and if it should not rain, the usual lecture may be expected; but next week it will take place any how." Now we will not pledge that the dedication at Lattintown will actually take place, at the time above specified, "any how;" but should judge it prudent for the friends to consider both the old clergyman's conditions as implied, if not expressed, in the present notice.

We hope no unfavourable impression in relation to the brethren at Lattintown will be made by the very unusual circumstances of two postponements of their dedication services. They are true men not in the least afraid of a little rain; and the people of the neighbourhood would probably have filled the elegant little church in a few minutes had the bell been rung. The grand reason for the postponements is a desire to accommodate the brethren from abroad, whom they wish to see on that occasion. A few liberal minded men have erected a beautiful and commodious church; and on the occasion of its first opening for divine service, they wish the presence and the countenance of their brethren in the distant parts of the circuit, and in the neighbouring charges. When the church shall be actually dedicated, we will go security for the brethren, that they will be amply rigged for all sorts of weather.

ENCOURAGING.—The editor of the Freeman's Journal informs his readers that, having attended the great Council at Baltimore, "he returns to his own avocations, having learned a great lesson of modesty, humility, and charity." The editor must have made a very profitable journey.—Witness.

CONSECRATION.—By divine permission, Grace Church, Brooklyn Heights, will be consecrated on Tuesday, June 26th inst., at 10 o'clock, A. M.

Brethren of the clergy and laity will please receive this notice as an invitation to meet at the Rector's house, 153 Henry street, Brooklyn, at 9½ o'clock, and proceed thence to the church.

NARRATIVE OF THE UNITED STATES EXPEDITION TO THE RIVER JORDAN AND THE DEAD SEA, by W. F. LYNCH, U. S. N., Commander of the Expedition. Philadelphia, LEA & BLANCHARD.

At the time this most interesting expedition set out, we gave in the Banner the official documents in relation to it. We also published, from the Southern Literary Messenger, a succinct account of the expedition. We have now, in a large and well printed volume, accompanied with "maps and numerous illustrations," a detailed history of this expedition from its departure, through all the varied incidents and scenes which intervened, back to its starting point.

Let us begin with externals. It is no mean commendation of a book to say that it is well printed. This is always a presumptive proof in its favor. It argues a confidence on the part of the author and publisher in the merit of the book. In our days of cheap printing, it is pleasant to get hold of a good, solid, substantial book, with clear white paper and large type; and such a one is this book.

The illustrations, drawn by skilful hands, from the real objects represented, are life-like and vivid pictures, and add much to the interest of the work.

We have heard it objected to this work, that it did not give enough of scientific research. Certainly it has left room for such accounts, but they may be given to learned societies in the shape of treatises.

This book gives an account of "The United States' Expedition." It is one, therefore, in which not merely the learned and the scientific, but the people of the United States have an interest. We think, therefore, that Captain Lynch has acted wisely in making his book a popular one.

Although there are many familiar places described, yet it is interesting, even for those who know these well, to note the impression produced upon a new observer; and to gain an accurate knowledge of unknown places, we are not to depend wholly upon the information of individuals, but to gather our knowledge by selecting from various witnesses, and comparing their accounts. We think that Captain Lynch has given a fair and accurate description of the many interesting points visited in this expedition. Though the style is somewhat poetical, it only sets forth sober realities. If we were entering into a minute criticism, which we pretend not to do, we might note some peculiarities of style which, in a second edition, might easily be removed. One of these is that fault, often accounted a national one, of expressing common thoughts in scraps of familiar quotations. We prefer hearing Captain Lynch's own words while relating his own impressions. But these are mere superficial defects, and perhaps many would doubt our correctness in so esteeming them.

The substance of the book is good. We like the spirit which directed the author's observation, and which animates his descriptions. It is a truly religious one, and that of a manly tone. A gallant sailor, when his generous instincts and noble qualities, born and nurtured on the bosom of the mighty deep, are quickened and curbed by religious feeling, is always a happy illustration of his faith. There is about the Commander of this expedition, as he journeys to Palestine, much of the high feeling which animated an old Crusader as he guided his band of Christian soldiers to the Holy Land. One absorbing thought seems to possess him. We were struck with this when we read his brief salute as his vessel passes the attractive shores of the land to which the scholar loves to direct his pilgrimage,— "Greece! poetic Greece! but that my soul is engrossed by one pervading thought, how I would love to visit thy shores!" This one thought urged this gallant officer to apply for permission to begin this interesting work, it nerved his soul through all the difficulties and dangers of his perilous course, and with the energy it gave, under Almighty protection, it secured success to an expedition which reflects credit upon the American navy.

We are unable, in a brief notice, to give an analysis of the work. We shall take a future opportunity of giving some extracts. In the meantime we hope that the American public will show their appreciation of an undertaking honorable to the country, and whose results are deeply interesting to the Christian and important to the scientific world, by giving to this work that encouragement which is an author's best satisfaction. Let it be bought and read.

SACRED RHETORIC, or Composition and delivery of Sermons, by Henry J. Ripley, Professor of Sacred Rhetoric and Pastoral duties in the Newton Theological Institution, to which are added, Hints on Extemporaneous Preaching, by Henry Ware, Jr., D. D. Boston, Gould, Kendall & Lincoln. For sale by G. S. Appleton, Phila.

We must own that, in general, we have little regard for works of this class. In our esteem, their general effect is to do more harm than good. If ministers of Christ are to be trained to use a peculiar kind of rhetoric in preaching, then their auditors need also a corresponding preparation to appreciate such efforts. One great cause of the little practical effect which preaching often has upon "the hearers of the word," results from the artificial composition of sermons, and the marked distinction between them and ordinary discourses. There is, undoubtedly, a gravity imparted by the high and holy themes discussed, which should ever be their distinguishing mark. But this may be preserved without adopting a wearisome formality in the plan, or a "cant" phraseology in the expressions of sermons. Men should be taught to feel that sermons were intended not merely to be heard with affected gravity in the house of God, but that they set forth also home truths which were to be carried to their own houses, to shed the holy light of heavenly truth upon the domestic circle. We must say that the author of the book we are noticing commends himself to our regard by the right views he appears to take in these respects. We know not what his religious views are, but upon the subject of his book he certainly expresses very just views. This we have especially noticed in his remarks on the "Texts of sermons." He says, "What I wish clearly to express in regard to texts is, that an intimate relation, in point of sense, should be maintained between the text and the sermon; that the subject of the sermon should be contained in the text, and proceed naturally from it, somewhat as the stalk grows out of the seed."

* Bishop Anderson—a warm-hearted, amiable, and energetic friend & correspondent of mine, is admirably qualified for that high office.

"The preacher comes forward not in his own authority, but as an ambassador of Christ; not to inculcate religious opinions as drawn from the teachings of nature and philosophy, but to exhibit and enforce the religion of the Bible." After setting forth expository preaching as a question of expediency to be decided by the hearers' characters and circumstances, and referring to the prevailing practice of short texts, he says—"And yet the former, so common among the ancient preachers, may combine so many advantages, and is so entirely consistent with real oratorical excellence, as was proved in the case of Chrysostom, that the almost universal abandonment of it is to be lamented." If it were not so much abandoned, perhaps Christian hearers would now think more of divine truth than of human rhetoric. As far as we have been able to examine it, the other parts of this clear and concise treatise show a similar soundness of judgment. The only general objection we would make to this work, one which belongs to its class, is that the importance of oratory is too much magnified, and the ministerial office is overshadowed too much by the pretensions of rhetoric, "sacred," indeed, when subservient to, but profane when exalted over the native power of divine truth proclaimed by the ambassadors of Christ.

OFFICIAL CALENDAR OF THE CHURCH: containing an Exposition of the Several Offices, adapted for various occasions of Public Worship, together with the Epistles and Gospels for each Sabbath and Festival of the Ecclesiastical Year; with an Analysis of the Lessons: compiled from the works of Rev. John Boys, D. D., Dean of Canterbury, A. D. 1829. With Addenda, Exhibiting the Constitution and Canons of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States; corrected Lists of the Clergy; a History of the Ministerial Succession, from Archbishop Parker up to the Apostles, through three channels, viz: Anglican, Gallican, and Italian. Also, a view of the present condition of the Eastern Churches, etc., etc. By a Presbyterian of the Diocese of Ohio. Philadelphia: printed by King & Baird, No. 9 Sansom Street, 1849.

We are pleased with this republication on two accounts. First we rejoice to witness every new effort to revive a taste for the substantial theological writing of the Church of England, in the days when strong hearts and heads gave their best energies to her noble service. Although there may be a quaintness in the manner of this book, the matter is so sound that it's worth more than reconciles us to such peculiarities. Again we are happy to see our clergy occupying their leisure time in these endeavours to develop the beauty and spiritual influence of our Liturgy. This work is to be republished in twelve numbers, three of which are now out, at the low price of 25 cts. a number.

It is brought out in a very handsome style by the publishers, and will make when complete, a substantial volume.

The full title page expresses the object and plan of this work. At present we are compelled to give only this brief commendation. A fuller notice will be given before long. In the meantime as a sample of the Dean's pointed and pithy style we give the following.

THE DECLARATION OF REMISSION OF SINS.

"Almighty God, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who," &c.

The novelists mislike the minister's absolution, and therefore in the conference at Hampton Court, January 14th, 1603, they gained so much as to have it in a more mild term, called "Remission of sins." Herein resembling the people of Bengala, who are so much afraid of tigers, as that they dare not call them tigers, but give them other gentle names.

Concerning absolution, see Gospel for 19th Sunday after Trinity.

THE DOUBLE WITNESS OF THE CHURCH, by the REV. WM. INGRAHAM KIP, D. D. Fourth edition. New York, Stanford & Swords, 137 Broadway.

The fact that this work has reached a fourth edition is abundant proof that its merits are appreciated by the Church. The idea suggested in the title is a good one, especially for our times. This meaning of the title is explained in that sentence of the Rev. F. W. Faber—"It may be well, then, old and trite as the subject is, to say a few words on some of those features of our Church which bear at once a DOUBLE WITNESS against Rome on the one hand, or mere Protestant congregations on the other." In theology, every "Charybdis" has its opposing "Scylla," and too often those who fly from the one fall into the other. Wisely, therefore, does this DOUBLE WITNESS warn against both, and mark out the deep channel which flows between. We can speak confidently of the real usefulness of this book, as we have received assurance, from distant correspondents, of the good it has done for the Church in helping her missionaries to silence prejudice and error, and to inform the ignorant with a knowledge of the truth.

CONSOLATIO; OR, COMFORT FOR THE AFFLICTED, with a preface and notes, by the Rev. P. H. Greenleaf, M. A. "I have chosen thee in the furnace of affliction," Isaiah, 48: 10. Boston and Cambridge, James Munro & Company.

This is an American edition of a work published in England, we understand, by Dr. Wilberforce, Bishop of Oxford. It was compiled by a lady of eminent piety, tried by suffering, during long years of wasting sickness. Among the sources from which her selections were derived, are the writings of Thomas à Kempis, Leighton, Taylor, Cecil, Wilberforce, Hall, and Manning. To the original work the American editor, besides alterations, has added a preface and notes, and appended an interesting and instructive article on the Communion of Saints. In this doctrine the afflicted find richest comfort. We earnestly commend this book as wisely and happily designed to secure its merciful end.

FAINT, YET PURSUING.

An Apostrophe to the Church.

BY REV. EDWARD C. JONES.

Church of the living God,
Awake the victor song,
A toilsome path thou long hast trod,
And yet must march along;
Thy Banner to Creation fling,
And take possession for thy King.

The field is now the World,
What noble field of strife,
And Satan from his throne is hurled,
If thou but wak'st to life;
Strike home for Jesus and his word,
And give the Kingdoms to thy Lord.

What noble sons were thine,
When dauntless souls like Paul,
The strength of heart and arm combined,
And gave to Christ their all;
Then Islands in the southern sea,
Then nothern climes in Christ were free.

Ah, those were days of Faith,
When vengeance ~~marked~~ the good, — marked
And thorns were with the mitre worn,
And Prelates poured their blood;
That warm libation rich and free,
Was shed by giant hearts for Thee.

Give thee but souls like these,
With daring in their eye,
And out upon the distant breeze,
The Banner's folds shall fly;
And mountain-top and heaving sea,
Shall wake unwonted melody.

Church of the living God,
The Earth is grossly dark,
But Bel must bow and Nebo stoop,
Before the mystic Ark:
On to the noble rescue, on,
Sword of the Lord and Gideon.

Church of the living God,
In trustfulness move on,
And spread the seed of Truth abroad,
Till all shall kiss the Son;
Then bursts on Earth a cloudless day,
Then kindles Glory's lasting ray.

"THE RISE AND FALL OF PAPACY."

This, Mr. Editor, is the title of a Discourse published in England, in the year 1701, and in 1843 in Philadelphia, by James M. Campbell & Co. The author, Robert Fleming, V. D. M., was a Scotch Presbyterian of distinction, settled in London. As the state of Europe, and the present condition of the Papacy, are subjects of great interest at this time, the reflections of a thinking mind may incite others to the consideration of the wonderful predictions contained in the Book of Revelation.

After having given his interpretation of the Seals, the Trumpets, and the Vials, down to his own time, (which he believed to be in the midst of the events predicted to take place at the outpouring of the fourth vial,) he proceeds to "conjecture" as to the future. "And first," he says, "as to the remaining part of this vial, I do humbly suppose that it will come to its highest pitch about A. D. 1717, and that it will run out about the year 1794. There is ground to hope, that about the beginning of another such century," (a preceding one alluded to by the author,) "things may alter for the better, for I cannot but hope that some new mortification of the chief supporters of Antichrist will then happen; and, perhaps, the French monarchy may begin to be considerably humbled about that time; that, whereas, the present French king takes the sun for his emblem, and this for his motto, Nec pluribus impar, he may, at length, or rather his successors, and the monarchy itself, (at least before the year 1794,) be forced to acknowledge that (in respect to the neighbouring potentates) he is even singulis impar." We who know that the French monarch was slain in 1793, may well place some confidence in this man's rules of interpretation. "Then," he continues, "I do suppose the fourth vial will end, and the fifth commence, by a new mortification of the Papacy." Alison, speaking of the approach of Napoleon to Rome, says—"At the intelligence of his approach, the council of the Vatican was thrown into the utmost alarm. Azara, minister of Spain, was despatched immediately with offers of submission, and arrived at Bologna to lay the tiara at the feet of the republican general. The terms of an armistice were soon agreed on: it was stipulated that Bologna and Ferrara should remain in the possession of the French troops, that the Pope should pay twenty millions of francs, furnish great contributions of stores and provisions, and give up a hundred of the finest works of art to the French commissioners." This "new mortification" took place in 1796; it was but the beginning of a series of mortifications, the most prominent of which were the seizure of the Pope in 1809, "and his confinement in a dungeon, amid Alpine snows, till the beginning of 1813," and the annexation of the Roman states to the French empire. The author continues his conjectures by saying, "I do further suppose that the fifth vial which is to be poured out on the seat of the beast, or the dominions that more immediately belong to, and depend upon the Roman see, that, I say, this judgment will probably begin about the year 1794, and expire about A. D. 1848; so that the duration of it, upon this supposition, will be the space of fifty-four years. For I do suppose, that seeing the Pope received the title of supreme bishop no sooner than A. D. 606, he cannot be supposed to have any vial poured upon his seat immediately, (so as to ruin his authority so signally as this judgment must be supposed to do,) until the year 1848, which is the date of the 1260 years in prophetic account, when they are reckoned from A. D. 606.

But yet we are not to imagine that this vial will totally destroy the Papacy, (though it will exceedingly weaken it,) for we find this still in being and alive when the next vial is poured out."

Had this writer lived in our day he could not have written more accurately respecting the fate of the Papacy for the last fifty-four years. The year 1848 witnessed a most signal overthrow of the Pope, and although not destroyed, yet is his "authority exceedingly weakened."

The correctness of his interpretation may be further sustained, from a consideration of his prediction, (of what shall take place during the remainder of this century,) based upon the sixth vial and the state of the world at the present time.

"The sixth vial will be poured out upon the Mahometan Antichrist, as the former on the Papacy. And seeing the sixth trumpet brought the Turks from beyond Euphrates, from the crossing which river they date their rise, this sixth vial dries up their waves, and exhausts their power, as the means and way to prepare and dispose the Eastern kings and kingdoms to renounce their heathenish and Mahometan errors, in order to their receiving and embracing Christianity." The increasing favour of the British nation in southern and central Asia is now tending to bring about this event, and ere long we may look for mighty inroads upon the same kingdoms from the north. Russia, with her 650,000 men ready for battle, may be expected to look with as much jealousy upon the progress of English arms in the east, as the latter does upon that of the former in the west at this present juncture. Other things may lead the Russians to overwhelm heathenism and Mahometanism; their ordinary ambition excited by border conflicts.

Having alluded to the seizure of Pope Pius VII., in 1809, and the overthrow of the Pope in 1848, it may not be thought irrelevant in this connection, to contrast the conduct of the two Popes. The flight of the present Pope is fresh in all our minds. To say the least of it, it was most undignified and cowardly. Behold him mounted upon a carriage in the livery of a foreign minister's servant, and in this plight departing from Rome!

Taking Alison's narrative for my guide, let us look at the conduct of Pius VII. in the hour of danger. "On the sixth of July, at six o'clock in the morning, the Pope and Cardinal Pacca were awakened by the strokes of hatchets, which broke down the interior doors, and both instantly rising, perceived, from the tumult in the court, glitter of arms, and troops in all quarters, that the French had effected an entrance into the palace. The holy father expected immediate death. He called for the ring which his predecessor, Pius VI., had worn when dying, the gift of Queen Clotilda, and, putting it on his finger, looked at it with calm satisfaction." The doors were then thrown open, and the French general, with his officers and men, were admitted. He was told that he must renounce his temporal sovereignty of Rome and the ecclesiastical states. The Pope replied, that the emperor might cut him in pieces, but would never extract from him such a resignation. While preparing for his departure, the general assured him that the palace should be sacred, he smiled, and said, "He who makes light of his own life is not likely to be disquieted for the loss of his effects." He took his place in a carriage, with Cardinal Pacca by his side, and, escorted by a body of cavalry, he was taken from Rome. A remark to the cardinal at this time shows the fortitude of the man—"Cardinal," said the Pope, "we did well to publish the bull of excommunication on the 10th, or how could it have been done now?"

The historian informs us that "before leaving Rome, a well conceived project had been secretly communicated to Pius VII. for delivering him from his oppressors, and securing his escape on board an English frigate, which was cruising for that purpose off Civita Vecchia; but he refused on any account to leave his post." Comment is unnecessary. With the hope that these extracts will not prove unacceptable, I here leave the subject.

THE DOCTRINE OF THE HOLY SPIRIT.—The Holy Spirit dwelleth with those of a religious and good heart, and shall be in them. Not that such persons are to expect any extraordinary illumination, any sudden change of their affections and passions. These are but dreams of enthusiasts. But the operations of the SPIRIT are secret and gradual, co-operating with men's own endeavours, confirming their faith, assisting them to think, and to do, what is good and right, and enabling them to grow from grace, to grace in the LORD JESUS.—DR. HEBERDEN.

Miscellaneous.

From the Churchman.

THE ARTICLES OBLIGATORY.

MR. EDITOR:—In the Church of England, and in our Church, there are two promises binding the clergy to "doctrine," the subscription before orders, and the vow in the Ordinal. In England, the subscription is particular, and the vow general: with us, both are general. The English subscription is to three particulars, the supremacy, the Prayer-book, and the Articles: (Can. 36.) that for the Articles having been added some time after the others were enacted. Previously to this addition, the question may have been open, in England,—whether the particular promise limited the general one, so that the Articles might be rejected or ignored,—or whether the general promise concerning "doctrine" included all the doctrinal avowals of that Church whether comprised in the particular promise or not. Since the addition, the particular is as broad as the general, embracing all the doctrines that are authenticated in England.

With us, the subscription and the vow, both, are general, broad, inclusive,—embracing the entire mass of "doctrine" protected in our Constitution; and this includes the Articles. Our formal obligation is neither limited nor supported by a particular statement. We are bound in "doctrine" to all, Prayer-book, Articles, Offices,—or else, to none of them, to nothing. Such is our position,—we are sworn to every point in all these formulae which theology, or common sense declares to be "doctrine."—To us, in the United States, it matters not how the case is in England. To us, of this day, it matters not how the case was with our predecessors, whether with or without a Prayer-book, with or without Offices or any of them; with or without the Articles. Each and all of these have fully bound our Church for more than forty years; the Institution, the latest, having been perfected in 1808. Each and all of them are embraced in both the subscription and the vow that hold us to "doctrine." And the ligature is not only moral, but forensic likewise. All this, I apprehend, is infallibly certain,—unless it can be shown that we are "solemnly engaged" to the mere word "doctrine," without stipulation in any matter of "doctrine!" i. e. unless the subscription and the vow are both empty!

The Prayer-book, the Articles, and the Offices, all, are our standards of "doctrine," and all equally so. The Homilies, by their limited authorization, are not standards; they "contain godly and wholesome doctrine," and so far have moral force; but these "contents" not being anywhere specified, (and the one particularly named, in Art. II, being referred to for "wholesomeness" and "comfort," not for ratification,) they have no statutory power. It may even be questioned whether their teaching can, without invoking the Standard also, have forensic protection.

Our Articles profess not to be "for the avoiding of diversities of opinions;" we therefore cannot regard them as affecting opinions only, discriminated from doctrines. That plea has not made the voyage to our shores. Nor can I rate it highly in its native kingdom. On the contrary,—as the chief contents of the Articles are doctrinal, and not a few entire Articles doctrinal only, I think the word "opinions" in their title must be used generically, for both doctrines and minor tenets,—not specifically, for the latter only.—That point, however, is nothing to us, who have dropped their whole reference to "opinions." All that is doctrinal in them is involved in our priestly subscription and vow.

Nor can I withhold the suggestion, that our Laity are obligated by our Standards, as well as our Clergy. We baptize indeed upon the faith simply of the Apostles' Creed. But, besides that Symbol's including positively or inferentially the whole truth, baptism is into the Church Universal, and each member of that body may enrol himself in any branch of it. But where, as among us, various communities affect to be the Church,—calling themselves or each other sects, denominations, "churches," Christians, saints, disciples, and what not, a sort of nomenclature that is the merest conventionalism, or the merest rubbish, throughout,—there, I say, he who stands with the Protestant Episcopal Church, be he clerical or lay, is bound in morals and in honor, in all good faith, (to say nothing of forensic liability if good faith be grossly outraged,) to the doctrines at large of that Church, whether upheld in the Prayer-book, or in the Offices, or in the Articles. And I further submit, that, whether here or elsewhere, the arrangement would be no better than monstrous, which tied closely and accurately to "doctrine" the teachers, while it left the taught as free to roam as a general Creed, and the crevices and breaches that can be made in it, may allow.

Yours truly, in haste,

O.

A Funny Law.—Virginia is famous for many things, but in nothing more than her laws, if the following be a specimen;

At a Grand Assembly, held at James' Cittie, in the year 1616, were passed many acts "to the glorie of Almighty God, and the publique good of this his Majestie's colonie of Virginie," among which is,

ACT V.

Women causing scandalous suits, to be ducked.

Whereas, oftentimes many babbling women often slander and scandalize their neighbors, for which their poore husbands are often brought into chargeable and vexatious suits and cast in great damages:

Be it therefore enacted by the authority aforesaid, That in actions of slander occasioned by the wife, as aforesaid, after judgment passed for the damages, the woman shall be punished by ducking: and if the slander be so enormous as to be adjudged at a greater damage than five hundred pounds of tobacco, then the woman to suffer a ducking for each five hundred pounds of tobacco so adjudged against her husband, if he refuses to pay the tobacco.—Village Record.

GREAT MEN.

James Ferguson was the son of a day-laborer in Scotland, and was born in 1710.—Such was his early thirst for education, that he learned to read before his father suspected that he knew his letters. When about eight years of age, he began to make experiments in mechanics, and had actually written out an account of his supposed discoveries, in regard to the mechanical powers before he learned that they were in other books. At night he used to study the heavens, and make maps of the stars, lying on his back, wrapped up in a blanket. When he was a farmer's boy, his kind master often took the flail out of the boy's hand, and worked himself, while James sat by him in the barn, busy with mathematical instruments. He borrowed books from a gentleman's butler in the neighborhood, and from these he was led to make a globe and solve problems. After this he went into the service of a miller, where he made a clock and watch, both of wood. The numerous philosophical works of Ferguson are still held in esteem.

Thomas Simpson, the great mathematician, was the son of a Leicestershire weaver, and was turned out of doors by his father, because he was bent on being a scholar.

Edmund Stone was a son of the Duke of Argyle's gardener. As the Duke was one day walking in his garden, he saw a Latin copy of Newton's Principia lying on the grass. Astonished to find such a book in such a place, he made inquiry, and found it to be part of the amusement of young Edmund, who had begun to snatch time from his work for study. "What," said the duke, "and do you understand Geometry, Latin, and Newton?" "I know a little of them," replied the youth.—"But how came you by the knowledge of all these things?" Stone replied that he had been taught to read ten years before, by a servant. "Does one need to know more than the twenty-four letters in order to learn every thing else that one wishes?" The curiosity of the Duke was now so increased that he seated himself on a bank, and desired to hear the whole story. "I first learned to read," said Stone; "the masons were then at work on your house. I approached them one day, and observed that the architect used a rule and compass, and that he made calculations. I inquired what might be the meaning and use of these things, and was informed that there was a science called arithmetic. I purchased a book of arithmetic and learned it. I was told there was another science called geometry. I bought the necessary books, and learned geometry. By reading, I found that there were good books in these two sciences in Latin; and bought a dictionary, and learned Latin. I understood, also, that there were good books of the same kind in French; I bought a dictionary and learned French. And this, my lord, is what I have done: it seems to me that we may learn everything when we know the twenty-four letters of the alphabet."

Joseph Ritner, late governor of Pennsylvania, was a wagoner, and Thomas Ewing, one of the most distinguished of our statesmen, was once known chiefly as an athletic woodsman.

The man who wants me, is the man I want. Memorandum; to do my duty to every one I come in company with, and pay Christ some part of the debt I owe him.

PURITANIZING.

Some in their zeal against Romanism, seem to forget that the Church has another enemy—Puritanism. We find the following in one of our exchanges. We suppress the name and residence of the clergyman mentioned, sincerely hoping that the statement may prove untrue.

PUSEYISM AND ITS FATHER.—Professor — of —, a distinguished Episcopalian, in a recent letter, says: "I have long been convinced that Puseyism was the legitimate fruit of the unreformed portion of our liturgy, offices and ceremonies, and that we should never be clear of this error until we completed the reformation begun by Edward VI. A vigorous Protestant scion was grafted on a Romish stock, with an intention of cutting away every Roman branch as soon as the Protestant germ was well in bearing. But Elizabeth prevented this, and hence the Church has continued to produce two sorts of fruit; and the cultivation more recently bestowed on the Romish branch has caused it nearly to outgrow and choke the other. The only remedy is in a revival of our liturgy and symbols, to clear them of all those parts on which these Popish errors are hung. They should not be suffered any longer, like the children of the captive Jews of old, to speak 'half in the speech of Ashdod.'"

A clergyman is suffered to speak in this way: perhaps he receives a rebuke from some Church editor, and the matter drops. A Rev. D. D. in the West publishes a work in which he shows how "unevangelical" and Popish some portions of the Prayer Book are, and suggests alterations. Another, D. D. holding the same opinions, omits a portion of the appointed service on occasions of baptism. The book is reviewed by one of the Church papers, the author is rebuked by others, and nothing more is said or done. There seems to be no fear that any of the clergy will go over to the sects—little or no fear that the people will be taught doctrines which are contrary to the standards of the church. But if the clergyman who holds and teaches that the Prayer Book is too Protestant, and ought to be altered so as to conform to the Romish ritual, violates his ordination vows,—we ask by what process of reasoning it can be shown that the clergyman who holds and teaches that the Prayer Book is too Popish, and ought to be altered, so as to conform to the theological opinions of the denominations around us,—does not violate his ordination vows also?

We do not mean here to discuss the two systems. We are not here pretending to deny that Romanism is a more dangerous error than Puritanism. We simply assert that if the Church be in danger from either of the two it is from the latter—and we bring in proof of the assertion, the fact that the large body of the clergy and laity are—as they should be—watchful against any tendency to Romanism,—and yet proof after proof of the existence of a Puritanizing spirit among us may be exhibited, and cause no excitement, no alarm. We do not see how it is possible—while there exists such a strong feeling against anything that has the least resemblance to Popery—for Romish errors to gain a foothold in the Church. Is there equal zeal and watchfulness against opposite errors? On which side then does danger lie? And if it be said that Newman has more followers than Noel, we reply that the former could not hold and teach his views and be at peace in the Church;—the latter believed for years precisely what he does now, except in one point, viz:—that he ought to leave the Church.

Romanizers soon find that Churchmen will not endure their presence. "Puritanizers" are suffered to remain and propagate their errors. From which are we in danger!—Gos. Mess.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN SAILORS' SOCIETY.—The annual meeting was held on Friday evening, April 27th, in the large room of the City of London Tavern. From the Report we gather the following particulars:—

Considerable progress had been made during the past year, and there was a growing desire among Christians in the provincial ports, to labour in the cause, and become co-workers with the Society in the effort to evangelize the seamen. The provincial auxiliaries had continued to work with increased zeal, and with considerable success. In the sailors' church, in London, during the past year, five services in English, and occasionally two in German or Danish, had been conducted weekly; and out of the gross number of more than 28,000 visits paid to this church, nearly 13,000 of them had been those of seamen. The Welsh agent of the Society had conducted his labours among his countrymen with much success, and the efforts of the foreign missionary had also been continued. During the year, 707 meetings, attended by 10,405 seamen, had been held on board ships; while the services on shore amounted to 2,542, at which 39,951 seamen had attended, 51,647 visits had been paid to ships, and 7,532 to lodging houses. There had been 3,975 visits to seamen's families, and 746 to sick seamen. 5,003 English Bibles and Testaments, 415 Welsh, and 1,406 foreign Bibles, &c., had been circulated, as also an immense number of tracts and magazines. By various retrenchments, the directors had effected a permanent of £300 a year upon the outlay, while the total reduction for the present year might be anticipated to be at least £400. The total receipts for the year amounted to £3,512 13s. 7d., and the expenditure to £3,494 1s. 11d., leaving a balance of £18 11s. 8d., while the liabilities of the Society amounted to £924 4s. 2d.

LUTHER AND HIS DYING CHILD.—He approached the bed, and said to her, "My dear little daughter, my beloved Margaret, you would willingly remain with your earthly parent; but, if God calls you, you will also go to your heavenly father."

She replied, "Yes dear father; it is as God pleases."

"Dear little girl," he exclaimed, "oh how I love her!—the spirit is willing but the flesh is weak."

He then took the bible and read to her the passage, "Thy dead men shall live, together with my dead body shall they arise. Awake and sing ye that dwell in the dust, for thy dew is as the dew of herbs, and the earth shall cast out the dead."

He then said, "My daughter, enter thou into thy resting-place in peace."

She turned her eyes towards him and said, with touching simplicity, "Yes father."—Luther's Life and Times.

The third quarterly meeting of the Schuylkill Convocation was held last week in Mauch Chunk and Tamaqua, and at both places excited considerable interest. The first religious service was held at the former place on Monday evening 11th inst. commencing at 8 o'clock.

Prayers were said by Rev. Dr. Morgan, and the Convocation sermon was preached by Rev. Mr. Mintzer, Dr. Morgan following in a short but forcible exhortation from the Chancel.

Divine service was again celebrated on Tuesday morning commencing at 10 o'clock.

Prayers were said by Rev. Mr. Miles from Wilkesbarre, assisted by Rev. Mr. Starkey, and the sermon was preached by the Bishop, who had also preached the evening before at Summit Hill, nine miles from Mauch Chunk (the site of the old mines). After the sermon the Bishop administered the Holy Rite of Confirmation to two persons.

Divine service was celebrated in the afternoon commencing at 3 o'clock.

Prayers were said by Rev. Messrs. Beatty and Lightner. The sermon was preached by Rev. Mr. Downing, the Bishop following with an exhortation.

Divine service was again celebrated in the evening, commencing at 8 o'clock. Prayers were said by Rev. Mr. Neidé, and the sermon was preached by Rev. Mr. Starkey.

On Wednesday morning Divine service commenced at 10 o'clock.

Prayers were said by Rev. Messrs. Leaf and Mintzer. The Ante-communion service was read by Rev. Dr. Morgan, who also preached the sermon and administered the Holy Communion to the Clergy present. The Rev. Mr. Russell, (Rector of the Parish) assisted by Rev. Mr. Mintzer administering to the congregation.

The congregations at Mauch Chunk were good, and seemed interested in the services, which, we hope, will yet produce fruit by God's blessing. We cannot say good-bye to this pleasant town, without a tribute to the Christian kindness of its church people, who did every thing in their power to make the clergy feel at home. St. Mark's Church, is a beautiful and church-like edifice, solemn and tasteful, reflecting credit on the Rector, congregation, and the talented gentleman who furnished the design, and superintended its execution.

From Mauch Chunk the Convocation adjourned to Tamaqua, distant 14 miles, where a congregation has been gathered together by Rev. Mr. Beatty, and a church organized under the title of Mount Calvary church.

Divine service was held at the Town Hall on Wednesday evening commencing at 8 o'clock.

Prayers were said by Rev. Messrs. Cooley and Leaf. The sermon was preached by Rev. Mr. Miles, and was followed by an exhortation from Rev. Mr. Leaf.

Divine service was again celebrated on Thursday morning commencing at 10½ o'clock. Prayers were said by Rev. Messrs. Russell and Mintzer. The Ante-communion service was read by Rev. Mr. Beatty and the sermon preached by Rev. Mr. Leaf. The Holy Communion was administered by Rev. Mr. Beatty.

Divine service was again celebrated in the evening commencing at 8 o'clock. Prayers were said by Rev. Messrs. Starkey and Morgan.

The sermon was preached by Rev. Mr. Lightner, and exhortations were made to the congregation by Rev. Messrs. Neidé, Downing, Mintzer and Beatty.

The congregations at Tamaqua were unusually large and attentive, and scarce a doubt can be entertained that the church there is destined to flourish. The town is growing rapidly, and will soon become the centre of a very large and important trade. May God visit with a rich blessing, the efforts of its zealous missionary, and enable him to plant firmly the banner of the cross in this important portion of the coal region. S.

ADDRESS

From the Schuylkill Convocation to the several Congregations within its limits.

BELOVED BRETHREN:

The Schuylkill Convocation, in laying before you an outline of its nature and aims, with the claim which it has upon your active sympathies, comes before you at the same time with the sanction of our Bishop's approbation; apart from which, it professes to do nothing.

The Convocation is composed of the clergy canonically resident within the counties of Montgomery, Berks, Schuylkill and Carbon. It was organized in December last in the city of Reading, at the suggestion of the Bishop, who is ex-officio its President, and its regular meetings are held once in three months, commencing on the afternoon of the second Monday in March, June, September and December.

At each regular meeting, besides the private sessions, public religious services are celebrated. The private sessions are for the transaction of necessary business, and for mutual counsel and advice, on matters connected with ministerial and parochial duties. The public exercises are designed to arouse and invigorate the religious life of our congregations.

It is not however to be supposed that these results even when obtained—if by the blessing of God they may be—are to be final, they should rather be looked upon as the first and necessary stages in the work which the Convocation is called upon to perform.—Having been called into existence with the view of giving strength to the Church and efficiency to its efforts, in a word, increasing its power for good, it is evident that as this power increases and the enterprise gives tokens of success, the Convocation would prove faithless to its stewardship, and would labour to no end, should it not with the increase of interest and means, enlarge at the same time its share of usefulness. It is our wish, Brethren, that this enterprise, commenced and carried on, as we trust, in the fear of God and in dependence on His blessing, should not be permitted thro' our negligence to die. It seems to us, your overseers in the Lord, that it presents, if properly carried out, great aptitude for good; but in order to be effective, it must have your sympathy and co-operation.

The religious services which will be held in rotation in the different parishes, will engage your attention, will excite your interest, will awaken you to a sense of your privileges, and rouse in you a desire to do something on your part for the spread of these privileges to the destitute around and about you. Thus, Brethren, the first stage will be accomplished, when we all arrive at a due sense of our duties and responsibilities.

With the awakening of this spirit then a great point will have been gained. There is indeed ample power in the various congregations included within the four counties, to do much for the building up of Christ's Church; it is only necessary, that by the awakening of your interest this power should be made available; when this state of things shall have been brought about, it will become the duty of the Convocation, with the Bishop's approval and consent, to suggest the mode of its appliance, and then the question may be fairly tested: "What can this Convocation do for the cause of Christ?"

This, then, Brethren, is the aim of the Convocation. First,—The promotion of a spirit of Unity and Enterprise in the Clergy, by means of frequent meetings, wherein may be had an interchange of counsels and views.

Secondly,—The arousing of a right religious spirit in the congregations, by means of solemn, earnest, orderly and lawful religious exercises, which spirit will manifest itself in religious activity.

Thirdly and ultimately,—The engaging unitedly, in some systematic plan for promoting the cause of Christ's Church in this portion of the Diocese.

From this brief sketch, Brethren, you may perceive how necessary your co-operation is to the carrying out of the main designs of the Convocation, how limited must be our power for good, if you withhold your assistance and sympathies, and how vast a field of usefulness opens before us, inviting our christian enterprise and urging us to harmonious action. In the four counties included within our limits, is a population of 200,000 souls, and to meet the spiritual wants of these, we have about 4,000 sittings, whilst in some neighborhoods whole districts are destitute of any religious instruction whatever. If in view of this spiritual destitution, and for its mitigation, we have as a christian body any resources, however small, to draw upon, if we possess, or can attain to the prudence necessary to husband what we have, and if these resources well managed and economically administered, need but the christian's zeal and love to render them available to plant a church or send a missionary to some uncultivated spot in the great vineyard; shall we thro' our neglect or apathy or selfishness, forfeit the glorious privilege of doing something for the cause of our dear Master; or, if we do, what must be our judgment in the great day when Christ shall come to reckon with His servants?

On the 17th June, the Bishop of the Diocese visited the parish of Rutherfordton.

In the morning, after the usual services, the Rev. Jarvis Buxton was admitted to the Holy Order of Priesthood. The candidate was presented by Rev. J. C. Huske, minister of Grace Church, Morganton, who, with the Rev. Mr. Watson, of Plymouth, and the Rev. Mr. Shepherd, of Lake Scuppernon, assisted in the laying on of hands: sermon preached by Rev. Mr. Watson, from St. Jude, 11th verse.

In the afternoon, two adults and one child were baptized by the minister of the parish, and the apostolic rite of confirmation administered to eight persons. Sermon by the Bishop, from Mark iv. 28.

The consecration of the new church at this place was unavoidably deferred till the next Episcopal visitation.

CORNER STONE AT WALTHAM.—The corner stone of Christ church, Waltham, was laid on Saturday, 16th inst, by the Rt. Rev. the Bishop of the Diocese, according to the admirable Form of Prayer set forth by him. After the introductory address and collects, notice was given by the minister of the parish of the deposits made in the leaden box and placed within the stone, as follows: A Bible, the Book of Common Prayer, the Journal of Convention of this Diocese in the year 1849, the "Second Charge" of the Rt. Rev. the Bishop of the Diocese before the Convention of this year, the Journals of early Conventions from 1784 to 1828 inclusive, a Tract published by the Tract Committee of this Diocese, entitled "The Stranger in the Church," the "Christian Witness" of June 15, "The Protestant Churchman" of June 16, and a parchment, of which the following is a copy: "This Corner Stone of Christ Church, Waltham, was laid the 16th day of June, in the year of our Lord 1849, by the Rt. Rev. Manton Eastburn, D. D., Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church, in the Diocese of Massachusetts." The parish of Christ Church, Waltham, was organized Feb. 9th, 1849. It was admitted into union with the other parishes of the Diocese at the meeting of the Convention of this year. The clergyman officiating since last November till the present time is the Rev. Albert Clarke Patterson, having care of "the Mission at large in the vicinity of Boston."

After the impressive conclusion of the address, the choir, with the large assemblage present, sang with great animation the noble Hymn of Ages, the "Gloria in Excelsis;" they were then dismissed by the Bishop, with the blessing, and separated with hearts full of solemn joy, and with many congratulations for the happy day.

The next day, Sunday, the Bishop passed in Waltham, preaching morning and afternoon in the Hall occupied by the congregation of Christ Church, which was entirely filled by a most attentive and delighted congregation of worshippers. The Bishop also read the Ante-Communion service in the morning, and catechised the children in the afternoon. And thus closed an important first visitation to this parish, which will long be remembered with pleasure and profit by the large concourse who had the privilege of being present at the several interesting services of the occasion.—Witness.

NEW YORK.

Episcopal acts by the Bishop of Maryland, for and on behalf of the Diocese of New York.

ORDINATION.—On Wednesday, June 20, in St. Philip's Church, New York, the Bishop admitted Rev. Samuel V. Berry, Deacon officiating in said church, to the order of Priesthood. Morning prayer was said by Rev. Benjamin Evans, and the lessons were read by Rev. Wm. Walton. The Epistle was read by Rev. Dr. Berrian. In the administration of the Communion, the Bishop was assisted by Rev. Drs. Berrian and Seabury, and Rev. Thomas Clark, who, together with the Rev. Dr. Vinton, united in the imposition of hands. The ordination sermon was preached by the Bishop from 1 Thess. iv. 8. The Rev. S. D. Turner, from Kingston, Jamaica, and Rev. Hiram Jelliff, were also present at the services.—Churchman.

Clerical Changes.

The Rev. Charles Aldis, of the Diocese of New Jersey, has received and accepted a unanimous call to the Rectorship of Christ Church, Detroit, Michigan. Mr. Aldis proposes to commence his duties at Detroit, on the first day of July next.

The Rev. Geo. L. Neide has taken charge of the Church of the Holy Apostles, St. Clair, Schuylkill co., Pa., and requests that all letters and papers for him be directed accordingly.

THE JEWS.

JEWS IN THE UNITED STATES.—The recent revolutions in Europe are already largely swelling the number of Jewish Emigrants to this country. And a new spirit of interest and effort in behalf of Judaism is manifesting itself in various quarters. Schools for the education of Jewish youth are multiplying and taking an elevated stand. Synagogues are being founded in all the large towns. One was dedicated to the "God of Israel" in Philadelphia, on the 29th of March, and another, in Louisville, Kentucky, on the 30th. In Cincinnati, a few years since, one hundred pounds of passover cakes supplied all the Jews of that city during the passover season; now upwards of 20,000 pounds are necessary. On the 11th of June next, a general convention of delegates from all the Jewish congregations in the United States, is to meet in New York, to deliberate upon the best methods of promoting the cause and interests of Judaism in this land.—Chr. Inst.

THE AMERICAN BOARD.—The receipts of the American Board of Foreign Missions, during the eight months ending April 1st, amounted to $197,491.

Let others say and do what they will; I must love. The obloquy, or ill-usage of others, is my opportunity for self-inspection.

LETTERS FROM HOME.

(Written during convalescence from long illness.)

From home! Ah yes—the old familiar seals!
 The letters traced by hands, whose friendly touch
 In other days so oft has met my own,
 Ah! then a ten days journey was a theme
 For starting tears and farewells oft repeated.
 Now (solemn thought) the mighty Earth disparts us—
 The Earth, with all her torrents, floods and hills,
 Her silent deserts, ever-rolling seas,
 Her mighty caverns, and the hidden fires
 That burn forever, deep within her bosom.
 And these, Love's faithful messengers, have sped
 Their wave-toss'd way o'er twice ten thousand miles.
 Ye gentle visitants, why stir me thus?
 Why strives my heart in vain to still its throbs?
 Why do I long, yet dread, to break your seals,
 And tremble at the touch? Poor fragile things!
 The lightest wind that urge you o'er the deep
 Might waft you on its wings beyond my reach,
 Meet emblems of the thoughts ye bear and breathe;
 As frail as hope, as light as is a sigh,
 Brief as a dream of home—as brief and sweet,
 Silent as evening mem'ries of the past—
 Silent, yet fill'd with words most eloquent—
 Fill'd with sweet visions of a far, fair land:
 In you I breathe the odour of its flowers—
 In you I hear the music of its streams—
 In you I see again its hallowed scenes.
 And, more than these, the voices of the lov'd
 Speak to me from your folds, in tones as soft,
 As low, as clear, and far more sweet than those,
 That murmur in the shell, which ever yields
 The native music of its ocean-home.

Selections.

We copy, with very great pleasure, the following article from "THE COLONIAL CHURCH CHRONICLE AND MISSIONARY JOURNAL." Although our readers are acquainted with most of the facts stated, yet we are sure, they will be gratified by the kind feelings expressed, and stimulated by the approbation bestowed from those whose good opinion and praise are so highly to be esteemed.

In this connexion, we are most happy to state that the sum of $1000 for which we have often asked, and not in vain, is nearly made up. The promised contributors will be glad to learn that we shall soon call upon them for their offerings in this behalf.

ED. BANNER.

THE NASHOTAH MISSION OF THE AMERICAN CHURCH.

The well-being and extension of the American Church cannot fail to interest deeply all English Churchmen. There are ties between us which draw us closely together, though many a lonely league of the "Oceanus dissociabilis" be stretched between us: we are sprung of the same stock, we offer the same prayers and in the same English tongue, and if the honour of Seabury's Consecration was, to our shame, yielded to the sister Church of Scotland, yet his colleagues, White, Provoost, and Madison, received their Commission at Lambeth. It is not that we love other Churches less; but there is no Donatism in loving these more. Therefore we may especially be glad and thankful to see the unequivocal signs of vigour which the Nashotah Mission exhibits; a sample, we trust, of the manner in which the Missionary work is done by the American Church elsewhere.

In the triangle formed by the vast lakes Superior and Michigan, and the Upper Mississippi, is included the territory of Wisconsin. Eight years ago, the only inhabitants, besides the Aborigines, were a few backwoodsmen who had come westward to escape the poverty of over-crowded cities; but in this short time the whole face of the country has been changed by the perpetual influx of new settlers, and the territory has become one of the States of the Union. Happily the work of the Church began while the field was thinly peopled, and has been continued with remarkable success. "In 1847," says the Report of the Diocese of Wisconsin to the General Convention, "we organize, as a Diocese, with 22 settled and working Clergymen: with 25 organized parishes; and 2,744 individuals enrolled on parish registers; with 969 communicants; with 407 children under catechetical instruction. You will further perceive that 1,123 persons, including infants and adults, have been baptized; that 393 have been confirmed; that $1,614 have been contributed for charitable purposes, and that $28,400 have been expended in the erection of places for public worship. Constituted now a Diocese, and entering upon a glorious career, with a Bishop elect, the choice of all, the happiest results are anticipated." When we recollect that in 1841 there were but seven Clergymen and two or three churches, we can but wish that the needs of our increasing population were as well met in England.

But it is rather to the way in which this work has been done, and is doing, that we would call our reader's attention. The main instrument, under God, by which the good seed has been sown, and carefully tended, is the Mission-school, or Brotherhood (so it is called) of Nashotah. It was founded by its present head, the Rev. James Lloyd Breck, who came with two companions in 1841 into Wisconsin, then, as we have said, little better than a wilderness. No doubt they bore in mind, "If one prevail against him, two shall withstand him; and a threefold cord is not quickly broken." They remembered how the Seventy went out two and two, and returned with great joy, and they trusted that the more closely they could imitate those first Missionaries, the more they might look for the blessing of their common Master. Accordingly, their plan has been to have a home to which they might return from their circuits, which should serve also as a School for the education of candidates for Holy Orders, and consequently as a standard and encouragement for the rest of the Diocese. At home their operations are of this kind: the Brotherhood wait upon themselves, and being accustomed, most of them, to agriculture, make a small farm attached to the Mission very productive; it is good that they who have chosen the rough path of Missionary life should learn to take harder living as their ordinary lot. Daily Service is observed, not without the beauty of music, and discipline is strictly kept: no one at any time of the year is allowed to be absent over two weeks at a time, and those who are not candidates or teachers, over one week. In September of last year they had twenty-eight students upon the ground, and more were expected to join in the winter. The young Brethren aid in teaching some of their own body, and conduct (four of them for three hours a-day each) a parish school, numbering sixty pupils; and they do this work so well that youths are sent from the towns on Lake Michigan, a considerable distance, and are boarded in families living on the Mission grounds, in order that they may have the advantage of this education under Mr. Breck's supervision. There were sixteen of these boarders last September, and Mr. Breck, with the ready tact of a man who turns all his materials to the best account, is training them as a nucleus for an Academical department, which will occupy buildings situated apart from those allotted to the Theological students, but under constant superintendence day and night. In the summer, the strictly Missionary labours of the Nashotah Clergy commence; study is for a while suspended, and it appears that part of the Brotherhood attend more exclusively to the work of their farm, while the Clergy set forth on their journeys. Like another band of Israelites, their way lies through the wilderness; like them, they go out "harnessed;" but with the peaceful armour of righteousness, as warriors of the Cross; and like them they carry their Tent-chapel, wherein they may offer the morning and evening sacrifice of prayer and praise; and though the pillar of cloud and of fire goes not before them, nor rests visibly on their Tabernacle, yet in very truth the unseen armies of God are about them, and He Himself as certainly present as when His glory shone most brightly on the Mercy-seat. Thus they take their journey from one lonely settlement to another;—

"And where, at dawn, the prairie fox did bark,
 Are heard, at night, sweet canticle and chaunt:
 Where sung before no choirist, but the lark,
 Ring out the Church's anthems jubilant."

Welcome they are to all; for when sound words, and prayers, and rites are rare, they are prized; their coming is longed for by converts, and by hardy backwoodsmen, by parents of unbaptized children, by new comers, and by more familiar faces; and many a hearty "God speed" is bidden them when, after the next morning has heard the "sweet canticle and chaunt" again offered, the tent is struck, and the Missionaries move onwards. They have sent from Nashotah lay-readers, licensed by the Bishop, to different stations, three of whom have been ordained to serve the people among whom they have been working. The Report quoted above, speaks thus in testimony of the Missionaries educated in this school of the prophets:—"Their untiring efforts in the cause of our Master; their self-devotion, zeal, and perseverance, under impoverished circumstances, prove them to have been taught that uncomplaining self-denial is one of the first duties of a Christian Minister; while their presenting the Church as she is in the Liturgy is an evidence of the soundness of their faith." Those who have been accustomed to go barefoot are not afraid to walk on flints.

Their success among the Red Indians of the Oneida tribes, hitherto, it is believed, almost impenetrable by any attempts to Christianize them, has been remarkable; and of Europeans they number among their communicants Swedes, Norwegians, Danes, Swiss, and, which comes nearer home to us, Welshmen; while nearer still, there has been organized a parish composed of English Dissenters, who have by the efforts of a lay-reader become Churchmen. Next month it is our intention to print a most interesting letter by Mr. Breck, which we have received, entering into some particulars of the Mission with a freshness and simplicity which we cannot induce ourselves to spoil by presenting it in a mutilated form.

It is much to be wished that the Missionary Societies formed by members of the Church here in England, would follow the good example of kindred societies in America. The first Missionary Society there was originated by the present Bishop of Missouri,† in 1812, "for the advancement of Christianity in Pennsylvania;" in 1820, a more extensive Society was composed, to meet, as well as might be, the increasing calls at home and abroad. The government of it was strictly according to that Apostolic rule, "Let nothing be done without the Bishop." Its state, however, was but feeble for several years, when a few active Clergymen and laymen made great efforts, and with very encouraging success. At last, in 1835, at the General Convention, it was ordered by the joint action of the Society and of the two Houses of Convention, that it should be re-organized according to a plan which is now in force, and not likely to be superseded. Every baptized person is a member of the Society; in other words, it is co-extensive with the Church, and thus is asserted that much forgotten principle, that the Faith is given to men in trust for others. The General Convention, at its triennial meetings, appoints a Board of thirty members, who with the Bishops, are called the "Board of Missions," meeting annually, which Board appoints a Committee of four Clergymen, and four laymen for domestic, and a similar one for foreign Missions. Every Bishop has a right to attend the meetings of the Committees. The board appoints for each Committee a Secretary, and a general Agent; the business of the latter being to collect information, conduct correspondence, and devise plans of operation, subject of course to the Committee's approval. No Clergyman can be appointed to a Mission without his Bishop's recommendation, nor of course sent to officiate in any Diocese, without the Diocesan's sanction. Thus by judicious subdivision of responsibility and labour, the whole of the work is directly done by the Church: and funds are supplied by the Offertory, a practice revived by Bishop Doane, in 1833, and certainly the best means of collecting (to say nothing of its Apostolical origin), at least to secure permanency. That which is happily called "the religious world," must have some kind of excitement to live upon: while it needs the sustaining principle of steady-mindedness, (steadfastness,) to induce a man to keep on, month by month, or week by week, laying by for one object. By this systematic method of contribution and government, the American Church has a unity of operation which cannot fail to produce continued fruit.

And the steady and quiet extension of the Church in Wisconsin is doubtless to be numbered among the fruits of the establishment of the "Board of Missions." But it would be withholding praise, where praise is due, to forget how much Wisconsin owes to Mr. Breck. He gave himself in heart and intention to the work when quite young, and when the time came he "hated" his father and mother, and left the many comforts and refinements which wealthy American homes can supply. He has been allowed to see—what would be dangerous to a heart less well regulated than his—the seed he has sown grow up into a plentiful harvest. And what is the secret of his success? No doubt, the simple straightforwardness of a mind which knows it is at God's work, and never dreams of doubting that He will give or withhold visible blessing as seemeth Him fit; no doubt, the absence of self; no doubt, his faithful unwavering prayers, and whatever can be included in one word, Faith. But there is one principle besides all these, the want of which goes far to mar the good they would work: yet it is much forgotten. He has taught positively, not saying, "That is an error; avoid it;" but, "This is the Truth; follow it." Teaching, which depends almost for its very existence on controversy, will not lead to the most excellent gift of charity; it destroys the singleness of mind and purpose, needful to all Christians, but especially to Missionaries; to honest and good hearts it is, at least, unsatisfying, and, if it prove not repulsive, will turn their sweet into bitter. Those who have read, as all should, the Bishop of New Zealand's Charge, will remember how he deprecates controversy; his course is a kindred one to Mr. Breck's and we doubt not that the success of both is attributable, in a great measure, under God, to the same positive teaching. That it has been Mr. Breck's principle our readers shall judge next month from his own letter, not indeed from any distinct avowal that such is his principle, but from the undesigned evidence which the entire absence of any controversial spirit supplies.

For Our Young Readers.

WILLIE, THE CABIN-BOY.*

The anchor was heaved, the sails were furled, and the gallant ship went down the river; while Tom stood on deck, watching his father, and waving his hat to him, until the old man's gray hairs were lost in the distance. Tom was much liked generally by his messmates; but his chief favorite was a little lad called "Willie," who, almost too slight and gentle for a sailor's life, was much roughed about, and not always very kindly treated by the rest of the crew. But Tom had ever shown him more consideration, and now the little cabin-boy came up to him directly upon his arrival on board, and rejoiced to find himself once more under Tom's protection.

Prosperously the gallant ship sped on her way; and during the long summer evenings, when, though the sun had set, the lingering twilight almost supplied its place, Tom used to read in his Prayer Book in some retired corner, where he could be undisturbed by the riotous conversation of his messmates. He had commenced this plan of reading it regularly, chiefly in accordance with his father's wishes; but gradually a new light broke in upon his mind, and not having any Bible of his own, he eagerly sought its help to enable him to do his duty better; and ere long he was led to perceive that his former mode of life, though unstained by the commission of actual vice, fell far short of the Christian standard, and would continue to do so until he should steadfastly try to follow the example of his Saviour in all things.

About a week after they set sail the little cabin-boy was suddenly taken very ill with an inflammatory attack, which left him so weak, that the doctor feared he would never recover. During his sickness the little lad clung to Tom as his best friend, who spent every moment he could spare by Willie's sick bed, and nursed him almost as tenderly as his own mother could have done.

The boy dearly loved to talk of serious things, and he showed Tom a New Testament formerly given to him at the Sunday school, and which bore marks of much reading and many tears,—for poor Willie's portion in life had been one of great hardship; yet had a blessing rested upon it; for by weaning his thoughts from earth, and making him feel that he must not look for happiness in this life, but in that better life—in that better world to which his kind parents were already gone; it had fitted him to meet the solemn change which was now drawing near with rapid strides.

One afternoon Tom had been absent from him for some hours, and when he entered the cabin where Willie's cot was placed, he was struck by the great change which had passed over the boy's wasted features. "I am so glad you are come, Tom," said the little fellow, whose eyes brightened on seeing him; "for, do you know, I think I shall not last much longer; my breathing is getting worse and worse, and the doctor said just now he was afraid it would never be any better. Will you read to me once more out of your Prayer Book, Tom?" "Yes, my boy, I shall be only too glad to do anything for you; for you have done your best to be a good lad, and I shall miss you very much when you are gone."

Tom took out his book, and was turning over its pages, when Willie said, very faintly, "Read the service for the dying, Tom. Is there not a prayer for those who die at sea?"

Then Tom looked up at him much alarmed, and perceiving directly that death must be very near, he proposed calling the captain or the doctor.

* From "The History of a Prayer Book," by Miss H. M. Rathbone. (Seeley's.) A simple and interesting narrative, illustrating the use and value of our Scriptural Liturgy.—Ed.

"No," said the boy, in a whisper; "give my love to them all when I am gone, but let me die alone with you, Tom; and let me sit up, that I may breathe easier."

Tom raised and supported him with a strong arm, whilst in a faltering voice he proceeded to read the Commendatory Prayer for a sick person at the point of departure. Willie asked for another, and he turned to the lesson from the fifteenth chapter of the First Epistle to the Corinthians, which for hundreds of years has afforded consolation to so many bereaved and solitary hearts. When he came to the end Willie repeated after him the words, "Thanks be to God, which giveth us the victory, through our Lord Jesus Christ." He then struggled hard for breath, and looking up in Tom's face, said, "Thank you much for all your kindness to me, Tom; and please, Tom, give my love to Dora." He paused, and Tom replied, "I will, I will, bless you, Willie, for thinking of her now." As he spoke he felt the boy's head lean more heavily on his shoulder, and the next moment perceived that his young spirit had departed.

Tom tenderly kissed the poor lad's forehead, and cut off a lock of the dark brown hair which clustered in rich curls upon the young open brow, where an expression of undisturbed, holy peace already rested, speaking of a world beyond the tomb. He did indeed miss the young companion, whose loving ways and cheerful talk had beguiled many of those weary hours which sometimes press heavily upon the sailor's monotonous course of existence; and Willie's early and happy death deepened the religious impressions which he had been for some time imbibing, and which now began to permanently influence his daily life.

THE FISHERMAN'S WIFE.

A SWEDISH STORY.

On a beautiful summer morning, a young man about twenty years old, with an open, smiling agreeable countenance, seated himself on one of those small light carriages used by travellers in Sweden. After having placed his well-corded portmanteau behind him he took the reins in his hand, and left the town of Calmar, casting a friendly look of farewell, on the moss-covered ramparts, the drawbridges, and the ditches of this old city. As soon as he was in the open country, he abandoned the reins to the driver seated by his side, and gave himself up to meditation. He had been very lately ordained to the priesthood, in the Cathedral of Calmar, one of the finest and most important existing in Sweden. He had just been appointed vicar, or to use a Swedish term, adjunct, in a considerable parish on the sea coast, in the province of Blaking, and was proceeding to his post; it was Sunday. It was on that day he was to preach his first sermon, and as Calmar was at no great distance from the place of his destination, he hoped to arrive there in time to take his part in the Divine service.

Some business had detained him in the town longer than he had intended, but he had agreed to be at his Church on that Sunday, and he travelled free from care. The sun was just rising, and illuminating with its rays all that beautiful Swedish country. The birds were singing, and the further the young man advanced, the more fresh and smiling the prospect appeared. Arrived at Kernaby, where he was to take another horse, he left the post-boy to drive the carriage, and went on foot through the park, which reached nearly to the village of Vernanes. There are few situations in Sweden which present so many attractions as this. It was there the great Oxenstiern was born, and the memory of this celebrated man lends it an additional charm. The adjunct went through the meadow by a path winding under a majestic avenue of oaks. He walked slowly, contemplating the infinite goodness of God, which shines forth in so many ways, and reveals itself above all in the works of Nature. His heart prayed in silence; then he thought over the sermon which he had to preach. He could not remember the pages which he had written, but he felt his mind peculiarly well attuned for teaching his brethren, and for speaking to them of morality and virtue. He thus reached the road which lies between Vernanes and the coast. He had not hitherto met a single human being, and he was walking pensively along the sandy road when he perceived a little girl about twelve years old, dragging a cart filled with linen and children's clothes. This girl had a pale, serious interesting countenance. He begged her to show him the direction he ought to pursue, and she led him by many turnings to a spot from whence he could clearly see his road. He thanked the young girl, whose civility and artless candour had interested him, and quitted her with regret.

He soon arrived near the Church where his solemn duties were to commence, and his heart beat more rapidly. Suddenly he perceived a man coming towards him, hat in hand, and who politely saluting him, asked if he had the honour of addressing the adjunct. On the young man's answering in the affirmative the stranger said to him,

"I am sent by the pastor to request you will go immediately to the sister parish, situated on the sea-coast. The chaplain of this parish is ill, and Divine Service must be performed there to-day."

"Very well," said the adjunct, "I will go."

At the same moment he was joined by the post-boy who fortunately knew the road, and who conducted him to a fisherman's hut, from whence the Priest got on board a large boat, which took him to the place pointed out to him. He soon saw the white walls of the chapel, standing amidst the green landscape.

When he left the boat he was struck by the wretched appearance of a small cabin, before which were grouped six or eight ragged children, who looked at him with curiosity. "What!" said he to himself, "such clothes on a Sunday! But perhaps the poor things have no others." He knew the poverty of the inhabitants of this coast, and he approached the children with affectionate sympathy. The youngest was scarcely a year old, the eldest about nine or ten. By the resemblance of their features, it was easy to see that they were all of the same family, and if their clothes were tokens of their poverty, their faces showed, nevertheless, a praiseworthy cleanliness.

"Where are your parents, my dear children?" asked the young Priest.

"Our father," answered the eldest, "is at sea, and our mother is gone to Church, for it is Sunday to-day."

"Yes, my children, it is Sunday to-day. And you—are not you coming to Church?"

"No," replied the little boy in a sturdy tone.

"And why not then?"

"Because we have no other clothes but what we have on, and our mother will not let us be seen dressed so badly on a Sunday."

"What does it matter, my dear children, in what clothes you appear before God? If you do not go to church, how can you know His Holy Word?"

"Our mother repeats to us, when she comes back, what the Priest has said."

"Has your father been long at sea?"

"He went out fishing some days ago, and will probably return this evening."

"They go out fishing, then, in this place on a Sunday?"

"Yes, of course."

"Then there can be nobody at Church?"

"There will be all the people that were left, the old men, the old women, and the children, and my mother, who is the only one of the young women that was left behind, because she was ill, and because she had to look after my little sister Christina."

The priest cast a glance into the cabin. There was not a vestige of fire to be seen, not a cupboard, nothing which indicated that any food could be found there.

"Are all the inhabitants of this hamlet so poor?" said he.

"Poor! what does that mean?"

"I mean, have all the people of this place so little to eat?"

"We shall have quite enough, when our father returns, with his boat full of fish. But he has been a long while gone," added he, in a voice which betrayed his uneasiness.

"Your father has been several days gone then?"

"Since the beginning of the week, and that is a good while, one of our neighbours told us, that he saw him shipwrecked, and climbing up into another boat. We hope he will return this evening, and then you will hear shouts of joy: such leaping and dancing, and our father will bring us new clothes."

The young Priest asked no more questions, and went towards the Church, astonished at so much naiveté, and so much trust. "What sort of a congregation shall I find?" said he to himself, "but what does it matter? An assembly of decrepit old men, is still an assembly of brethren." At the door of the chapel he met a poor man with a pale and wearied countenance, who saluted him with deep respect. The chapel, which from a distance presented at the edge of the sea a tolerable smiling and picturesque aspect, appeared to him very dismal and gloomy, when he had crossed the threshold. Gaping walls, wooden pillars, worn-out and tottering benches met his eyes. About forty persons assembled within the temple arose at his approach, and looked at him in respectful silence. He sought the mother of the children whom he had just left, and could not perceive her. Her heart was seized with a sentiment of painful sadness. On whatever side he turned his eyes, he only beheld poverty-stricken people, with withered faces, half-closed eyes, wrinkled foreheads, white hair, and rags. The men could scarcely be distinguished from the women; the first had lost all manliness, the second everything feminine. Old age and misery had distorted all their limbs, and disfigured all their faces. At this moment, he remembered the sermon, which he had written with the enthusiasm of a young vicar, who was going to preach for the first time before his parishioners: he had thrown into it all the tender poetry of his soul, and all the flowers of rhetoric of the University. But how could he preach such a sermon before these poor people? He went into the vestry with this reflection, and found there an old man, who held the office of sexton, and bade him welcome. The young Priest desired him to go and give out the Psalms which were to be sung, and was astonished at the effect produced by the united voices of the people; not that one voice was more remarkable than another, but men and women joined together in this religious music, and produced harmonious sounds.

The Priest advanced with emotion to the altar to say the prayers, and looking on his congregation, he was struck with the new aspect, which it presented to him. The countenances were animated, the eyes sparkled. "The Spirit of the ALMIGHTY is with us," said he, and he gained more courage.

After having finished the service, he returned into the vestry, with a feeling of deep humility. "Behold there," he said to himself, "poor, destitute, suffering creatures, who expect some consolation from me. Oh, my God, come to my help. I am but a poor sinner, and I must preach Thy word to poor sinners like myself." He went up into the pulpit, in this religious frame of mind, his looks and his paleness betraying the depth of his emotions. At last he began to speak, and instead of preaching the solemn sermon which he had prepared at Calmar, he only offered up a humble and tender prayer; a prayer to God from the poor and feeble, to the God Who takes pity on all suffering, Who consoles all misery.

His congregation listened to him with profound attention: never had they perhaps heard a sermon delivered with such real feeling, and which was so well adapted to their position. The service ended, they waited at the door of the Church to thank their young pastor. As he was leaving the precincts of the chapel, he saw a young woman standing on a rock, with her eyes fixed on the waves of the gulf. It must be the mother of the poor children. He saluted her, and she respectfully returned his salutation, recognizing in him the preacher of that affecting sermon.

The Priest had eaten nothing all day, and determined to go and dine with this poor woman.

"Come," said he to her, "your children are waiting for you, —it is mid-day."

"And I," answered she, "am waiting for the arrival of the fishermen. My Eric is a bold seabird. If he is not drowned, he will soon return."

"Have confidence, my good woman; do not stay here any longer watching those wild waves. Come with me to your children."

"What! will our pastor indeed enter my poor cabin?"

"Yes, let us go."

She cast one more look at the sea, then followed the Priest with a feeling of gratitude. After having advanced a little way, they perceived the old sexton, who approaching the pastor with an eager air, said to him,

"Ah, sir, I have been looking for you everywhere, I have a favor to ask of you."

"Speak, friend," said the Priest.

"You know that our chaplain is ill, besides which the house which he occupies is a league off, and if you wish to dine with him, you would have to go on foot, for we poor fishermen have no horses. If our pastor would not disdain the hospitality of an old sexton, I could offer him a humble meal such as poor people can give."

"I thank you; I am not accustomed to splendid repasts."

"Ah! that is right; you will then condescend to enter that modest dwelling, pointing at the same time to the prettiest house in the village. You must know, however, that I am a widower, and keep but one servant."

"I thank you, my friend; but I am already invited to dinner."

"How!" said the sexton with a stupefied air, "already invited? Who has been beforehand with me? There is no one in this parish who could receive the pastor."

"I am going to dine with this woman and her children."

Nothing can express the surprise which these words produced. The poor woman looked at the Priest with a mingled expression of confusion and joy; the old sexton showed excessive mortification.

"With that woman?" said he, in a contemptuous tone, "do you know who she is?"

"I have never seen her before to-day."

"She has eight or nine children. I do not know if you will find a chair to sit on in her house, or what she will give you to eat; but I see what it is, gentlefolks like to joke."

"I am not joking; I know the wretchedness of this woman; I have already been in her house; I have seen her children. I am myself a poor servant of Him, Who has promised the joys of His heaven to those who suffer and are pious."

"But, sir, you do not know this woman, and I am ashamed to tell you, she is the most wretched creature in the parish. I am not speaking of her poverty, for we are all poor as far as that goes. I am not speaking either of her want of forethought, for no woman in her senses would have given birth to so many children. But her father. . . ."

"Oh, hush, hush, Olaf Svindson," cried the woman. And her countenance was overcast with an expression of dignified grief.

"Yes, yes, sir," added the sexton, "you ought to know with whom you are; for an old proverb says, He who touches pitch will be defiled. Her father was a thief, who was publicly whipped at Calmar. Everybody here knows it, and the sins of the fathers will be visited unto. . . ."

"Has this woman stolen from you?" said the pastor, casting a severe look on the sexton.

"Not at all, not at all; I must even say that she is an honest woman, and that if any one attacked her, I would be the first to defend her. I have known her from her childhood; it was I myself who taught her to sing. But I repeat it, her father was a thief; and moreover she is poor and unfortunate."

"Well, my friend," replied the pastor, "I will finish the sentence which you have begun. God says, 'I will visit the sins of the fathers upon the children of those who hate Me, but I will show mercy to them that love Me.' And I will add, that if the good works of the parents are of no avail to the children, who depart from the right road; the faults and the crimes of the parents cannot, either before God or man, fall on the children, who are good and virtuous. This woman is struggling with poverty, and this poverty is perhaps the consequence of the faults of her father, and partly, perhaps, of the culpable prejudice of the people of this parish; but God condemns your injustice, and will come to the succor of her whom you abandon. I am going with her to seek her children. I have not yet eaten anything to-day, and perhaps she has nothing to give me but. . . ."

The sexton made a bow, and went away, muttering, "I thought he would know how to make a distinction between people, but it is just like young priests are."

BEQUESTS.—The late Henry Todd, of Boston, after providing for his family, as a man should do first of all things, has made the following bequests: To the Massachusetts General Hospital, $5000—the interest of which is forever to go towards furnishing free beds (in addition to those now maintained) for those whose circumstances may require them. To the Boston Asylum and Farm School for Indigent Boys, he left a legacy of $3000. To the Boston Children's Friend Society, he gave $2000. The rest of his estate, amounting probably to some $10,000, he bequeathed to the Board of Education, for the benefit of the Massachusetts Normal Schools, in which he took a deep interest.

LATE ATTENDANCE ON PUBLIC WORSHIP.—"Late at Church" is the sure sign of a heart not right with God. To say nothing of the indecency of disturbing all the rest of their fellow-worshippers by their noisy footsteps, with what degree of reverence can such a man regard the presence of the high and holy One, of whom it may be said, "The Lord is in his holy Temple; let all the earth keep silence before him." How would these irreverent worshippers dare to intrude into the presence of their earthly sovereign with such a pledge of their contempt in their hand? No: they would fear to offend a King, but not the King of Kings. The manifold sins involved in a want of punctuality in the attendance in God's house, must make it to be regarded as one of the gravest evils resulting from this bad habit. Their own devotions are hindered,—those of others are disturbed,—their minister is grieved,—their God insulted,—and all for what? For a trifling indulgence of sloth or self-will, which in each instance a little resolution would overcome, though it would require a strict mental regimen to change the habit.—Rev. G. W. Baker.

To love mankind, knowing what they are, can be nothing but the work of Omnipotence and of God in man. I shall never love all mankind as I ought, till I hate myself.

Thank God for entrusting me with money to give, and much more for a will to give it. Woe be to me, if I keep back any part of it.

SATURDAY, JUNE 30, 1849.

THE BOARD OF MISSIONS.

Most unfortunately this important meeting occurred in the very hottest of this trying weather, and in a city from which some would undoubtedly be kept by fears of the Cholera. There are few practical subjects of more importance to the Church, and requiring more patient and careful deliberation, than the manner in which she is to sustain her Missions.

With a vast and almost unbounded Missionary field within her own borders, a land of promise white to the harvest stretching out from the Valley of the Mississippi to the shores of the Pacific, and every Diocese including Missionary ground, the growth and extension of the Church depend upon her Missionary spirit and faithfulness. By the appointment too of Foreign Missionary Bishops, she is pledged to sustain these, or to rob her commissioned apostles of the jurisdiction for which she has solemnly consecrated them.

Facts, which cannot be disputed, prove that neither our Foreign nor Domestic Missions are in that flourishing state which alone can give them proper vigor and efficiency. The sufferings of our Missionaries, in the domestic field, from the misery caused by irregularity or total failure in the payment of their small stipends, declare the state of this department. Then we have not half men enough in the field. Truly the harvest is great, but the laborers are few.

And one deplorable fact proves the feeble condition of our Foreign Missions. We mean the resignation of Bishop Southgate, extorted from him by want and privation. Surely it is a reproach to our Church, in the sight of God and before the world, that she should allow a Bishop to be driven from a glorious field of Missionary labor by hunger, cold, and nakedness. We understand a private letter from Bishop Southgate was read to the Board setting forth the sufferings to which both he and his family were exposed from down-right poverty and want. The question is not whether the Foreign Committee have discharged their duty in this case, but whether the Church has been faithful to the responsibilities assumed in the consecration and mission of Bishop Southgate? Let all who are interested in Foreign Missions be well assured that the whole cause will suffer in this lamentable failure. We hope that the evil may yet be averted. The matter has been rightly referred to the General Convention, and we trust that effective measures may yet be adopted to keep Bishop Southgate at his important post.

There seems to be a lack of confidence in our present Missionary system. We know not whether it extends to the organization, or reaches only to the administration. It will be seen that a resolution has been adopted and a committee appointed to consider the whole subject. We hope it will be fully and fairly presented to the Church, and then wisely and promptly acted upon. Confidence must be restored, or the system which does not inspire it must be broken up.

The following report professes only to give the substance of the proceedings of the Board, without following the exact order. Not having been present, we have made up the account from loose notes furnished by a friend.

THE ANNUAL MEETING OF THE BOARD OF MISSIONS.

This Board assembled in St. Bartholomew's Church, in the city of New York, on Wednesday morning, June 20th.

There were present, the Bishops of New Jersey, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, New Hampshire and Maine, with a number of the clerical and lay members. The Bishop of New Jersey, as senior Bishop, presided.

The annual Sermon was preached by the Bishop of New Hampshire, at the opening of the meeting of the Board. His text was from St. Matthew, xxii: 39, "And the second is like unto it, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself." It is said to have been a most admirable discourse. The Holy Communion was also administered.

After the meeting had been organized, the Secretaries presented their annual reports. These will in due time be presented to the Church. They were referred, as usual, to Committees who reported upon them, and also submitted resolutions in relation to them.

In reference to the urgent wants of the Committee, the following resolutions offered by Bishop Potter were adopted.

Resolved, That the grievous inconveniences to which the Missionaries and Missionary Bishops are subjected through delay in the transmission of funds, impose a solemn duty on the Churches to make their annual contributions at the earliest period, that thus the Domestic and Foreign Committees may be enabled to fulfil their engagements.

Resolved, That Advent Sunday be recommended as the appropriate time for receiving contributions for Domestic Missions.

The Rev. Charles Halsey, who has so faithfully and acceptably discharged the duties of Domestic Secretary, resigned his office. Mr. Halsey, as Rector of Christ Church, New York, finds sufficient employment in his growing Parish.

The following resolutions, offered also by Bishop Potter, were adopted.

Resolved, That this Board entertains a deep sense of the judgment and zeal with which their Secretaries have discharged their duties during the past as in former years, and they sincerely regret the necessity which compels one of them to retire from his post.

The following resolution was also adopted:

Resolved, That it be referred to the Domestic Committee to make such arrangements as they may deem necessary, to provide for the performance of the duties of the Secretary of the said Committee for the ensuing year.

The following resolution previously offered was lost.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Foreign Committee be requested to superintend the business in the office of the Domestic Committee during the following year.

The following important resolution, offered by the Rev. Dr. Mead, was carried.

Resolved, That a Committee, consisting of three Bishops, three clergymen, and three laymen, be appointed to consider whether any, and if any, what alteration ought to be made in the organization of the Board or of its Committees, so as to secure greater economy and efficiency.

The following were appointed upon the above Committee:

The Bishops of New Jersey, Rhode Island and Pennsylvania, Rev. Drs. Mead, Hawks and Ogilby, and Messrs. Gardiner, Newton and Huntington.

The Bishop of New Jersey, as chairman of the meeting, was made Chairman of this Committee by a resolution offered by Dr. Jarvis.

The Rev. Dr. Taylor having resigned from the Domestic Committee, the Committee on Vacancies nominated the Rev. Chas. Halsey, who was accordingly elected.

The most important matter brought before the Board was the resignation of Bishop Southgate.

The subject being discussed in the Board, the prevailing opinion was, that this was only to be settled by the General Convention. This was the purport of a resolution offered by the Committee to whom the matter had been referred.

Bishop Potter offered the following as a substitute, and it was adopted:

Resolved, That it is not expedient for the Board, at this time to act in respect to the tendered resignation of Bishop Southgate.

MISSIONARY MEETING.

After the adjournment of the Board, on Thursday afternoon, in the evening a Missionary Meeting was held in St. Bartholomew's. From reports that have reached us, there was a marked contrast between the temperature of the weather and the degree of Missionary zeal manifested on this occasion. In fact, the Missionary spirit seemed to have taken the Cholera, and was in such a state of collapse that three distinguished Drs. could not revive it. We must say to our New York friends that when they send to Philadelphia for speakers, if their own goodly city cannot supply the latter, they had better send here for some hearers also. The speakers on this occasion were the Rev. Drs. Tyng, Coleman and the Rev. Mr. C. Halsey. We should have been glad to publish the names of the auditors, only our reporter omitted to take the 'list.'

VALUABLE PREMIUM.

We find the following in "the Christian Observer," as a bait to catch new subscribers:

"For two new subscribers, and payment for the same within three months, we will send a copy of the HON. AND REV. BAPTIST W. NOEL'S WORK on the UNION OF CHURCH AND STATE."

In connection with the above, we give the following from the same paper, showing the kind of information upon which such persons usually base their judgments. It will rejoice many hearts, hostile to the Church, to find that there is a new Bishop of Exeter. Will the Observer inform us what has become of Dr. Philpotts?

"IMPRISONMENT FOR PREACHING.—Dr. Sibthorp, the Bishop of Exeter, has prosecuted and imprisoned the Rev. Mr. Shore, a clergyman who had seceded from the established Church of England, for the crime of preaching the gospel to a dissenting congregation, and the courts have decided that the decision is valid, and that Mr. S. is liable to the penalty, as the law is still in force. This proceeding has aroused public sentiment, and brought many petitions to Parliament, for the repeal of the law; and a bill for abolishing the abuse, is in progress through that body.

If not repealed, the Hon. and Rev. Baptist W. Noel will, no doubt, be liable to imprisonment: a London paper states that he recently addressed a Congregational church."

OLD LETTERS.

There are doubtless in the possession of many persons, in this country, many old documents and letters whose publication would tend to throw much light upon the characters of men and times now passed away. We shall always take pleasure in placing such documents upon record. The two following letters have been placed in our hands by a gentleman of this city. The first, from the Bishop of London, contains much sound and excellent advice. It also shows that the affairs of the Church in the colonies secured the deep interest of some, at least, in the Church at home. The second, though more of a personal kind, is interesting as an early memorial of Bishop White.

For Rev. Dr. Peters, at Pennsylvania.

FULHAM, AUG. 25, 1770.

REV. SIR:—I have taken a liberty with you, which perhaps I ought not to have done without previously knowing your sentiments. I ventur'd to name you to the Archbishop, as a person, whom we might safely recommend to the University of Oxford for an honorary degree of a Doctor in Divinity. That University has been so indulgent at different periods, as to allow the Archbishop and Bishops to make the request in favour of some of the American clergy, and tho' you have not a connection with our society, as a missionary, yet we thought your character as a clergyman, and your present situation, as the president of your new established society, gave you a fair title to our recommendation. It met with the success we wish'd, and the instrument conveying the compliment of the University will be delivered to you by the bearer. Give me leave to hint to you, that as the Archbishops of Canterbury and York, the Bishops of Durham and Winchester, signed the letter to the University as well as myself, you will think it advisable to write a letter of thanks to each of them.

Mr. Stuart has had all the dispatch I could give him, after he had been recommended to me for ordination by the Society. I doubt not your's and Dr. Smith's care in sending over those only, whom you can safely recommend, and indeed I always do justice in declaring, that in general the young men, who come from your college are well qualified for their profession. From the same principle I cannot help wishing, that they may meet with all due encouragement, and not be mortified with the reflection, that persons who have had no education, and who have taken every irregular method of entering into the profession, are prefer'd before them. It has hitherto been my plan not to wound the credit of the Church by admitting into it improper candidates, and I hope I shall persevere in the same resolution. I never could consider tradesmen and mechanicks as entitled to quit their shops for the Church, whenever they pretend to have a call; and as I have been contented to make use of the ordinary means in qualifying myself for the part which Providence has allotted me for the instruction of others, I am rather suspicious of those who presume to expect extraordinary illuminations, and affect to persuade the rest of the world that they have receiv'd them. Whilst this is the case, (and I do not find myself dispos'd to change my sentiments,) I cannot prevail upon myself to make a sacrifice of good sense to good nature, and to give Mr. * * * any encouragement to offer himself to me for orders. I have seen enough in this country to convince me, that men of this turn, (whatever their intentions may be, of these God alone is the Judge,) have done infinite prejudice to religion, and as far as I can avoid it, I will not have a hand in increasing the mischief. I never allow'd when I was a Parish minister any enthusiastick methodist or irregular person to come into my pulpit, and it would ill become my situation to hold a different conduct now, when my example and authority must have a more extensive influence. The Parish of St. Paul's will not convince me of their coming into order and regularity by their choice of Mr. * * *, nor will their recommendation of him oblige me to consider him in any other light, than as a person whom, whilst I know my duty, I cannot receive as a candidate for orders. As I write to you in confidence, I desire that my letter may not be shewn. You will only in general say, that you have no encouragement from me to advise Mr. * * * personal application.

You will give me leave to express to you very seriously my earnest wishes, that the clergy, who have been regularly educated to the service of the Church of England, may preserve themselves from the reigning enthusiasm of these times, and may not be led either by their own warm imaginations, or the delusions of those who affect any extravagance in religion, to leave the plain sober path which the gospel rightly understood has mark'd out to them. We have, God knows, too many amongst us who seem weary of a rational system of religion, and chuse to confound themselves and their hearers by advancing doctrines to which it is hard to fix any ideas, and which have already had fatal effects in turning the heads of the weak and ignorant. If this spirit has made any progress in your part of the world, I doubt not but that you will contribute your share in checking it; it is from this hope that I ventured to take a step, which may in its consequence add to your authority and influence, assuring myself, and at the same time pledging my credit to the rest of the Bishops, that any compliment paid to you would be well bestowed, because it might better enable you to support the character and dignity of the leading minister in your Province, and assist your endeavours in withstanding any attempts to introduce that spirit of enthusiasm, from which we apprehend the greatest dangers both for Church and State. I should hope therefore, that if any Preachers come amongst you who have made themselves obnoxious to the governors of the Church in this country by their irregular preaching, and who have never received any license to exercise the office of a minister in foreign parts, you will take the same method, which is generally observed with us, of refusing your pulpits to them. I mention this for your own sakes, as I am satisfied, that it will contribute much to the peace and good order of your congregations, which I dare say you and the rest of the clergy have seriously at heart.

I have given my sentiments freely, from which you will plainly see, that it will be highly improper to give Mr. * * * any encouragement to come to me for orders, especially as I find you expressing yourself in your letter to me of Dec. 6, 1769, in this manner. "I shall not hereafter have any connection with the minister or congregation of St. Paul's, who have not only been very undutiful to your lordship, but have also been peculiarly ungrateful to me in the manner they have thought fit to demean themselves, as well as in their manner of representing what I had done and said in this matter."

I have scarcely left room to assure you, that I am, Rev. Sir, your loving brother.

RIC. LONDON.

For the Rev. Dr. Peters.

REV. & DEAR SIR:—I received your obliging letter, and return you many thanks for it. The twenty pounds due to you from the Bishop of London I received yesterday from his secretary. I did not chuse to trouble his lordship sooner, because he has been for some time very much out of order.

At Christmas I went to Twickenham, where I staid much longer than I expected, which deferred my procuring the watch for your nephew. I have applied to a workman well recommended, but he had no watch of the price you fixed whose shape and size pleased me; besides, I thought that the watch would be better finished if it were made on purpose. In a few days I shall have it and will send it to him immediately. I shall wait your directions how to dispose of the money that will remain after the treasurer to the society is paid.

You desire, sir, that I will inform you of the state of my studies. I confess I can give but a poor account of them. London is not a place to study in, unless I chose to avoid making acquaintances. The day before yesterday I dined with the proprietor. He is very feeble yet, tho' a good deal recovered; he cannot exert himself much, but is very cheerful. Lady Juliana is a most amiable woman; she expressed a great regard for you and shewed me your little favourite Sophia.

I delivered your message to Dr. Franklin, and he seemed very much pleased to hear you were in good health. Mr. Coombe was much obliged to you for your good wishes sent to him in my letter. And accept, dear sir, my heart's thanks for the tender regard you express in it to

Your respectful and affectionate friend,
WM. WHITE.

London, Jan. 26th, 1771.

I have preached three times and read prayers frequently.

A friend has sent us the following more particular account of a matter already briefly noticed. Such instances of gratitude and affection, towards those who have long and faithfully devoted themselves to the service of the Church, deserve more than a mere passing record.

PRESENTATION OF A TESTIMONIAL.

On Monday evening last, we had the privilege of being present at a quarterly meeting of the Teachers of the Sunday Schools attached to Trinity Church, under the pastoral care of the Rev. Dr. Coleman. At this time an exceedingly interesting ceremony took place, the presentation of an elegant Silver Pitcher to Miss Ann Cowpland, the directress of the Female School. After the usual exercises, an eloquent and finished discourse was delivered by the Rev. F. Ogilby, full of encouragement to those engaged in this pleasing duty.

The Rev. Dr. Coleman rose, and with much earnestness and feeling, said the pleasing duty devolved on him of handing to the friend who had been selected by Miss Cowpland for that purpose, the Silver Pitcher, prepared by the teachers of the school, for the long and well-tried services rendered for 26 years as the directress of the school. The gift bore the following appropriate inscription: "Presented by the Teachers of the Female Sunday School of Trinity Church to Miss Ann Cowpland, as a testimonial of regard for her well-tried services of upward of 26 years, as superintendent of the Female Sunday School of Trinity Church, June 1, 1849."

Mr. Peter Williamson, the acting warden of the Church, then rose and said, "On behalf of Miss Cowpland he accepted the handsome and valuable gift with much pleasure. He felt honoured in having been selected to hand over the flattering testimonial of regard to one he considered so eminently worthy their consideration. It would be received and cherished by her with the highest gratification. In behalf of the recipient, he tendered her most heartfelt acknowledgments to the ladies and children for this most distinguished and unlooked for mark of esteem, and assured them that the occasion would be regarded as an incentive to the continuance of those labours which it was now her happiness to know had obtained their indulgent approbation." After a few appropriate and feeling remarks by Rev. F. Ogilby, a hymn was sung, accompanied by an Æolian under the direction of Mr. Pearce, one of the teachers, and after prayer by the Rector, the meeting was dismissed. The whole affair was well conducted, and reflected much credit upon all engaged, and the many happy faces testified that in this case, the gift of love was "twice blessed." We doubt not that a fresh stimulus will be given to the schools by encouraging those who are now laboring in the praiseworthy cause, by producing good feeling, and infusing the spirit of harmony and love.

LAST HOURS OF EX-PRESIDENT POLK.

A correspondent, in the New York Herald, writing from Nashville, gives the following account of the last hours of Mr. Polk. We take it for granted that this account, from its circumstantial character, is correct. We trust we may be excused for saying, that the dying ex-President, while he left a noble and manly illustration on record of the importance of a prompt attention to religious duties, also gave a strong testimony against the system which could permit a Christian man to live without baptism, and then to be disturbed in his dying moments with mere personal questions about the ministerial agent to be employed.

Mr. Polk sent for the Rev. Dr. Edgar, of the Presbyterian church, seven days before his death, desiring to be baptized by him. He said to him impressively:—

"Sir, if I had suspected twenty years ago that I should come to my death-bed unprepared, it would have made me a wretched man: yet I am about to die, and have not made preparation. I have not even been baptized. Tell me, sir, can there be any ground for a man thus situated to hope?"

The Rev. Doctor made known to him the assurances and promises of the gospel that mercifully run parallel with man's life.

Mr. Polk then remarked, that he had been prevented from baptism in infancy by some accidental occurrence, that he had been several times strongly inclined to be baptized during his administration, but that the cares and perplexities of public life hardly gave him time for the solemn preparation requisite, and so procrastination had ripened into inaction, when it was now almost too late to act. In his conversation with the Rev. clergyman, Mr. Polk evinced great knowledge of the scriptures, which, he said, he had read a great deal, and deeply revered, as divine truth; in a word, he was, theoretically, a Christian.

The conversation fatiguing Mr. Polk too much for him to be then baptized, it was postponed, to take place the next evening; but in the interval, the ex-President recollected that when he was governor and lived here, he used to hold many arguments with the Rev. Mr. McFerren, the talented and popular Methodist minister of the place, his warm personal and political friend, and that he had promised him that when he did embrace christianity, that he, the Rev. Mr. McFerren, should baptize him. He, therefore, sent for the Rev. Dr. Edgar, made known this obligation, and expressed his intention to be baptized by his friend the Methodist minister. The same day the venerable Mrs. Polk, mother of the ex-President, a very pious Presbyterian lady, arrived from her residence, forty miles distant, accompanied by her own pastor, hoping that her distinguished son would consent to be baptized by him.

"Mother," said the dying ex-President, taking her affectionately by the hand, "I have never in my life disobeyed you, but you must yield to your son now, and gratify my wishes. I must be baptized by the Rev. Mr. McFerren."

His mother, wise as she is pious, did not hesitate to give her consent; and in the presence of the Rev. Dr. Edgar, and the Rev. Mr. Mack, of Columbia, the ex-President received the rite of baptism at the hands of the Rev. Mr. McFerren.

Mr. Polk has died worth about one hundred thousand dollars, the bulk of which is settled upon his amiable lady, who, it is to be hoped, will long make this city her abode—an ornament to its society, for "all lips do praise her."

NOEL.

THE SPIRIT OF KINDNESS.—He must know but little of the ways of life, who has not learnt and does not understand the value and importance of a spirit of kindness, not merely of a good and kind intent at heart, (which is sometimes concealed, or otherwise disfigured, by a rough outside,) but of civility, and an obliging kindness in the whole manner of a man. Amidst the daily and continual need we have of one another's help, who cannot tell how much a spirit of obligingness contributes to the real happiness of life? who has not felt, at one time or another, how much it heightens the acceptableness of any favour, or softens the unpleasantness of a denial?—Miller's Sermons.

A RIVAL OF ST. PAUL.—We extract the following from "the Christian Observer."

ANOTHER EPISTLE TO THE ROMANS.—"Dr. Merle D'Aubigne has prepared an address to the Italian people, which will be immediately published at Rome." So says a gentleman in Geneva, in a letter published in the Congregationalist. He says, "it is designed to show that people, that the Reformation commenced in Italy before it was preached in Germany," and that it forms "a good sequel to Paul's Epistle to the Romans."

CORRECTION.—In the poetical piece, entitled "Faint yet Pursuing," in our last number, the word "mocked," in the second line of the fourth stanza, should read "marked."

New Publications.

We have received a copy of Bishop Potter's "CHARGE TO THE CLERGY OF THE DIOCESE OF PENNSYLVANIA, delivered at the opening of the sixty-fifth Convention, May 16, 1849." Also, Dr. Stevens' "SERMON DELIVERED BEFORE THE BISHOP WHITE PRAYER BOOK SOCIETY, on its sixteenth Anniversary, and in commemoration of the three hundredth Anniversary of the introduction of the First Prayer Book in the English tongue into the Worship of the Church of England." "Published by request of the Society."

As the most appropriate notice of these important publications, we shall favor our readers with extracts from both.

THE CHURCH CHANT BOOK: designed to facilitate the practice of Chanting in Churches and the private devotional circle; comprising a large and varied selection of Chant tunes in the Gregorian and Modern modes adapted to the ordinary services of the Protestant Episcopal Church; with an introduction and instructions, relative to the mode of performance. Written, arranged, and in part composed by the Rev. William Staunton. New York: published by Stanford & Swords, 137 Broadway.

The Author of this most useful Work, so favorably known from his Church Dictionary, has again well employed his learning and his skill. Although the Praise of God so largely mingles in our public worship, there is no part of the service in the Sanctuary which has been more neglected. If the Psalms of David have been left on everlasting record as Models of Worship, surely we follow not these noble patterns when we bestow so little attention and care upon the manner in which we chant our Psalms, and Hymns and Spiritual Songs.

The Prayer Book certainly gives great prominence to the peculiar mode of Praise called "Chanting." And, were it necessary, we could give many just reasons for this.

Mr. Staunton, in his Preface, says, "the design of the present work is, to facilitate and improve the practice of chanting in Divine worship, and to make known to the American Community, more fully than has yet been done, the peculiar beauty and value of this style of music. In the mode adopted, we have presented a large and diversified collection of chants, many of which are drawn from the Cathedral service of the Church of England, where the art flourishes in its best perfection. To these there has been prefixed all necessary instruction for the acquisition of a proper and effective style of performance." Mr. Staunton also justly complains of "the inferior position which chanting occupies in the public mind, and the secondary place assigned it in current books of Psalmody." We were particularly pleased with the introduction, which tells "what chanting is, and how it should be studied and performed," perhaps because we understand this best. Indeed it is written with a clearness and simplicity admirably adapted for instruction.

We profess not skill enough to pronounce an opinion upon the character of the Chants themselves. A good judge of such things has given us a most favorable opinion of them. We know Mr. Staunton is well qualified for such a work, and we rejoice he has thus accomplished it. The book is very well printed, and does great credit to the printer and publisher.

ON THE CRYPTOGAMOUS ORIGIN OF MALARIOUS AND EPIDEMIC FEVERS, by J. K. Mitchell, A. M., M. D., Professor of Practical Medicine in the Jefferson Medical College of Philadelphia. Lea & Blanchard, 1849.

The notice of a work like this hardly falls within our province. It is, however, so full of interesting and instructive facts, illustrating its subject, that the general reader must peruse it with pleasure. We are not rash enough, in our ignorance, to pronounce an opinion upon the theory here advanced. We leave that for the M. D.'s to settle. As a subject of interest at present, we quote the application of this theory as accounting for the extension of the CHOLERA.

Perhaps no disease has so much puzzled the etiologist as cholera. Its singular local origin, its yet more singular progress, its apparent inconsistencies, its diffusion from a tropical point over the habitable globe, and especially its invasion, in winter, of the frozen steppes of Tartary and Russia, all tend to confuse the observer of epidemics. At one time, slowly, against the monsoon, it advances on a long geographical line, at the rate of from one to two miles a day, whilst at another, it flies on the wings of commerce, almost as fast as there are means of conveyance for men and merchandise. At one time, it ascends or descends along the valley of an innavigable stream, slowly and regularly, as if progressive by its own locomotion; at another, it flies with the ship or the locomotive, across seas and continents. A stranded vessel throws it upon the shore of a lonely sea-island, (Dickson.) One ship conveys it from Dublin to the St. Lawrence,* another meets it in the midst of the Atlantic, and carries it to New York,† while a third, from the same source,‡ deposits it at New Orleans. Steamers scatter it far and wide as they ascend from New Orleans to the various branches of the river above. Contagion might explain the progress, where there are always materials to form a line of march, but contagion cannot account for its solitary advance over untravelled wastes or untenanted seas. Contagion cannot explain its presence in the atmosphere of the mid-ocean, nor its manner of assailing a city at once at its most opposite points. Contagion is at fault as explanatory of the exemption of classes, the almost exclusive invasion of low, damp, dirty habitations, and the uniform appearance of a general premonitory state, before the irruption of the cholera itself.

The attacks of cholera within a few hours after exposure to infection, the introduction into hospitals of large numbers of cholera-patients, whilst the old inmates enjoyed complete immunity, as at the Odinka at St. Petersburg, the diseased condition of a single vessel, the Dreadnaught, in the Thames, in 1837, the great exemption of physicians and nurses, the attack of the old rather than of the young, or of those at puberty, all militate against the notion of propagation by contagion.

On the other hand, many cases are cited where the cholera came with bodies of men, caravans, and ships, and seemed to be propagated by personal communication. At one time it confined itself to one wing of an army; at another, it spread progressively from left to right, along the line of encampment. Sometimes it affected but one out of thirty men in each of a great number of large tents, and sometimes it restricted itself to one or two such tents, which it completely desolated. No wonder that men were puzzled and perplexed, being contagionists at one time and place, and anti-contagionists at another. No wonder that Mojohn and Holland should have endeavored to avoid the difficulty by reverting to the exploded doctrine of Kircher and Linnaeus, the animalcular theory of disease.

The animalcular, being an organic theory, would explain well enough, the phenomena of progress, were it not for the apparent absurdity of supposing that animalculæ of tropical origin could exist and procreate in a Russian winter. The want of proof that animalculæ are poisonous, or that they fulfil the conditions for such a theory, has been already stated.

But if we assume for cholera a fungous origin, all difficulties vanish; and, as in the case of yellow fever, an easy explanation may be given of every apparent incongruity. We have only to suppose, what is known to happen in other cases, that the fungi, on which cholera is assumed to depend, acquire at times, as do the germs of some contagious disease, an unusual power of reproduction and diffusion, a greater potency of expansion. Such germs may be carried by men, and goods, and ships, or may make a slower progress by their own unaided activity, or be scattered by the winds, to regerminate, wherever special conditions are found. Thus can we see why the poison prefers the route of streams, or infests the damp parts of cities; and why classes living in clean apartments in dry districts, suffer so little.

We can see why women escape better than men, why both cholera and yellow fever, by the natural tendency of the vegetable cause to the organs of generation, almost always cause miscarriage of pregnant women, and why, when a city or country is unhealthy, the fungiferous causes of death, by over-stimulating the organs of reproduction, usually make a compensation by the births, for the unusual mortality.

Can we not thus explain the appearance of contagion, where there is no contagion, and the absence of contagion while there is an obvious conveyance of the epidemic poison from place to place.

We are no longer surprised to learn that cholera advanced regularly from the tent nearest to the water, to the others successively, until it reached the end of the lines; nor do we feel astonished that it was, in another case, confined to the tent nearest the tank, or to the flank company, or the brigade on the left or right of the army. We now see why ninety men detached from a large corps, and attacked on the first night of absence, on the borders of a lake, were, without damage to the corps, promiscuously mingled again with it, after being brought back, totally disabled, to the original encampment. We can understand now, how, in the Odinka Hospital, whose salubrity was previously proved by the absence of cholera during an epidemic at St. Petersburg, its eight hundred inmates continued in their usual health, despite the introduction from without of five hundred cases of cholera. We can see how a corps, in its march through an irregularly infected country, may acquire and lose the cholera several times; how a healthy corps may enter a sickly army, en route, and not suffer from the prevailing malady. The diffusion, the limitation, the leaving the infection behind, or the carrying it forward, all admit of an easy explanation, if we assume the hypothesis that germs or spores, created exterior to the body, are the semina morbi, and that they are liable to the usual accidents by which seeds are conveyed or lost, or favored or repressed.

† The packet ship New York

‡ The ship Swanton, Captain Duncan, from the healthy port of Havre, was assailed by cholera after being at sea for twenty-eight days, (Lat. 25° N., Long. 57° W.,) and after losing fifteen persons in thirteen days, she arrived in the Mississippi, five days before the epidemic outbreak at New Orleans. The Ship New York, also from Havre, was attacked at sea, sixteen days out, and arrived at Staten Island, two days before the cholera appeared at the New York Quarantine Station.—(Whiting.)

THE ARTS OF DESIGN; An Address before the Art-Union of Philadelphia, May 7th, 1849, by Henry Reed. Published by order of the Society.

In this Address the scholar and the man of letters brings the noble art of rhetoric to bear upon "the arts of design." Their manifold applications, their important uses are set forth with graphic power. We are told of their intimate connection with civilization, with the wants of man, with history, and with religion. Upon this last head we can only make the following brief extract:

Art proceeds to a higher service, which has given to it a peculiar consecration, when it devotes itself to what lies within the scope of scripture truth. It was this class of subjects on which the Masters dwelt reverentially, habitually and religiously; with such subjects their fame is associated, and visions which the painters have spread throughout Christendom come up to the imagination along with the words of the Bible. When death suddenly, but with its gentlest stroke, closed the career of the most eminent painter our country has produced, I mean the late Washington Allston, the paint was left wet on that great scriptural painting, unhappily incomplete, to which he had devoted many of the best, and all the latter years of his life—a life and a name which I cannot mention without regretting that I must not stop to say what might be said of them as showing the beauty and the dignity, the truth and the moral power that dwell in the soul of a great Christian artist. With his high powers as a painter, there was united a most exquisite spirit of criticism, wherein it would have been hard to say which was the largest element, a fine philosophy or tender Christian sympathy. I remember with what deep but tranquil emotion, in tones that were the very music of modesty and genius, he lamented rather than rebuked that injurious temper of criticism which seizes on the weak points of a painter's work, and shuts its vision to all that is genuine and great. He made the remark with reference to Haydon, and I could not but recall it, when not a great while afterwards we heard the tragic story of that painter's death—how, in the metropolis of Great Britain, he was driven by neglect and that wrong which Allston had reproved, to a crazed brain and an awful suicide. Let me add, that I fear it is partly owing to the same injurious sort of criticism that the only painting by Haydon which has found its way to this country, and which, whatever be its faults, has merits that Allston could applaud, is now consigned to some loft or garret in this city.*

We feel that this admirable Address must have the effect of elevating the mind of the artist, and giving him higher and worthier thoughts of his noble profession.

STATE OF EUROPE.

Thursday, June 7, 1849.

The French Cabinet has at length been formed. The most remarkable feature of it is, that it excludes DROUYN DE L'HUYS and BUGEAUD, and includes DUBAURE and DE FALLoux. It is much to the credit of LOUIS NAPOLEON that he has resigned his personal prejudices to M. DUBAURE, for the public benefit. The retention of M. DE FALLoux, the originator of the foolish Roman expedition, is for the sake of conciliating the Roman Catholic party. M. DUPIN (aine) has been chosen President of the new assembly, which is even more turbulent than its predecessor.

The French army has not yet entered Rome. M. LESSEPS has left the city, and gone to the French camp. It is said that he has been recalled. The troops are suffering much from sickness, and General OUDINOT must soon attack the city, or retreat to Civita Vecchia, where the French flag is now flying. It is probable that an attack upon the city will soon be made, which will damage the French Government even more than it will the Roman Republic. But the French are in a difficulty, and must go on at any price.

The King of NAPLES has been defeated at Albano, and nearly taken prisoner by the Romans. He has retired within his own territories, which he never ought to have left, much chagrined at the ill success of his expedition. The constitutional border has been removed from the national flag, and the northern part of the kingdom is in an unsettled state. The POPE is much displeased with the whole affair, and threatens to retreat to Avignon. This would please the French amazingly.

Ancona is surrounded by the Austrians, who are said to have advanced as far as Fano. They took the fort of Malghera, near Venice, on the 27th ult., after a siege of twenty-one days. The Papal authority is restored in the four Legations.

The King of Sardinia is much better. It is reported that the Austrians demand possession of Genoa and the Piedmontese fortresses near France; and that the French will assist the Sardinians in resisting them. Whether this be true or not, it does not seem probable that France and Austria will long be at peace.

The Spanish Government have sent an expedition of 5,000 or 8,000 men to Italy. They are to land at Gaeta, and assist the POPE. This will complicate the Roman affair still more. The Carlist insurrection is at an end for the present. The reported marriage of the Conde de MONTEMOLIN is contradicted; and he, with his two brothers, has left England for the Continent.

The Frankfort Parliament has removed to Stutgard. Prussia, Saxony, and (perhaps) Hanover have formed a sort of union under the presidency of Prussia. In this scheme Austria is not included, and Bavaria demurs. It seems as if Germany would be separated into three grand divisions—Prussia, Austria, and Suabia.

* The allusion is to Haydon's large painting of Our Saviour's Entry into Jerusalem.

The Hungarians have taken Buda and Semlin: and the Russians have entered Transylvania. It is said that the Russian Generals advised the EMPEROR not to fight against the Hungarians, who are very likely to beat both Russians and Austrians. A campaign during the summer among the marshes of Hungary, with the whole population against you, is no joke. It would have been better for the EMPEROR if he had taken the advice of his Generals; for the Poles are sure to rise on the first reverse he meets with in Hungary.

A division of the Russian fleet, and it is said land forces too, have proceeded to the assistance of the Danes. Hostilities, however, have been suspended; and peace, it is to be hoped, will soon be made between Denmark and Germany.

ABBAS PACHA is becoming unpopular in Egypt, and that country is rapidly assuming its old appearance of a Turkish province.—English Churchman.

The heart knoweth his own bitterness, and a stranger doth not intermeddle with his joy. (Prov. 14: 10.)

Joys the heart hath,—never spoken;
Sorrow that it keeps concealed:
Silent pleasures quickly broken
Were its holy thoughts revealed.

Hopes within the bosom swelling,
Deeply stir the spirit's rest;
Like a fount of gladness welling
In the confines of the breast.

Fears the mind at times beclouding,
Mantling all in sullen gloom;
Heart and home as if enshrouding
In the vesture of the tomb.

There is ONE ABOVE who knoweth
Every thought of weal or woe:
And Himself no "stranger" showeth
To His children here below.

Lord, to Thee, my soul's emotion,
Is as open as the day;
Let it then with true devotion,
Look to Thee, and "watch and pray."

LIGHT FROM CHRIST IN EVERY MAN.

MR. EDITOR:

Of this plainly recorded truth there are two eminent contradictions, in quarters where agreement is unusual. The first is that of thorough Calvinism; as God hath elected only a part of mankind, and reprobated all the rest, the latter, being beyond any advantage from the salutary breathings of the Holy Spirit, are left utterly without them. The other is found in that extravagant notion of the benefit of the Church flowing from the extravagant theory of the regeneration of Baptism;—at the font is conferred the primal element, is planted the initial germ, of real holy influence, the seed of all acceptable personal sanctification, that first deposit of good capacity before which there can be no veritable goodness;—this doctrine leaves all who have not Christian baptism, whether evangelized persons, or Jews, or Mahometans, or heathen, or sceptics, deists, atheists,—the doctrine leaves all such without the radical gift of sanctity, and of course, whatever appearances may be, without any really gracious development and growth. In the ranks both of Calvinism and of this baptismal theory, such a consequence may be disavowed; but frank common sense declares that the consequence follows naturally and unavoidably from each set of principles. Here, the two doctrines, antagonistic as they appear to be, coincide. In one view, we find an irresponsible choice, affecting individual persons directly, and withholding all grace from the vast majority of human beings, not excepting infants and children. In the other view, a majority, infants and children included, are equally left without grace, through a choice favouring primarily the Church, but reaching individual persons indirectly, and fastening upon individual persons its awful result,—the many being left without the vital element of saving uprightness for want of baptism, while a smaller number receive it at the font.

The sound view, the broad scriptural view, is—that, through Christ, enough of holy ability and holy moving to work out salvation is universal. When, on the fall of Adam, the Saviour was promised, He was promised for the whole world,—was given for the eternal rescue of every human creature. That grant implies (inevitably) the further grant to all men of what is needful to make the redemption available. Light and strength from the Holy Ghost, being absolutely essential to give practical utility to the atonement for sin, are therefore universally bestowed, in adequate measure. The one proposition is as the converse of the other. This promise and grant to the whole race of Adam has never been revoked from any of them; the whole dispensation through Christ continues everywhere in all its force,—the stream (or streamlet) of initial grace being never withheld, though its swell into a flowing river has been widely forfeited. The formation of a select Church under Abraham, and its organizations under Moses and Christ, took back no gift from mankind at large, though they successively enhanced the entire great gift to the members of the Church. The original spiritual light and strength, commensurate with the salvation originally provided, and enough so to test obedience and faith that God may equitably supply defects here or hereafter, remain with all to the end of time; and every person has them already in his soul when he comes to be baptized into the fold of the Redeemer.

In such doctrine the mind rests with satisfaction, and perceives abundant proof of it in every direction.

Reflecting on the infinite purity of God,—that He "is Light, and in Him is no darkness at all,"—we are convinced that He cannot have left any of His rational creatures without sufficient capacity and strength to become pure as He is pure, holy as He is holy. Every where hath He given a measure of the truth, "the law written in the heart," (whether brightly or faintly,) and the conscious need of an atonement for sin, i. e. of a procured pardon from without the sinner; and will He uphold His truth among men without bestowing grace to improve it? In Christian countries, the unbaptized have "all truth;" can there be such a grant, and yet the very rudiment of the saving and effectual power of the Spirit within be denied? If God refuse the heavenly aid, can we believe that He "hath no pleasure in the death of the wicked?" nay, that He hath no pleasure in their wickedness? It is written, "except ye repent, ye shall perish;" and if any are denied grace for repentance, what a stain on both the mercy and the justice of God, to give them existence, and then, for want of the ability which He can readily confer, to make them perish everlastingly! Christ, we repeat, "died for all;" but to what purpose, if any are left utterly incapable of the benefit of His sacrifice? Thus largely is the character of Jehovah involved in the assertion of the universality of grace. And the human soul itself testifies to the same effect; for every soul feels the power of conscience; and conscience is the finger of God and the light of the Spirit within us,—binding us to fulfil duty as far as we know it, and accusing us if we fulfil it not. Scepticism must lurk in the mind which demands more complete proof of our doctrine.

Yet, further proof there is. Our Lord declares, "I am the Light of the world," i. e. of all the race of Adam,—as was in effect promised in the first announcement of mercy when paradise was forfeited. And of Him it is most explicitly revealed, that He is "the true Light, which lighteth every man that cometh into the world." The latter quotation is peculiarly strong,—as the scope of the entire passage containing it will evince.

In that passage, at the opening of his gospel, St. John condemns the then common opinion that an EVIL POWER created this world. To uphold the purity of the Supreme God, the existence of matter particularly, and of the earth and its fallen occupants, was ascribed by the old philosophers to another being, alleged to be divine in power, though bad in character,—a theory not altogether unnatural, (it was profound as merely human wisdom,) inasmuch as the grand truth of all religion is that God is absolutely immaculate. If God be holy, they asked, can it be He who formed this region of unholiness? no, "an enemy hath done this," inferior to the highest Divinity, yet largely potent. With this hypothesis the evangelist contrasts the true doctrine—in the following declarations concerning the Messiah, the Logos, or WORD. That Person is truly "God," records the inspired penman. "All things were created by Him," matter as well as spirit, not by a subordinate being; and though the creatures are liable to imperfection, the creative act was not an incongruity or moral impropriety, for "without Him," without His placatory mediation vindicating the Almighty, "not any thing" was made: and here is the universal mediatorial or morally harmonizing function of Christ. In the WORD "was life;" living creatures, as well as the inanimate, having existence through Him; matter being through Him exalted to partnership with such grades of spirit as confer perception and consciousness and instinct and reason.* "And the life was the light of men;" i. e. the WORD, far from being an evil power, gave to Adam and his progeny, with their "life" or this whole animal existence, moral "light" also, making them more than reasoning animals, more than intellectual,—endowing the human race, as the immaterial angels had been endowed, with religious capacity, with conscience, with convictive obligation to good. This moral "light shineth in moral darkness, and the darkness comprehended it not," would not 'embrace' it; darkness came into the world, but not through the Creator,—who would have prevented it (were its absolute prevention consistent with moral freedom), and would remove it, by his pure "light" within; darkness there is, and "an enemy" caused it and brought it hither, but that "enemy" created nothing, and nothing was created evil. Nor has the creator stultified Himself by abandoning without help any among men to this adversary, which would be equivalent to creating them to sin, and would be making himself unholy; for He gives to ALL light enough and strength enough to begin their emancipation; even into the darkness which will not comprehend or embrace it, the "light" continues to shine,—and, more explicitly, "the true Light," the self-purchased WORD, the Messiah, "lighteth EVERY MAN that cometh into the world." Thus is proclaimed anew, what had been revealed four thousand years earlier,—the universal dispensation of pardoning mercy and sanctifying aid, from the Omnipotent and Holy One, through the omnipotent mediation of His Holy Son, the Divine WORD. And that universal dispensation has never been repealed in any part of this fallen earth, or among any of its fallen people. Without such a provision, the Creator would be an Evil Power; so concedes the apostle.

No man, then, is left to even a single act of unresisted iniquity. Sin he may, for without that permission there can be no moral probation; but he does it against the "light" within him. The light will grow dim as depravity abounds, and the dimness may increase till it is merged in the "outer darkness;" but that is the fault of the sinner, not of God. Not one can complain in the last day, "Master, thou art an hard man, reaping where thou hast not sown, and gathering where thou hast not strawed;" for all will know, as they know now, that they had received a "talent," but hid it. "Every mouth will be stopped, and all the world be proved guilty before God,"—who allows not any one to be tempted beyond what this divine help will enable him to bear. ALL have that help. Through the Redeemer of Adam's whole posterity, every one who receives "life" receives inward "light" also from the Holy Ghost.

Your object,—that we presume the spiritual moving to exist where there is no evidence of it. Not so; there is evidence of it in every heart if we could but reach it. The very heathen have this germ, though its growth is horribly deformed by outward error. But why debate the evidence, when God declares that the "light shineth in darkness," into all the darkness, however produced, and of whatever degree, that befalls the souls of men? If the darkness will not "comprehend (embrace) the light," the evidence will of course be blurred. St. John says not that every one in whom the Light shines hath at once all the riches of grace; it is only to those who "receive Him" that He gives "power to become the sons of God." Only the first light is imparted to all indiscriminately. When this is cordially 'embraced' and duly improved, not before, there is added the further ability through which the penitent and willing are newly created, and are advanced in their divine sonship, till they are made (in Christ) "blameless and harmless, without rebuke," ripening for the final sonship in glory. The dawn and first rays of the "light" are in every babe, and may be (and should be) improved effectually from infancy. Obscured, however, as they commonly are through childhood, the twilight and the nascent morning must re-appear, as they are perpetually struggling to do in each bosom. And then we may hope that the heavenly Luminary within will "shine more and more unto the perfect day."

It is further demanded,—why a measure of the Spirit is conferred on those who will never improve and perfect it?—we reply again from scripture, whose voice precludes argument or question, "the light shineth even into darkness which comprehends it not," which clouds and ere long rejects it, though it never on earth is entirely extinguished. This is the fact, whether we can explain it or not. But there are reasons.—Conscience, or the fundamental and universal endowment of Christ's Holy Ghost, prevents this world from resembling the abode of perdition. Most men obey conscience in some things. And it is on this partial yet divine moral restraint that social institutions are founded, from the lowest rules of savage intercourse, to the most enlightened regulations of civilised enactments and customs; and human law is far less widely efficacious than the "law in the heart." But for social institutions, depending on conscience, the earth would not be tolerable as a place of trial and probation, or even of existence.—Conscience, again, is the perpetual "drawing to the Father," the drawing of our souls, of even the most wayward souls,—our "drawing to the Father" by His Spirit within us, ever "waiting within to be gracious." It is the universal divine impulse to obedience,—the universal divine censor of disobedience; and, in this latter function, it becomes, like the Mosaic law, "a schoolmaster to bring us to Christ." Well may such a spiritual agent be resident in the worst as in the best of men.—Moreover: The universal gift of conscience will hereafter, and through eternity, be God's justification in punishing the wicked. It will prove their awful recompense to be, "not according to that they had not, but according to that they had." And not justification only, but more: This universal gift protects God's eternal consciousness of rectitude, in requiring every man to determine for himself whether he will obey, and so be happy through Christ for ever, or abandon himself to obstinate disobedience, and so be forever miserable.

The foundation of the entire change, whether early or late, gentle or severe, from the corruption of nature and the deeper corruption of habit, to a holy heart, holy principles, and a holy life, is prepared in "every one that cometh into the world," by the ray from the "True Light" shed into each soul by His Spirit. Nor is the completion of this change, the entire "change from glory to glory," from feeble graces to the highest, proportional to their outward opportunities, denied to any. "Let us therefore fear, lest, so large a promise being given, any of us should seem to come short of it."

PURITANIZING IN THE CHURCH.

The doctrine of the Church is different from that of all sects in that it is more Catholic. The Church theory of grace calls for more implicitness of faith, and consequently honours God and his Word more. It stumbles not at simplicity or mystery in doctrine; it is as confident of receiving virtue and salvation from the touch of a Saviour's garment, as in doing what are called greater things, though in reality, the greatness of any thing we do in religion is best expressed by the greatness of our faith in it;—if a man will trust himself on what sense calls a most unpromising hazard, that is great faith; if he will accept of the crumbs that dogs do eat, it is that which stirs up a Saviour's admiration to say, "great is thy faith." Now there is power in the promises and there is certainty in them, which nothing but implicit faith can bring out. They would break forth in astonishing fatness, if we did but touch them with such a faith. But when we seek to feel and know all things, bringing them down to a level with our senses, we forsake a Church mind and training, and walk by sight and sense, which is not a religious walk, but such a walk as other animals have. It is neither by sense nor is it by reason that we thrive in grace—we live by faith; we live as seeing Him who is invisible, and of course, have a Light which the world knows not of, a supersensual vision. Now, Puritanism, as contrasted with the trusting, reposing, universal system, fit and proper to the Church, brings the deep things of experience down to the senses, gives standards and tests, as if religion had moulds to run hearts in and they were all of the same capacity and shape. Of course it is ready to sit in judgment on the state of souls, and finds in itself the rule and standard of judging. It is a theory of sense contrasted with that of the Church, and it acts on the principles of sense. It is a no trust system; it is in its nature a self-filling, not a self-emptying system, and where every thing is spiritual, where all is trust, and the completer trust the more incomprehensible the things to be trusted, as in heaven, we see not but its incongruity must be felt, as it is said darkness may be. Hence the low view of ordinances and sacraments many have; hence the breaches the world makes, stamping its image and superscription on things spiritual and infusing its spirit, making the Church characteristic "of them that are without."

Rev. Herman Huth

DEAR MR. EDITOR:

Will you oblige me by inserting the following list of corrections of mistakes: mistakes of the press, which seriously affect the import of certain passages in the article entitled, "A Parallel, with explanations." "The individual members of those churches may be serious minded, devout, exemplary persons; all of them who have been baptized are members of the one body, though not in communion with it. But as organizations, as societies, they neither are the one body nor parts of it." "But as organizations" belongs to the last sentence of the paragraph. As printed, it is connected with the last but one, and mars its meaning. Further down I am made to say, or rather the deceased Bishop, (only one bishop is quoted in the whole article,) whose words I quote, is made to say: In my judgment THEY are not excusable who, neither neglecting the means of information nor wilfully resisting the light of conviction, remain still in error. The true reading is, "In my judgment they are excusable." "How forcible are right words." How important the principle applicable alike to little things and great: "Every thing in its place." N.

FLOATING CHURCH MISSION.

As I doubt not, Mr. Editor, many of your readers will be glad to hear of the operations of the Seamen's Mission, I will give a brief synopsis of the same up to date. Since the opening of the Chapel, on the 14th January last, I have baptized 3 adults (2 of them sailors, and 1 a sailor's daughter) and 19 children of seamen. The Bishop confirmed 8, (on the 20th May,) 2 of these were sailors, and the rest wives and daughters of sailors. There are now 20 families under my pastoral care, and the number of regular communicants is about 18. The temporary interruption of our services, in consequence of the removal of the Chapel from its moorings, doubtless partially stopped our progress, but no such accident being likely again to occur, we may hope, through the continued favor of God, to receive vast additions to our numbers. Our success so far has exceeded our most sanguine expectations, and the field is only just entered. Of those who have been gathered into our fold, both old and young, it may be said, literally and truly, that "they were as sheep without a shepherd." Whole families growing up without any knowledge of God, and utter strangers to the covenant of promise, have with scarce an effort been brought unto the Saviour. As soon as they heard of Him, they obeyed Him. Of those who have heard the Word preached, received the seal of truth, and gone forth on the great highway of nations, we can as yet say nothing, but we may in reason, and with faith believe, that some at least will carry with them the joyful tidings of Salvation to earth's remotest nations.

The number of seamen who have families residing in this city is very great. Owing to many causes, (the chief of which are the central position, the cheapness and security of this port,) seamen prefer this to the other large commercial marts. Hence great influence over them might be easily acquired through their wives and children, the surest avenues to the human heart. The sailor must become attached to the Church, if he finds her educating and providing for his chief treasures, and thence he will learn to look upwards to Him, who hath founded this Holy Institution for the happiness and Salvation of man. Of course, the Sunday School is the means through which the children are to be trained in the "nurture and admonition of the Lord." Having brought the lambs within the fold, we must lead them onward in the green pastures and beside the still waters of true religion. This object we now are effecting. A suitable room has been generously lent to us, and we only now need the necessary furniture, books, &c. I feel sure that the knowledge of our wants is all that is necessary to insure their speedy supply. I would, therefore, through your columns, request those who are interested in the Mission, and especially the Sunday Schools of our Church, to aid us in such manner and with such contributions as may be most convenient to them. The benches, tables, books, &c., are the chief things which we want, and by supplying them, or the means of procuring them, our purpose can be effected. Any donations or contributions may be sent to the subscriber, or to Jos. E. HOVER, Esq., 87 North Third street.

MAKING HOME INTERESTING.—Let parents make the hearthstone more alluring than the bowling alley, and their children will be found at home, instead of wandering about, seeking street entertainments, which their natures demand, but which is not to be found under the parental roof. Interesting, entertaining and useful books and newspapers are the best means of giving employment to the youthful mind.

Let children and youth be supplied with instructive reading, and the instances are rare indeed, where they will not avail themselves of it.

Opposition to Veils. The West Pennsylvania Conference of the United Brethren (German Methodists) adopted a resolution at their last meeting, recommending the General Conference to introduce an article into their Discipline to forbid their female members to wear veils.

The exercise of a Christian who expects the time of death, and who ought every day to expect it, is frequently to examine his heart, and to keep it clean; to oppose the flesh, and continually to rouse up his faith, having the arms of prayer always ready. God has thought fit, that the end of our life, and that of the world, should be always concealed from us, to induce us to look upon every day as the last.—QUEENSL.

Will be opened on the 10th of September next, in the building immediately adjoining St. Mark's Church on the west.

The object of the School is to unite with thorough instruction, religious influence. To this end the Bible and Prayer Book will form part of the boys' studies.

Application for the admission of pupils can be made until July 10th, at No. 24 Chancellor Street, where further information respecting the School can be obtained.

It is earnestly hoped that no boy of vicious disposition will be presented for admission.

Attached to the School, and preparatory to it, is a JUNIOR DEPARTMENT, to which a limited number of boys between six and nine years of age will be received.

This department will be taught in separate rooms from the other school, and under the general direction of the Principals; the particular care of it to be committed to a lady well qualified for the task.

The Principals refer to the Bishop of the Diocese, who takes an interest in the undertaking.

A CHARGE

MY BRETHREN OF THE CLERGY—

Among the duties imposed, by the Church, on her Bishops in this country, is the grave and responsible one of addressing a Charge, as often as once in three years, to the Clergy within their jurisdiction. I have delayed entering on this duty, somewhat beyond the period fixed by the Canon,* partly because of other urgent duties, but more especially because I have desired that, when once begun, it might be prosecuted at intervals less rare than the Canon seems to contemplate, and with some degree of method.

It is my purpose now, should life and ability be given, to offer to you, from year to year, a series of connected counsels on some of the most momentous of our common duties as Ministers of Christ. Waiving topics of a more transient nature, I propose to bring before you a few of the great principles, which ought, as it seems to me, always to be kept in view, of which we labour at the twofold work assigned us by God, of saving ourselves and saving them that hear us; and I shall endeavour, while presenting these principles, to indicate how they ought to be modified in practice, according to the state of the world at large, and especially according to the condition of our own country and Church.

The great secret of all ministerial usefulness must be found, I conceive, in ministerial self-culture—in the careful cultivation, with the aid of God's grace, of our whole nature—spiritual, moral, intellectual, and corporeal. We work on others, mainly, through the personal endowments which we have received from Heaven, or which we have acquired by culture. Even those Divine and supernatural truths and offices, which we dispense to men, must reach their great end, for the most part, through our zeal, our integrity, and our wisdom. The word preached, for example, is it not usually effectual in proportion to the clearness, the fervour, and the logical power of those who preach it? The prayers offered—do they not bear the hearts and consciences of the people towards Heaven, according as the Minister's own heart is exalted by faith, warmed with love, subdued by penitence! So the sacraments administered become channels of grace to the souls of men, in proportion as those souls have been previously touched through faithful appeals and instructions from the Pastor, and in proportion, too, as these holy mysteries are dispensed in a reverential and edifying manner. No matter, indeed, what be the mean of grace—be it truth or sacrament—be it prayer or thanksgiving—be it fasting or alms, it will be apt to prove all but powerless, if its significance be obscured, or its grand aim decried, by the evil example of him who is its appointed Minister. The Spirit of God acts on men in good part through his anointed Ambassadors; and He acts therefore feebly, if those Ambassadors interpose between his grace and the souls that he would visit, their own ignorance, levity, or impiety. He rarely acts at all, if they are morally reckless, or corrupt. The great law, which makes thought and emotion in those who speak, the condition of awakening kindred thoughts and emotions in those who hear, is not annulled by the supernatural grace of the gospel. On the contrary, the renewing and saving energies of the Holy Ghost so concur with the natural powers of its earthly Minister, that whether in moving others or in rousing himself to duty, that Minister must work—must work with all his heart and strength, and must never forget that he who would be a blessing to others is to begin by winning spiritual blessings for himself.

The improvement of the people, then, is conditioned on the improvement of the Clergy. All the world over, and through all time, the state of the Church reflects, in a great degree, the state and character of her Ministers. Make the one more wise, laborious and earnest, and you cause the other to be more given to every good word and work. So in respect to any congregation; we can hardly pray more devoutly and fervently in our closets—we can hardly watch more carefully over our own hearts, or ply more diligently our studies at home and our labours abroad even for a few months, but God will vouchsafe us some sign* that our prayers are remembered in Heaven, and our generous self-sacrifice made honorable on earth. And to what purpose, as Ministers, do we live, if this be not always our aim? We open our churches—not merely that the seats may be filled,—not merely that confiding and admiring throngs may be gathered to hear us, but that the people may give heed to the word spoken. We open them that there may be an active, an ever-extending and an ever-progressive piety—extending, that new hearts may be reached—progressive, that all may advance in religious knowledge and in personal holiness.

Ministerial self-culture therefore, in all its branches, is the subject to which I would ask your attention—comprehending within this term whatever can contribute to a clergyman's improvement, and keeping steadily in view the great truth, that it is through such culture, constantly maintained and pressed forward, that we are to win at last from our Master's hand—for ourselves, a worthy crown—for our people, an abundant entrance into his kingdom and glory.

As preliminary, however to this subject, there is another which demands a brief discussion, and that is the precise position which a Christian minister now occupies in this land and in our communion. Every profession has its own peculiar advantages and disadvantages, and by those who embrace it, these should evidently be well understood and well considered. Again, the different positions in a profession, whether we consider it in respect to time, or in respect to place, or in respect to other circumstances, will have each its distinguishing characteristics; and it is plain that these too should be carefully studied, if we would make the most of our powers and opportunities. And then, again, each individual clergyman has his idiosyncrasy from nature, and his peculiarities—corporeal, mental, and spiritual, superinduced by education and by habit, and it becomes him to remember and appreciate these also, if he would be a workman that needeth not to be ashamed. Self-knowledge is the one grand condition of self-culture, and that alone is self-knowledge which combines, with a correct appreciation of our personal character and capacities, a just estimate of our position—

- I. As ministers.
- II. As ministers of religion.
- III. As ministers of the religion of Christ,
- IV. As ministers of the Protestant Episcopal Church.
- V. As ministers of this Church, in the nineteenth century.
- VI. As ministers of this Church, and of this century, in the United States of America.

I. We should understand our position as MINISTERS, i. e. as officers, stewards who are clothed with a delegated trust, so that we act not merely for ourselves, but for others also. We have a twofold character, the one personal—the other official, and of course we have a twofold responsibility. We are to take heed to ourselves; we are to take heed to those over whom we are overseers. For the present, I put the religious character of our office out of the account. I call your attention to the simple fact that we are not only men, but officers. It is a fearful thing to be a man,—for to man alone, of all the living multitudes that

* If God suffers even a holy pastor not presently to see the fruits of his labours, it is to convince him that the success of his labours belongs to God;—and he ought to humble himself, and fear lest the fault should be in himself.—Bishop Wilson, Sacra Privata, p. 103.

roam over land, or that swarm through air, and stream, and sea—to man alone attaches responsibility—a sense of accountability within, which is but the faint echo (as he well knows) of a yet graver accountability without. To man alone, belong powers capable of an endless and sublime progression,—powers which he cannot employ aright, without unspeakable benefit to others and to himself,—powers which he cannot misemploy, without unknown but deplorable ills alike to his neighbour and his own soul. Social always, always active, always responsible, it is indeed a fearful thing to be a man.

How much more fearful to be not a man only, but to be at one and the same time a man and a minister; to have intrusted to us not our own welfare only, but the welfare of others also—to have it entrusted to us, too, in a representative capacity, so that in respect to many, very many perhaps of those around us, we act for them, we act through them, we act upon them, not merely in-virtue of the social ties that bind each to the other and all to us, but we apply to them the different and the higher agency, which belongs to us as trustees at once of an earthly power, and of a heavenly sovereign. In the course of ten or twenty years, what a number, brethren, of our fellow beings, within and without our own congregations—within and without our own communion too, must come directly or indirectly, under our official influence; and each one of these, remember, carries through all his mortal sojourn, and into the very presence of his Judge at last, some trace—some tint of light or hue of darkness—that we, because of our official authority, have cast perhaps unwittingly upon him. Is it fearful to be a man then—how much more fearful to be both a man and a minister, and to be, as in our case, ministers as well as men for life; to bear upon us a commission which may never be revoked, which always charges us with work to do, and which confers dignity, and exempts from punishment only as that work is done with our might, so that to whatever of official duty we are at any time equal, to so much of official duty we are then commanded. There is no discharge in this war. To be faithful soldiers and servants, unto our lives' end—always to give our faithful diligence in the work of our ministry, and in framing and fashioning our own selves and our families so as to make both wholesome examples to the flock, these are the terms of our enrolment in the sacramental host. Our weakness, then, as well as our strength—our age as well as our youth, are to be given to our work. He that hath much, let him give plentifully; he that hath little, let him do his diligence gladly to give of that little, for so shall he gather to himself a good reward in the day of his necessity.

II. But we are to understand, again, that we are MINISTERS OF RELIGION. In one sense, whoever holds an office, intended to promote human welfare, may be called a Minister of God; since some purpose of God is to be promoted through his official and proper agency. But we are God's Ministers in a sense more specific, and far more sacred; since to us have been committed the interests of his religion. The recognition and worship of some superior Power, invisible—yet present and supreme, is the dictate of Nature as well as the command of Revelation. Everywhere, and in all ages, man's heart has yearned after the unseen God, and has trembled before his anticipated judgments. Everywhere, too, this spiritual or religious element in our existence is felt to be paramount in dignity and importance; so that they who stand forth before men, as its representatives and Ministers, are held to be the special Ambassadors of Heaven, and to bear about them a peculiar sacredness.

In some lands, and at some periods, this sacerdotal office, through a misguided reverence, has been allowed to supersede or to swallow up all others; so that a corps, perhaps a caste* of well-disciplined and unscrupulous priests, alike jealous and tyrannical, have taken to themselves the entire government of society, civil no less than sacred. It was thus in ancient India and Egypt, and to some extent it was thus, too, in Mediaeval Europe—the office being debased and ultimately weakened by the very means which were taken to strengthen it. At other times, or in other lands, the theocratical power in the state has been content to yield a nominal precedence to monarchy, to aristocracy, or even to democracy, provided, however, that these last would constitute themselves its nursing fathers, and would, at the same time, profess to receive from it (in whole or in part) as a gracious boon, to their right to reign. Again—and through how long a period even of Christian history do we find the temporal and the spiritual authority engaged—now in an ignoble contest for civil supremacy,—now in a league not less ignoble, to trample down the liberties of the people, and to build up a twofold despotism—the one over opinion, the other over will and act. At one period, all without the Church being ignorance and anarchy, ecclesiastics became the master-spirits of the time, and priestcraft was too often but another name for almost all government; at another, royalty being needed to centralize interests hitherto separate, and to harmonize discordant powers, the crossier was compelled to succumb before the sceptre, and the edicts of a king became supreme, even in matters that touched only the Church's faith, discipline or worship.

How large a share of the world's history, both ancient and modern, is occupied with these multiform and often stormy attempts to adjust the social and legal position of the Ministers of religion, to their true character and functions! And what does that history prove? It proves, in the first place, how firm and unyielding is the hold on the human mind of religion and its Ministers; since no violence from without, though all the other powers of society be leagued against it,—no errors or corruptions from within, be they never so flagrant, have sufficed for its destruction. Cast down, and to all appearance destroyed to-day, religion rises with renewed and resistless vigour to-morrow. This same history teaches, too, that when different forms of religion come into conflict, all must at length yield before that which springs from the simple and positive command of God. Never, for instance, in ancient times, did Judaism and Paganism meet in fair and open field, that it was not soon seen how powerless are the inventions of man, when arrayed against the teachings and institutions of the Most High.

* In the latter case the office is hereditary; in the former it is elective. The distinction is fraught with most important consequences, some of which are noticed in Guizot's Modern Civilization, Lecture 3d.

* Canon XXVII. of 1822.

But the lesson which I would especially command to your notice, as deducible from the religious history the past, is, that the Ministers of God never go forth in the simple majesty of truth—cementing no alliance with thrones—courting no friendship with the world, that they do not quickly triumph. How was it in the first centuries of our own era, when the Missionaries of God's last dispensation to man—though few in number and humble in rank—had to encounter a world in arms? Strange, that the fact then made manifest, was so soon forgotten. Strange, that men who had filled the earth with their doctrine—men who with no help, except from God and their own brave hearts, had won to their standard the talent, the learning and the wealth that rule mankind—strange, indeed, that they should have superseded so soon the simple instruments of such a victory by corrupting alliances with unhallowed passion and with worldly power. But so it is. From the reign of Constantine down to the landing of our fathers at Jamestown and at Plymouth, through more than a thousand years of strife, and toil, and bloodshed, even Christian Europe was slowly working its way towards that truth, which to us seems written as with a sun-beam on all the teaching of Christ, and on the triumphant mission of his Evangelists. That the Ministers of religion are Ministers of religion, that their functions are simply spiritual—that on the one hand they have no concern (except as they act on the great fountains of human opinion) with civil legislation, and that, on the other hand, that legislation has no authority over them, except as they are men and citizens,—that the Church and the state are independent but co-ordinate powers, the one having cognizance of things temporal, the other of things spiritual—and that the one only appropriate weapon of God's Ambassadors is TRUTH—truth in doctrine and truth in life—truth warning every man, truth teaching every man, truth rebuking every man, with all long-suffering, and yet with all authority—this is a principle which may be familiar to us as household words, but which to the world at large, and even to Christendom itself was long unknown, and which at this very hour is to most of Christendom but imperfectly unfolded.

And is this our province? Is it religion, as contra-distinguished from all the arts and professions of civil life, and from all the functions of civil government? It is religion, too, as an all-comprehending and all-pervading power—one that can penetrate, hallow, and bind together the humblest and the highest interests. Hence nothing is beneath his notice or sympathy, who is wise to win souls. Does he look for example on industry, on the arts that sustain and gladden our material life?—He can see there a power, which properly directed must contribute beyond measure even to man's intellectual and moral elevation; and hence as a minister of God, he would, in his appropriate sphere, and by appropriate means, at once promote and sanctify those arts. Does he look again on science and literature, with their hand-maids the press and general education? There, too, he sees forces, mighty for good, if wisely controlled, but almost omnipotent for evil, if loosed from the sovereignty of conscience and the fear of God; and hence he would pour into these well-springs of the world's hope salt from on high. Or does he turn to the philanthropic movements of our own time—movements that would smoothe one and another visage of human woe, and spread over earth the sunshine of a higher and more joyous life—these the minister of God would keep from perversion and decay, by infusing into them the divine life of faith, and imposing on them the holy restraints of law. He knows that the Cross won its most memorable victories over the hearts of men, when its apostles were most intent on assuaging human sufferings, and on subserving even here on earth the utmost happiness of all. And in all past time, it has been the glory of that Cross, that its heralds have gone through the world as the leaders of a true civilization, no less than as the leaders of a true faith. Even when the bands of society were loosed amid the darkness and chaos of the middle ages; when the clergy had become invested, through the force of circumstances, with too much of worldly supremacy, and were devoted too exclusively to the interests of their own order, even then they were the world's best temporal benefactors. But for them, Europe must have fallen back, during that awful period, into the barbarism of her Vandal invaders. It was in their monastic retreats, that the almost extinguished fires of learning were kept alive with pious care; and that all the arts of peace were fostered with a wisdom and munificence, worthy of undying remembrance.* Never be it otherwise. When we strike at the ignorance and corruption of men, we strike at the great root of all social evils; and when we labour to regenerate the spirit of society, we are then labouring most effectually for the regeneration of its forms and institutions. But let our labours be guided by an enlarged and enlightened spirit. Whatever makes man more thoughtful, forecasting, or even more decorous, makes him more open also to the appeals of religious truth. Hence, though divorced from all the employments and dignities of the world, we should still bid God speed to whatever can lift our race to more of physical comfort, or to more of intellectual and moral dignity. We should cling to our spiritual functions, and thank God that we are neither burdened with the cares, nor perilled by the fascinations of earthly power; but we should be known, at the same time, as the friends of a comprehensive and true-hearted philanthropy. Our ear should be quick to hear the wail of the oppressed; our eye should be clear to discern the iron that enters into a brother's soul; and our heart should beat in ready and responsive throbs to every pulsation of bleeding humanity. Never may the cause of charity and true brotherhood be monopolized by men, who think to bless the world without glorifying God. As charity must be spurious, where there is no faith, so faith will be but as sounding brass and tinkling cymbal unless it bring forth the fruits of a large hearted love for mankind. Let the power and worth of our ministry be seen then, as in earlier days, in the broad sympathies, with which it animates our studies and our labours. That day, in which the clergy cease to be among the foremost in efforts to ameliorate the condition of mankind, will be a day dark indeed for the prospects of the world—nor of the world alone. The church itself must suffer in the same proportion, since she can truly prosper, under the smiles of her Great Head, only when she fulfils her mission as His Minister for good to men.

NEW YORK.

ASSOCIATE ALUMNI OF THE GENERAL THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.—The annual meeting of this association was opened in Calvary church in this city, on Tuesday evening last, 26th inst., by the usual religious services, at 6 P. M. Prayers were said by the Rev. Isaac Pardee, rector of the Church of the Redemption, and the Rev. Samuel L. Southard, Rector of Calvary Church; and the Lessons read by Rev. William E. Eigenbrodt, rector of All Saints' church, New York. The Sermon was preached by Rev. William Watson, rector of St. Peter's church, Plymouth, Conn., on 2 Cor. vi. 4—"In all things approving ourselves as the ministers of God." It was a sound, affectionate, and practical discourse; and was listened to with great attention by a very respectable auditory. We regretted that so few of the Alumni were present, though the interesting services at Grace church, Brooklyn, and St. Cornelius the Centurion, at Governor's Island, would afford some excuse on the ground of excitement and fatigue. The concluding prayers were said, and the benediction pronounced by the Rev. S. F. Jarvis, D.D., LL.D., who, with the Rev. S. R. Johnson, D.D., was seated within the chancel rails.

The Annual Essay was read on Wednesday, at 2 P. M., in the Seminary Hall, by the Rev. Lloyd Windsor, rector of Trinity church, Cleveland, Ohio. The Holy Eucharist a proper sacrifice. It was a very sound, learned and able discourse, and afforded much gratification to the members assembled. A number of the students also attended the reading. The commencement will be held on Friday next, at St. John's chapel, at 10 P. M.

Monday, 25th, morning, consecrated the Church of the Intercession, Carmansville. Instrument of donation read by the rector. Sentence of consecration by the Rev. Mr. Duffie. Prayers by Rev. Messrs. Balch and Little. Sermon by the Bishop. Other clergy present, the Rev. Messrs. Carter, Peters, and Walsh.

CONSECRATION OF GRACE CHURCH, BROOKLYN HEIGHTS.—This beautiful edifice which was completed and has been occupied for public worship, some months, was consecrated to the service of Almighty God, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, on Tuesday, 26th inst., by the Bishop of Maryland. The procession consisting of the Bishop, the rector of the church, and about forty of the clergy, mostly habited in surplices, together with a large body of the laity, moved from the house of the rector at 10½ o'clock to the church. The procession moved up the middle alley of the church; the bishop and clergy repeating the 24th Psalm. The bishop with the epistoler and gospeller, occupied the sedilia on the south side of the sacarium. Seats were provided on the north side of the sacarium for four of the officiating clergy. The rector, and the remainder of the officiating clergy, occupied the stalls on either side of the chancel. The other clergy present were provided with seats at the head of the nave. The deed of donation was read by the Rev. Dr. Cutler, rector of St. Ann's Brooklyn. The sentence of consecration by the Rev. Dr. Hawks, rector of the Church of the Mediator, New York. Morning Prayer was commenced by the Rev. S. R. Johnson, D.D., rector of St. John's, Brooklyn; the 1st Lesson was read by the Rev. Mr. Watson, rector of Grace church, Newark, N. J.; the 2d Lesson by the Rev. Mr. Hobart, assistant minister of Trinity, New York; the creed, by the Rev. Dr. Muhlenberg, pastor of the Holy Communion, New York; the remaining portion of Morning Prayer was said by the Rev. Mr. Balch, of St. Bartholomew's, New York. The ante-communion was read by the bishop; the Rev. Dr. Crosswell, rector of Trinity church, New Haven, reading the epistle, and the Rev. Dr. Berrien of Trinity, New York, reading the Gospel. The sermon was preached by the bishop; the offertory sentences were read by the Rev. Dr. Taylor, rector of Grace church. The alms were devoted to the schools of the parish. The holy sacrament of the eucharist was celebrated by the bishop, who was assisted in the distribution of the elements by the rector, and the Rev. Drs. Crosswell, Berrien, Seabury, Taylor, Hawks, and W. L. Johnson.

The other clergy present were—the Rev. Dr. Lewis, and the Rev. Messrs. Cox, Eigenbrodt, Spooner, Douglass, Bourne, Hoyt, Harriman, Noll, Diller, Houghton, Jeleiff, Duffie, Halsey, Winslow, Haskins, Leonard, Staunton, Newman, Wiley, Gardiner, and D. V. M. Johnson of the diocese of New York. Rev. Messrs. Fitch and Hallam of Connecticut. Rev. Messrs. Mahan, Peet and Croes of New Jersey, and the Rev. Mr. Taylor of South Carolina.—Churchman.

NORTH CAROLINA.

Report of the Committee on the State of the Church, with the proceedings thereon—published by the order of the Thirty-third Convention, held in St. Luke's Church, Salisbury, N. C.

The Committee on the State of the Church respectfully report:—

That from the Bishop's address, and the parochial reports presented to this Convention, they find the number of baptisms to have been—adults, 144, children, 460, in all, 604; confirmations, 233; communicants, 2,129; candidates for orders, 6; number of clergy, presbyters, 34, deacons, 6, making with the bishop, in all, 41; churches consecrated, 2; ordinations, presbyters, 5, deacon, 1—6.

These statistics being compared with those of 1847, (there being none given in the report of 1848,) show an increase of 11 of the clergy, of 253 communicants, and 228 baptisms.

While the Committee find such cause of thankfulness to God for these manifestations of the Church's increase, they deplore the existence among its members of great agitation and alarm, arising from the impression that doctrines have been preached not in accordance with the Liturgy and Articles of this Church, and that ceremonies and practices have been introduced either unauthorized by the customs of this Church, or in plain violation of its rubrics. As it is not the business of the Committee to say, they do not say, whether or not such doctrines have been preached or such practices introduced; but they state as their full conviction, that whether the case be so or not, the far greater part of the clergy are entirely opposed to any such departure from the doctrines of the Church—that they desire the introduction of no ceremonies unauthorized by the customs of this Church, and are still less tolerant of such as violate the rubrics. Another cause of alarm, as the Committee believe, has been found in the supposition that a society has existed in this diocese, whose character, rules and practices are at variance with the spirit, if not with the laws of this Church. The Committee have assurance, on which they entirely rely, that no such society is at present in existence in this diocese. R. S. MASON, Chairman.

Brethren of the Clergy—In the report on the state of the Church made by members of your order, reference is made to excitement in the diocese, growing out of the idea that doctrines are promulgated and practices encouraged among us more or less repugnant to the authorized doctrines and usages of our branch of the Church. As these doctrines and practices are not specified, your Bishop can address you only in general terms. But he does, by way of charge, hereby address you and authorize you, when you return to your several parishes, to assure your people, that no efforts shall be wanting on his part, so long as God may give him jurisdiction in North Carolina, to hinder the inculcation of any doctrine or the introduction of any practice—come from whatever quarter it may—not in strict accordance with the Liturgy of our Church, as illustrated and defined by those standards of interpretation authorized by the Church itself.

In respect to a particular question, which has agitated the diocese of late, the question of auricular confession, I may here express my conviction that the Book of Common Prayer, our standard of doctrine, discipline and worship, does not authorize any clergyman of this Church to teach or enforce such confession as necessary to salvation, and that the only confession which it authorizes, is the voluntary confession of the penitent, in accordance with the exhortation in the office for the Holy Communion.

L. SILLIMAN IVES,
Bishop of North Carolina.

Whereas, in the Report of the Committee on the State of the Church, mention is made of certain rumors of doctrines and practices not in accordance with the principles of the Protestant Episcopal Church: And whereas, while in the opinion of this Convention, the Church encourages her members to seek, whenever necessary, the godly counsel and advice of her pastors, yet she no where requires the practice of auricular confession and private absolution. And whereas, in the language of the late Bishop Hobart, "the Church of Rome makes auricular confession, the private confession to the priest, by every individual, of all his sins of thought, word and deed, an indispensable condition of forgiveness—the Churchman justly deems auricular confession, and private absolution, an encroachment on the rights of conscience—an invasion of the prerogative of the Searcher of hearts—and, with some exceptions, hostile to domestic and social happiness, and licentious and corrupting in its tendency." And whereas, a communication from the Right Rev. Bishop of this diocese has been made to the clergy during this Convention, expressing his views, which this Convention have heard with great satisfaction, and to which they desire to give extended circulation. Therefore,

Resolved, That 1,000 copies of the Report of the Committee on the State of the Church, together with the charge of the Bishop, and this preamble, be published in pamphlet form, and distributed by the secretary to the different parishes.

'STAND, AS AN ANVIL, WHEN IT IS BEATEN UPON.'

St. Ignatius to St. Polycarp; both Martyrs.

"Stand, like an anvil," when the stroke
Of stalwart men falls fierce and fast:
Storms but more deeply root the oak,
Whose brawny arms embrace the blast.

"Stand, like an anvil," when the sparks
Fly far and wide a fiery shower:
Virtue and truth must still be marks,
Where malice proves its want of power.

"Stand, like an anvil," when the bar
Lies, red and glowing, on its breast:
Duty shall be life's leading star,
And conscious innocence, its rest.

"Stand, like an anvil," when the sound
Of ponderous hammers pains the ear:
Thine, but the still and stern rebound
Of the great heart that cannot fear.

"Stand, like an anvil." Noise and heat
Are born of earth, and die with time.
The soul, like God, its source and seat,
Is solemn, still, serene, sublime.

FROM DR. STEVENS' SERMON BEFORE THE BISHOP WHITE PRAYER BOOK SOCIETY.

The large number of copies printed, alone prevents us from giving the whole of this admirable discourse. After giving a succinct history of the compilation and introduction of the Prayer Book in the Church of England the Author proceeds as follows.

The American Episcopal Church being the daughter of the English, this Liturgy was used in the Colonies, until the Fourth of July, 1776, on which day the vestry of Christ Church and St. Peter's in this city, passed a resolution that owing to the Declaration of Independence, "it would be proper to omit those petitions in the Liturgy wherein the King of Great Britain is prayed for, as inconsistent with said Declaration," and the Rector and assistant Ministers of these associate Parishes, were requested to omit such petitions.

Very important changes in the Prayer Book were proposed in the Convention of the Episcopal Church which was held in Philadelphia, in 1785; but these alterations, though set forth "by order of the Convention," in what has been always since called "the proposed Book," "never received the first sanction of the Church," and though the Liturgy thus altered, was voluntarily used in some of the Churches, it was considered on the whole as possessing variations "greater than the situation or wishes of the Church justified or required." The Constitution of 1786, which consolidated and organized the Church in these United States, was ratified by the Convention assembled in Philadelphia, in 1789; in which Convention, sitting for the first time as a Constitutional body, in its appropriate division of a "house of Bishops," and a "house of Clerical and Lay delegates," the Liturgy underwent a thorough revision; and on the 16th of October, the Book of Common Prayer as we now have it, with the exception of a few Offices, and the Articles of Religion, was set forth and established as the Liturgy of this Church.

Then was it, that the American Church, having now the Canonical number requisite to the transmission of the Apostolic line, and being fully organized by its Conventional action, stood out before the world, independent of political ties, primitive in her regimen, purified in her forms,—a King's daughter," holding in her two hands the Sacraments of Christ's institution,—treasuring, in her mind "the faith once delivered to the Saints,"—enshrining in her heart, the Saviour who bought her with his blood, and robed "in clothing of wrought gold," that liturgy, taken from the Ophir mines of Holy Scripture and ancient Christianity.

Thus the Prayer Book is eclectic in its materials; conservative, in its spirit; apostolic, in its polity; and biblical, in its doctrines. Its prayers, composed mostly by Saints and Martyrs, have fledged, with their winged words, the devotions of fourteen centuries. Its praises, made up of the Psalms of David, and other hymns scattered through the Bible, have been sung in "the house of our pilgrimage," more than two thousand years. Its Lessons, selected from the Scriptures, teach us truth, in the very words of those, who "spoke as they were moved by the Holy Spirit;" while the tendency of the whole Service and of every Office, is to point to Jesus Christ, as "the Lamb of God, who taketh away the sins of the world."

We do not claim for our American Prayer Book, that it is perfect; no production of the human mind can be; but we do, with all sincerity believe, and with all modesty, declare, that it is the best liturgy, framed by any body of men since the establishment of Christianity. In no system of earthly worship, is the Redeemer in his offices and relations, more clearly, or more constantly kept before the people: so that the sentiment is as truthful as it is elegant, that "the Prayer Book is to the Bible, what the moon is to the sun, beautifully reflecting on its every page, the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ."

Such, brethren, is a very succinct history of our Prayer Book, during the last three hundred years. Centuries embosoming greater events, or more prolific in the head springs of mighty and wide spreading influences, have never measured their shadows on the dial plate of time: for within these three centuries there have been concentrated, more of intellectual light, of truth, of science, of philanthropy, of freedom, than can be found in any millennium of years since the world began.

The first centennial Anniversary of the establishing of the Prayer Book, fell upon gloomy times for Churchmen, and for the Liturgy. Charles the First had been beheaded, and the star of Cromwell was in the ascendant. The Assembly of Divines at Westminster, had endeavoured, though ineffectually, to establish the 'jus divinum' of Presbyterianism; and the two houses of Parliament, interdicting the use of the Liturgy, required subscription to "the solemn league and covenant." "It was a crime in a child," says Macaulay, "to read by the bed-side of a sick parent, one of those beautiful collects which had soothed the griefs of forty generations of Christians." The glad season of Christmas, interweaving with its hallowed ties the most tender and joyful associations of domestic life, was turned by the 'Long Parliament' into a day of fasting, and severe punishments were denounced, and inflicted against those, who presumed to blame the Calvinistic mode of worship. The voice of the Church was silenced, and her ministers ejected from their benefices by thousands, wandered about "being destitute, afflicted, tormented." But though the cloud which overshadowed this first centenary was dark, the sun was behind it, and the proscribed Liturgy again echoed through the Churches and Cathedrals of England.

Another hundred years rolls over the Establishment, and the second centennial Anniversary of the Book of Common Prayer, finds Britain reposing in peace upon the treaty of Aix la Chapelle, after the turmoil of an eighteen years war. The Jacobite party, which upheld at once the Dynasty of the Stuarts, and the Church of Rome was defeated, and the principles of the English Reformation, were recognized as the basis of civil and ecclesiastical government.

Another hundred years of eventful history have passed, and to-day we celebrate the third centennial Anniversary of the establishing of the Prayer Book. Three hundred years ago, the Service of that book, was said, only in the few Dioceses between Northumberland and Devon; now, the Liturgy of the English and of the American Churches, is heard in every quarter of the world; and the more than hundred Bishops of these Churches, now lift up the Cross, upon the coast of China, by the banks of the sacred Ganges, amidst the spice groves of Ceylon, in the once Cannibal Islands of the South Pacific, in the Convict Colonies of Australia, on the Southern promontory of Africa, along the classic shores of the Mediterranean, in the bosom of the Turkish Empire, on the bleak headlands around the Gulf of St. Lawrence, on the Tropic Islands of the Caribbean Sea, and in the very land where He who hung upon the Cross, lived, died, rose from the dead, and ascended to Heaven. What a triumph is this! The morning sun as he rises successively on the nations, is ever followed by the morning prayers, of our own or our mother Church; and the setting sun, sinks behind mountain, or plain, or wave, with the Evensong of the same Holy Service.

A few remarks upon the value and importance of our Prayer Book, must close this discourse. When we enter the courts of the Lord, we should do it, for the purpose of offering up Prayer and praise to God, and of being instructed in His Holy Word. That service then is the best, which most draws forth devotion, most elevates the soul, most edifies the mind, and enables us, in the most intelligent manner, to "worship the Lord in the beauty of Holiness;" for then only is the Church arrayed "in clothing of wrought gold;" when her forms and ceremonies, conduce to make her "glorious within." That our Prayer Book tends to this result, is evident from a few simple considerations:

1. The Prayer Book is the best Devotional Commentary on the Bible.

While the Scriptures excite in us the desire to pray, the Prayer Book puts petitions into our mouths, and teaches us, in the language of her various Collects, to "pray with the spirit and the understanding also." The essential elements of prayer, are—adoration, confession, supplication, thanksgiving and the ascription of praise, offered to God in faith, through our Lord Jesus Christ. These elements enter in a most marked manner into our Liturgy, and it is a noble service which our Church performs for her children, and in which she proves herself a true "nursing mother;" when she gives them these models of prayer, whereby the pious emotions of the heart are shaped and moulded, in forms and words, so applicable to every want of the soul, and to every relation of life which admits of public prayer. Is there a cause of thanksgiving, there overlooked? Is there a blessing, that is not there invoked? The very name of our Service carries with it a goodly savour, it is "Common Prayer;" common for both minister and people, for rich and poor, for the educated and the ignorant. The minister does not rise and pray alone, in words and phrases with which his congregation are not conversant; but they pray together, repeating in common the same petitions for grace and peace. The Book of Common Prayer, shows us how to pray when we are in sickness, and when we are in health; when we are in adversity, and when in prosperity; when in affliction, and when in gladness; when on land, and when at sea; when in danger, and when in security; when sorrowing for sin, and when joyful through hope.

The holy men of old, to whom we are indebted for most of these prayers, seem to have distilled from the Bible the very spirit of supplication, and to have embodied in the Litany, the very substance of devotion. There is indeed, a wonderful minuteness, as well as comprehensiveness; a marvelous individuality, as well as universality, in the petitions of our Prayer Book; reminding us, in this particular, of the tent which the Fairy gave to Prince Ahmed; fold it, and it could be carried in the hand of a lady; spread it, and the armies of the Sultan could repose beneath its shade: folded, the Prayer Book forms the daily Service of the individual Christian as he enters into his closet, and shuts to the door: expanded, it compasses the worship of the Sacramental host of "Christ's Church Militant."

2. The Prayer Book is the best Eucharistic Commentary on the Bible. It is as much our duty to give thanks, as it is to pray; and if we need to be taught how to do the one, we also require instruction on the other.

The eucharistic or praise-giving portion of our service, is made up of Psalms, verses, and the inspired songs of Mary and Zacharias. To these hymns of Scripture, the Church has added the sublime 'Gloria in Excelsis;' the ancient 'Te Deum' of Ambrose; the 'Benedicite' of the three children, borrowed from the Jewish Service; the 'Veni Creator Spiritus' of the Ordinal, and the exulting 'Trisagion' of the Holy Communion.

In the language of these Royal Psalms, and lofty Anthems we find a true, and ample Directory of Praise, and thanksgiving, suited to bear upward our every emotion of gratitude and love. Especially in the Book of Psalms, broken into daily portions, or grouped into kindred 'Selections,' or mingled with other services, do we learn words of praise, and terms of thanksgiving, every time we meet for worship; and by frequent use of these, we are made familiar with the eucharistic language of the inspired volume.

What is more delightful than to hear the soft voice of female piety, the clear accents of youth, the manly tones of riper years, and the tremulous cadence of age, blend together in the praises and ascriptions and thanksgivings of this Divine Psalter, and answer back the alternate readings of the chancel! it seems to emulate the worship of Heaven, where the Seraphim "cry one to another" in responsive praise, "Holy, Holy, Holy is the Lord of Hosts." And here I cannot but notice, how beautifully our service interweaves instruction, prayer, and praise. We confess our transgressions and sing; we peruse the first lesson and sing; we read the second lesson and sing; we pray and sing; we read the Epistle and sing; we speak the Gospel and sing; we preach and sing; we pray in the Communion Office and sing; we give thanks to God for feeding us with those holy mysteries, and then lift up our united voices in the pealing chaunt "Glory be to God on High." Thus our Liturgy like the ladder of Jacob, reaches unto heaven, and enables us to climb up with the Angels on its rounds of prayer and praise.

3. The Prayer Book is the best Sacramental Commentary on the Bible.

Our blessed Lord gave to his Apostles, two Sacraments, to be set up in all the world, and to continue until his coming again. These, Baptism, and the Lord's supper, have each "an outward and visible sign of inward and spiritual grace;" and in the offices connected with their administration, the origin, nature, efficacy, and benefit of each, are stated in a clear, comprehensive, and scriptural manner.

There is not a paragraph in the Prayer Book, explanatory of either, but what is consistent with the word of God, and "may be proved by most certain warrants of Holy Scripture."

We do not set forth seven Sacraments with the Papists, nor abolish all, with the Friends; but hold only to two, "Ordained of Christ our Lord in the Gospel." We do not believe in Transubstantiation with the Romanists, nor in Consubstantiation with the Lutherans; but declare the spiritual presence of Christ to all who, by faith, partake of those holy mysteries. We do not degrade them with the Zuinglians into bare signs and badges, nor regard them, with many of the sects around us, only as memorials of a past event; but we assert in the language of our 25th Article that "they be certain sure witnesses, and effectual signs of grace and God's good will towards us, by the which He doth work invisibly in us, and doth not only quicken, but also strengthen and confirm our faith in Him." The Prayer Book neither elevates sensible symbols to the disparagement of faith, nor spiritualizes them, at the expense of sense; it neither dresses them up with superstitious rites, nor strips them of outward and befitting forms; but, in the estimation of the wisest and most pious men, best expounds those "mysteries" which it does not like the men of Sethshemesh rashly presume to "open," but meekly to receive, in the spirit, with the design of Him who gave them, as outward signs of inward grace, as seals of the Covenant of faith, as pledges and memorials of his love, whereby the soul who "duly receives them" is brought into communion with Christ, through channels, most expressive of the sinner's guilt, and the Saviour's love; and most effective to excite our faith and confirm our hope. We may well doubt, whether any formularies of faith more justly interpret the design and import of these Sacraments, than the offices of our American Prayer Book.

4. The Book of Common Prayer is the best Ecclesiastical commentary on the Bible.

It defines for us what the Church of Christ is; speaks of this Church in its two-fold state, as visible and invisible; militant and triumphant; sets before us the Sacraments, and Ordinances of Grace entrusted to its keeping; indicates its offices in their triple order, and declares, that "it is evident unto all men diligently reading Holy Scripture and ancient authors, that from the Apostles' times there have been these orders of ministers in Christ's Church." The Ordinal also teaches the duty of these ministers to themselves, to their families, "to all the flock over the which, the Holy Ghost hath made them overseers; whether in the small bounds of a Parish, or in the wide range of a Diocese. Thus the origin, nature, ordinances, ministry, and Sacraments of Christ's Church, as found in the Bible, are by the Prayer Book truly gathered up, and soundly interpreted, according to the best Canons of criticism, and the reflected light of the age "presently after the Apostles' times;" thus establishing for us that Episcopal Polity, which "is confessedly so ancient, and so Catholic, it cannot with reason be denied to be Apostolic."

Lastly, the Prayer Book is the best Doctrinal commentary on the Bible. It has been justly styled "the poor man's body of Divinity," for it is a compendium of the whole theology of Revelation. The professed, doctrinal teachings of our Prayer Book, are found in the Creeds, the Catechism and the Articles of "Religion," though were these removed altogether, the Prayer Book would still teach, and that too, in no uncertain manner, the great doctrines of the Gospel. The Creeds, Catechism and Articles, do not declare dogmatically any scholastic formula, nor defend any sectarian theology. They follow neither the 'Council of Trent' nor the 'Synod of Dort'; neither the 'Confession of Augsburg,' nor the 'Westminster Catechism'; they deliver Bible truth, mostly in Bible language, unmixed with human speculations, and unalloyed with human subtleties. Every leading doctrine is expressed with clearness, and fullness; and while they establish no Procrustean bed of Theology, measuring every minor point on the couch of its own formula; they do insist with inflexible rigidity, upon every truth which is necessary to salvation.

But the doctrinal teachings of the Prayer Book, are not confined to the formal statements of truth in the Symbols, Catechism and Articles; the whole Liturgy is eminently theological. Its prayers, praises, thanksgivings, exhortations, commandments, absolutions, confessions, Epistles, Gospels, Psalter and Offices of every sort, speak out, trumpet-tongued and trumpet clear, the pure truths of the Gospel of Christ: so that perhaps in a single morning service, the entire circle of Christian doctrines is brought prominently before the worshipping assembly.

The Holy Ghost here preaches to us through the commandments given by Moses; through the Psalms sung by David; through the Prayer taught by Jesus; and through the Lessons and Epistles, and Gospels, written by Kings and Prophets, Evangelists and Apostles.

It has been well said, that "the standard of our worship, is in truth, the standard of our faith;" for we may boldly challenge our adversaries, to produce any one Article of our Faith, which is not contained in the formularies of our worship: or any one sentence in the formularies of our worship, which is not in letter, or spirit, contained in the writings of the ancient church. What an advantage does this give us over every other form of worship! In our service we are taught the doctrines of the Bible through the affections, and the understanding is illuminated, by the flame that shoots up from the altar of devotion.

We can worship "in spirit" only as we worship "in truth;" and we can worship "in truth," only as we worship "in spirit;" glorious then, and worthy to be praised, is that Liturgy, which teaches us at the same time to pray with the heart, as well as with the understanding; and which enables us, when we come into the Sanctuary, to "worship Him who is a Spirit, in Spirit and in truth." Such a theology, learned at the Mercy Seat, rather than from the pulpit; grafted into the soul by devotion, rather than wrought into it by reason; is the surest preservative of church purity, and doctrinal truth; and is a mode of inculcating, and expounding religious views, consonant at once with the laws of Pyschecology, and with the declaration of the blessed Jesus, "If any man will do his will, he shall know of the doctrine whether it be of God." Nor should it be forgotten, in connection with this point, that the various exponents of faith which we find in the Prayer Book, have preserved the great body of the Church in doctrinal purity, at a time when the landmarks of every other faith have been removed, and the bulwarks of every other church have been weakened, or razed to the ground. Amid the mighty conflict of opinion which has raged for the last three hundred years in the religious world, the Creeds, the Catechism, the Articles, and the Liturgy of the Church have been the four-fluted anchor which she has cast upon the Rock of Ages; and as she safely rode to her moorings, she has beheld drifting by her, the neological and rationalistic fragments of the once lofty Lutheranism of Germany; she has seen floating along, the wreck of the renowned Genevan Church split up into Romanism and Socinianism; she has marked the dismantling, almost at her side, of Puritanism and Independency; breaking up in the gale of factious theology, into a hundred splinters; and though at times she herself has surged heavily in the labouring sea; though at times almost shattered in the fury of the blast; and though at times partly scuttled, by the treachery of professed friends; yet she has never parted her cable—she has never weighed her anchor, it is now, where it has been hundreds of years, "within the veil," and it holds the Church now, where it has always held her, fast to the Rock, whence cometh our salvation.

SATURDAY, JULY 7, 1849.

The absence of the Editor this week will, it is hoped, be accepted as a sufficient apology to correspondents whose favours should not receive due attention. Several books and pamphlets are also awaiting his return.

ANNUAL MEETING OF THE BOARD OF TRUSTEES OF THE GENERAL THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.

From various causes, this meeting has been looked forward to as a most important one by many in the Church.

The Board assembled in the Sunday School room of St. John's Chapel, at six o'clock on the afternoon of June 27th. The Bishop of New Jersey, the senior Bishop present at its organization, presided. There were also present the Bishops of Vermont, Maryland, Pennsylvania, and Maine. The Rev. Dr. Higbee was re-elected Secretary. The Report of the Treasurer having been read, it was announced by Mr. Harrison, that he must decline a re-election. This announcement was heard with general regret, as Mr. H. has rendered long and faithful services to the Seminary, and deserves the thanks of all its friends for his efficient administration of its Treasury.

The Report of the Dean of the Faculty was next read by the Secretary. After giving a favorable account of the condition of the Seminary buildings &c., the Dean took that occasion to renew the testimony, which he had elsewhere given, as to the soundness of the internal condition of the Seminary, and the diligence and dutifulness of the students.

The Report of the Faculty was next read, giving an account of the admissions to the Seminary, during the year. Twenty-four students, members of the senior class, were recommended to the Board to receive their Diplomas as graduates of the Seminary.

The report of the Committee of the Board, appointed to attend the "Final Examination," was then read by its Chairman, the Rev. Dr. Jarvis. A clearer or more satisfactory report was never presented. The selection of the Chairman, which was done a year ago, was wisely ordered. As the late attack upon the Seminary originated within the Diocese of Connecticut it was well that a distinguished Presbyterian of Connecticut, should associate her with this honorable and manly vindication of those, who had been unjustly aspersed. Dr. Jarvis is also universally admitted to be eminently qualified to judge in a case which concern the points at issue between our Church and that of Rome. And, although recognised as a true Churchman, he has lived in Connecticut, and has never been suspected of being an abettor of Romanizing.

Dr. Jarvis stated in his report, which we rejoice to think will soon be before the Church, that the Committee, having in view the reports, and charges made against the students of the Seminary, had requested the Professor, in whose department these subjects came up, to direct their examinations more particularly to the points of difference between our Church and that of Rome. The professor cheerfully acceded to the request. After commending all the examinations, reference was made particularly to the senior class, by the Professor of Systematic Divinity and Ecclesiastical History; whose departments have most to do with the Papal controversy. Dr. Jarvis testified, that more thorough or searching examinations, the Committee had never heard; and that they were alike honourable to the Professors and students; the Committee were satisfied by this examination, as to the doctrinal soundness of the students, and the perfect conformity of their views and principles with those of the Church. After Dr. Jarvis had concluded his able and most satisfactory report, the Rev. A. C. Coxe of Hartford, rose and asked whether that report was to be considered as a precedent. It had always been understood, he argued, that the Committees had no right to inquire into the opinions of those examined. They had only to hear the Professors examine the students, and this examination was to be strictly academical, i. e. upon the authors they had studied in the Seminary. He therefore moved, that all that part of Dr. Jarvis's report, which stated the request of the Committee to the Professors to direct the examinations so as to ascertain the opinions of the students, and also the judgment of this Committee on such examinations, be stricken out. Whatever the design of Mr. Coxe's resolution, its effect is clear. If it had been carried, it would have deprived the students of the Seminary of the legitimate and proper testimony given by an official Board of Examiners. It would also have deprived the Church of the satisfaction to be derived from that Report, which assures her of the soundness in the faith of those whom she is training for the ministry; a report, expressing the opinion of the ablest judges, after a most thorough and searching examination. Happily Mr. Coxe's resolution was negatived by an almost unanimous vote.

Of the other transactions of the Board, the most important was the amendment of the statute in regard to the Pastoral care of the students, so as to make it the duty of the Faculty to appoint annually one of their number to act as Chaplain, and to take pastoral charge of the students.

It was further made the duty of the Faculty to hold two exercises on every Lord's Day at the usual hours in the Seminary Chapel, and at least one on each of the greater holy-days; a sermon to be preached at every service, and the Holy Communion to be administered at least once a month. The students are all bound to attend these services. As the daily service is already celebrated on ordinary days, this additional provision effectually isolates the seminary, and separates the students from connexion with the city parishes. And to perfect its more important bearing, it completes the organization of the seminary as a religious household, and secures to the students immediate pastoral supervision and direction.

This provision, however, is only temporary. The Trustees appointed a committee, consisting of Bishops Doane, Whittingham, and Potter; Drs. Jarvis, Mead, and Atkinson; and Hon. G. C. Verplanck, to consider and report upon the best mode of providing for the appointment and maintenance of a permanent head of the Faculty, to whose office the pastoral care should belong. It is to be hoped, that their action will lead to the permanent cure of the chief defect in the organization of our General Theological Seminary.

The Board adjourned about 2 P. M. on Thursday, the second day of their session, after a most harmonious meeting; at which more practical interest in the welfare of the Seminary was manifested than we have ever before witnessed.

DISCIPLES OF THE GOOD SHEPHERD.

To an afflicted mother, at the grave of her deceased child, it was said; "There was once a shepherd, whose tender pastoral care was over his flock, night and day. One sheep would neither hear his voice nor follow him. He took up her little lamb in his arms; then the sheep came after him."

GENERAL THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.

The Commencement of this Institution was held in St. John's Chapel on the festival of St. Peter, the 29th ult., the Bishop of Maryland presiding.

Morning prayer was said by the Rev. A. B. Hart, assisted in the lessons by the Rev. Mr. Everett.

Testimonials of having completed the full course of study were delivered by the Bishop to the following gentlemen:

Frank W. Anthony, A. B.	Wentworth L. Childs, A. M.
Edwin R. T. Cook, A. B.	Samuel Cox, Jr., A. B.
Erastus F. Dashiell, A. B.	Malcom Douglass, A. B.
George B. Draper, A. M.	John J. Elmendorf, A. M.
William A. Fiske,	William J. Frost, A. B.
Samuel Hollingsworth, A. M.	William O. Jarvis,
Joseph W. McIlwaine, A. B.	George H. McKnight,
William A. McVickar, A. B.	William Markoe,
Charles J. Muenschner, A. B.	William W. Olssen, A. B.
John A. Paddock, A. M.	Charles M. Parkman, A. B.
Nathaniel Pettit,	Edmund Roberts, A. B.
George Slattery, A. B.	William M. Willian, A. B.

After which they knelt and received his blessing.

In the absence of the Bishop appointed to address the students, Bishop Whittingham delivered a sermon, setting forth the duties of those who assume the sacred office, in such a manner, that we deeply regret the loss which the clergy generally will experience by the operation of a rule adopted at the late meeting of the Trustees; which sets aside the usual practice of printing the Commencement sermons. He afterwards proceeded to administer the Holy Communion, assisted by the Rev. Dr. Berrien and Rev. Mr. Eigenbrodt, of New York, and the Rev. Dr. Morton, of Philadelphia.

The antiphonal chanting of the Psalter and Hymns by the students added much to the life and interest of the services.

Immediately after the Commencement exercises, the Alumni and students re-assembled in the Hall of the Seminary, to witness the presentation by the Alumni of a portrait of the late Rt. Rev. Bp. Hobart to the Library. The Rev. Dr. Haight, who now discharges the duties of the Professorship formerly filled by Bp. Hobart, presented the portrait on the part of the Alumni. Addresses were also delivered by the Dean, the Rev. Dr. Ogilby, who received the portrait on the part of the Seminary, and by the Bp. of Maryland.

SOCIETY FOR THE PROPAGATION OF THE GOSPEL IN FOREIGN PARTS.—The 148th anniversary meeting of this venerable Society was held in St. Paul's Cathedral, London, on the 21st May, when the annual report was read. Besides upwards of 100 clergymen, in full canonicals, there were present, the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Bishops of London, Salisbury, Llandaff, Worcester, Oxford, Bangor, Peterborough, and Ripon.

The report stated that in consequence of the distress in Ireland and Scotland, emigration had reached the unprecedented amount of 258,270 persons; of whom, 142,154 went to the United States, and 116,000 to the Colonies. There are 413 missionaries directly or indirectly connected with the Society; in addition to which it supports upwards of 300 divinity students.

EPISCOPATE OF INDIANA.—Just as our paper was going to press we received the very gratifying intelligence of the election of the Rev. GEORGE UFFOLD, D. D., Rector of Trinity church, Pittsburg, as Bishop of Indiana, by the Convention of that diocese, which met at Indianapolis on the 29th ult. We have only space to congratulate the Church at large on this event, and to state that our Rev. brother will no doubt accept the high office to which he is called.

"FILIAL DUTY."—We are happy to observe that the demand for this most excellent sermon, by the Rev. Dr. Uphold, Rector of Trinity Church, Pittsburg, has led to a second and beautifully printed edition, a supply of which has been received for sale by Mr. J. K. Simon, S. E. corner Spruce and Fifth streets, and Messrs. H. Hooker & Co., S. W. corner Chesnut and Eighth. It is admirably appropriate for Sunday school distribution, and a liberal allowance will be made for that purpose.

CLERICAL CHANGE.—The Rev. R. C. Shimeall has resigned the Rectorship of St. Jude's church, New York; and it has been unanimously accepted by the Vestry.

CHURCH OF ENGLAND.

CONSECRATION OF TWO NEW COLONIAL BISHOPS.—Our noble mother Church of England is still earnestly striving to provide for the spiritual destitution of her Colonial offspring; and we are happy to record the extension of her Episcopate abroad in the recent consecration of the Bishops designate of Victoria, (China,) and Prince Rupert's Land. The solemn and interesting ceremony took place May 22nd, at Canterbury Cathedral, which was crowded with visitors anxious to be present.—His Grace, the Archbishop of Canterbury, occupied the throne, surrounded by a large number of Prelates, and other dignitaries of the Church. The Right Rev. George Smith, D. D., of St. Mary's Hall, Oxford, Bishop Elect of Victoria (Hong Kong), and the Right Rev. David Anderson, D. D., of Exeter College, Oxford, Bishop Elect of Prince Rupert's Land, were then introduced to the Archbishop, and the usual preliminary formalities having been proceeded with, the two Bishops designate retired. Up to this time they were vested in their rochets, the Episcopal habits without the lawn, sleeves, &c. After the lapse of a few minutes, during which time perfect silence reigned through the sacred edifice, the Bishops designate returned habited in full Episcopal robes. The remaining portion of the consecration service, as set down in the Book of Common Prayer, was proceeded with, and the Archbishop, by the imposition of hands, admitted Dr. Smith and Dr. Anderson to the office of Bishops in connexion with the English Church. — see page 197

In the House of Commons, May 14, Mr. Harves, in answer to Mr. Osborne (an anti Church Radical) stated that Hong-Kong had been constituted a Bishop's see, but that the Bishop would be paid from the Colonial Bishopric's fund,—a fund arising entirely from private contributions—and no part of the salary would be paid out of the public funds. (Mr. Osborne "nor his outfit.") Nor had the Colonial office any knowledge of his outfit so provided. It had hitherto been customary to provide for the passage of a Bishop to his destination, and he had no reason to suppose that the practice would be departed from in this instance, but there would be no further expense to the country.

BREWER'S PANORAMA.—The truly beautiful paintings of this great moving panorama are noble specimens of American talent, and we hear but one opinion expressed in regard to them. They comprise the chief natural curiosities of this continent, the celebrated Mammoth Cave of Kentucky, Niagara Falls and River, Mount Vernon, the Natural Bridge of Virginia, the Prairies of the West, &c., &c.; and the correctness and fidelity of the representations of these various objects of interest and curiosity are testified to by many who have personally visited them. We heartily recommend the panorama to public notice and patronage, as a source of refined enjoyment, calculated to instruct as well as entertain. It is exhibiting at the elegant new Sansom Street Hall, between Sixth and Seventh streets, every evening at 8 o'clock, and every Wednesday and Saturday afternoon at 3½ o'clock.

At the Commencement of the University of New York, held on the 29th ult., the honorary degree of D. D. was conferred upon the Rev. L. P. W. Balch, Rector of St. Bartholomew's church in that city.

RESIGNATION.—Instead of repining at bodily disorders, think how many have much greater, and how to be thankful for those you have, and have not. Pain, affliction, &c., is only God's speaking louder.

The house of God is denominated of the Principal "a house of prayer," and not a house of preaching.—LORD BACON.

Diocesan Intelligence.

PENNSYLVANIA.

At a meeting of the Standing Committee of the Diocese of Pennsylvania, held on Monday the 2nd of July, Testimonials were signed on behalf of James Rawson, M. D., late a minister of the Methodist denomination, applying to be recommended as a candidate for Holy Orders in this Church. Also, on behalf of Mr. Francis C. Clements, a candidate applying to be recommended for admission to the Holy Order of Deacons.

The papers of Mr. George H. Walsh, applying to be recommended for admission as a candidate for Holy Orders, were presented and read; and according to usage, laid on the table for action at the next meeting.

M. A. DEWOLFE HOWE, Secretary.

DELAWARE.

ORDINATION.—In St. Andrew's Church, Wilmington, on the Fourth Sunday after Trinity, the Rev. James W. Hoskins was ordained to the holy order of the Priesthood. Rev. Mr. McKim presented the candidate and preached the sermon. The Bishop was aided in the laying on of hands by Rev. Messrs. Brinckle, McKim, and Mansfield.

MARYLAND.

For the Banner of the Cross.

DEAR MR. EDITOR:—

It may not be known to either yourself or readers, that a society exists in the diocese of Maryland, designed to promote the improvement of Church building and music; and with the view of bringing it to your notice, I would offer the following brief abstract of its proceedings during the past year, for publication in the Banner.

The Society for the Improvement of Church Building and Music in the Diocese of Maryland, was organized under its present name, during the sitting of Convention in June, 1848, and has numbered between twenty and thirty members, both clerical and lay. Its affairs have been managed by an executive committee, composed of the officers and two members elected by ballot. The committee adopted by-laws—some of which are of general interest—such as 1st, monthly meetings are to be held; 2d, at these meetings members are invited to read papers giving information upon Church Architecture and Music, and the president or executive committee may make appointments for the delivery of Addresses in promotion of the objects of the society; 4th, the books, drawings, and papers of the society are open to members—daily between the hours of 3 to 5, P. M., in winter, 4 to 6, P. M., in summer; 5th, vestries and congregations erecting new church buildings, or changing their old, are requested to furnish to the society the drawings of such buildings or alterations, with statements of their costs, and such other information as may be deemed useful; 6th, vestries or congregations within the diocese, desiring to build or alter church edifices, are invited to correspond with the society, and shall be supplied with such information at the expense of the society as its means will allow; 7th, rectors of parishes within the diocese are invited to communicate to the society all such information as they are able to give in relation to the time and history of the erection of church buildings under their charge, with their arrangements and architecture.

A contribution of $50, paid at any one time, constitutes a patron of the society, and a contribution of $25, paid at any one time, constitutes a life-member. The annual subscription is $1, with an entrance fee of $2.

The society have the use of a room very suitable for their purposes—where the meetings are held, and the books or drawings are kept. Several books and drawings have been presented to the society by some its friends, constituting the nucleus of a valuable library and portfolio. It is also in correspondence with the New York Ecclesiological Society, and receives its monthly publications.

The subject of Church music has especially engaged the attention of the society, and a sub-committee was appointed to take this matter in charge. To this committee authority was subsequently given to prepare a series of works on Church music, in conformity with certain principles advocated by them, viz.: to provide music appropriate for the ecclesiastical year, adapting one tune to each canticle or chaunt for the morning and evening service. The result has been the publication of the first number in the series of works, entitled "Laus Deo," a plain service for the Easter and Trinity seasons. Should this work meet with the encouragement it deserves, the design is to continue the series in three other numbers for the two other ecclesiastical seasons, and a full service for the use of larger choirs.

It is but justice to the compiler of this little book, to say, that it has been a work of no small labour, requiring the expenditure of much time in its preparation, with the only recompense in view, of advancing the cause of Church music as an all-important auxiliary to the right worship of God in the beauty of holiness.

The society being fairly before the Church, now depends upon the interest and co-operation of its members and friends to secure its future prosperity.

RHODE ISLAND.

The 59th annual Convention of this Diocese met in Grace church, Providence, on the 12th ult., and adjourned next day, after a very harmonious session. From the address of Bishop Henshaw, it appeared that the parishes generally are in a more flourishing state than they have been for the last two or three years. A beautiful new church in Portsmouth has been erected during the last year, at an expense of nearly $10,000, and endowed by the Christian liberality of a pious lady, a communicant of the church. It is built of stone, in the Gothic order of architecture, under the immediate supervision of Mr. Upjohn.

NEW YORK.

ORDINATION.—On Sunday last, the fourth after Trinity, a special ordination was held by the Bishop of Maryland, in Trinity Church, Brooklyn; at which one Deacon, Rev. T. Stafford Drowne, (assistant minister in the parish,) an Alumnus of the Seminary, was admitted to the priesthood; and seven members of the late graduating class, candidates for holy orders in the diocese of New York, viz., Messrs. Edwin R. T. Cook, A. B., George B. Draper, A. M., Wm. J. Frost, A. B., Samuel Hollingsworth, A. M., Joseph W. McIlvaine, A. B., Wm. W. Olssen, A. B., and Wm. M. Willian, A. B., were admitted to the order of Deacons. John McNamara, a candidate in the diocese of Wisconsin, was also ordained Deacon. Morning prayer was read by Rev. Dr. Ogilby; the lessons, by the Rev. Wm. Walton. The Bishop preached the sermon, and administered the Holy Communion, aided by the presbyters present, who also joined in laying hands on the candidates for the priesthood. Rev. Mr. Drowne, was presented by the Rev. Dr. Lewis, the rector of the parish. Mr. McNamara, was presented by the Rev. Dr. Muhlenberg; and the other candidates for the Diaconate, by the Rev. Dr. Haight.

The beautiful and imposing Church, which as regards general effect, is second perhaps to none in our land, was filled by a numerous congregation, whose sustained attention to the services bore witness to their impressive character.

We commend to our readers the following sensible article from the Gospel Messenger.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE MESSENGER:

I thank you most heartily, Mr. Editor, for your editorial of June 1st, on "Romanizing." It expresses I doubt not the real sentiment of almost all sound Churchmen, not only in the Diocese, but throughout our country.

The whole tone and spirit of our branch of the Church Catholic is thoroughly protestant (using the word in its true sense as opposed to Romish heresy)—never more so than at present. We complain of the movement of these young gentlemen of Hartford, the temporary Editors of the Calendar, not because we have any sympathy with Rome, or disposition to tolerate her errors, in the Church; but because we think there is another and better way to reach such evils, if they exist,—more dignified, more peaceful, more effective, more churchman-like. If they could furnish such evidence as they claim to have against any clergyman of any Diocese, there could have been no difficulty in reaching the evil through the lawful discipline of the Church.

Their testimony should have been laid before their Diocesan, and by him have been made the subject of correspondence with the ecclesiastical authority, or authorities, to which the offenders are amenable. Such, certainly, should have been their first step; and no doubt it would have been effective. But what do they do? They begin by publishing an alarming appeal to the public, clothed in no gentle language. Their words are misunderstood and applied where, they say, they were not intended to apply. Mistrust and alarm are excited. An important Institution of the Church deems itself assailed. Angry controversies follow. The feelings of Brethren are wounded. Their hearts are alienated. A stone is put into the hands of the Philistines wherewith to pelt the Church; and most industriously, most vigorously will it be applied.

Neither would I, Mr. Editor, "question the motives of these gentlemen." I believe them incapable of doing intentional injury to the Church. But, I think, and so thinks almost every churchman with whom I have conversed, that they have acted unwisely in this matter. I believe they acted in the first instance, unadvisedly. They speak of "having taken counsel of the elders." But I will venture to assert, (and if I am mistaken it is due to them that the assertion be contradicted) that their own Diocesan, although living in the same city in which the Calendar is printed, had no knowledge whatever of this intended movement, until he saw the first article on the subject in that paper; and that no man in the Church was more surprised or troubled, by the appearance of that article, than the venerable Bishop of Connecticut. I have no wish to protract controversy on this painful subject. You have done well in keeping your columns free from it. That the whole matter of these charges, so far as the Theological Seminary is concerned, will be thoroughly investigated at the approaching meeting of the Board of Trustees; and that the other persons implicated will be duly and canonically presented to the proper authorities, we have every reason to believe. My apology for this communication must be found in a desire that this difficulty may be made the means of impressing upon the Editors of our Church papers, the great duty and necessity of caution and discretion in the selection of the subjects on which they write or to which they open their columns, as well as in their manner of treating them; lest it so happen that "even their good be evil spoke of."

THE VOYAGE OF LIFE.

BY M. R. T.

Per varios casus, per tot discrimina rerum,
Tendimus—

ÆNEID, Lib. 1.

Our life is but a shifting cruise
Upon the seas of time;
Beneath us roll the restless waves,
The stars above us shine.

Bright skies of youth above us bend
And Joy the sail unfurls,
A land breeze drives us from the strand
And blue the ocean curls.

The sunny isles are on our lea
And Dream-land fades fast,
Before the wind we crowd away,
The shores of youth are past!

The ship is tight, the sails are strong,
Our hearts are hearts of oak,
We shrink not from the white wave's rush,
And quail not at its stroke.

The storm clouds hang in dusky folds
O'er manhood's rocky prime,
Loud thunders shake the tropic seas,
We cross the burning line!

Before the trade-winds of success
Now fearlessly we plough,
Ambition's beacon-light ahead
The gold coast on our bow.

Gray Disappointment lifts afar
His summits bleak and bare,
And at their base in anger burst
The whirlpools of despair.

The winds are cold, the fogs are thick,
Like lead the heavy sky,
Our sister barks are foundered all,
Before the gale we fly!

Amid the mists of growing years
Around the Cape we flee,
Old age's waste before us lies,
A lone Pacific Sea.

The tide of time still bears us on,
There is no place of rest,
But aromatic odors breathe
From islands of the blest.

The sea is wide and lone and drear,
And silence everywhere,
But golden sunset on the waves
And music in the air.

The coral reefs beneath us lie
But clear the stars arise,
And in the tranquil depths we see
The image of the skies.

The fourth watch of the night is past,
The day begins to break,
The frozen sea of fate is near,
Oh sleep not now! Awake!

Stand up! thou aged mariner,
Hold fast the swinging helm!
And fear thou not the surf that rolls
On Death's antarctic realm!

Trust thou in God! and though thy sails
In threads must strew the blast,
Thy weary bark shall ride it out
And make the land at last!

INFLUENCE OF LAUD ON THE ENGLISH REFORMATION.

MR. EDITOR:

The following extract is from the Quarterly Review for December last,—No. 167, p. 97. It offers an opinion, concerning the wholesome and conservative influence of Archbishop Laud on the reforming process in the Church of England worthy of consideration, and awakening more thought than it broadly presents.

"It is to him (Laud), more by far than to any other man or even body of men, that the specific character of the English Church, and the fixedness of that character, are due. Until his time, it was more or less a question which of the two contending principles that governed the minds of those within her should bear ultimate sway. On the one side was the doctrine of the Lambeth Articles, and the discipline of the Puritans in their first fervour: on the other hand, the principle professed by Cranmer at the stake, by Ridley . . . , by Jewell . . . , by Hooker . . . , by the established divines of our Church with one consenting voice—that the just rule of all reformation and of all doctrine was to be . . . Holy Scripture interpreted by the doctrine and practice of the early Church. * * * * In the reign of Edward VI., had it been prolonged, and again under the primacy of Abbott, it would have been difficult to forecast the ultimate form of the English Church. There was a vital difference between those who regarded the Reformation as the entry of new principles of religion, to be subsequently developed, and those who thought it a great statute, intended by the abscission of palpable abuses to bring back the Church to a model not ideal only, but historical. And Laud was the man who, as the instrument of Providence, settled this great controversy, so far as the Church of England was concerned. There cannot be a greater error than to confound him with those who in our day may have shown a superstitious regard to ritual observances, and may have believed, or acted as if they believed, that by such means as these the decay of religious sentiment could be repaired. To put a stop to a great convulsive change like the Reformation was as necessary as it had been to commence it. The liberty which was sought by the subscribers to the Millenary petition was a liberty which, as they said, and as we do not doubt they thought, was to touch only matters of ceremonial; but, in point of fact, it involved the ultimate admission of the deepest principles—the denial of any ruling authority in the Church—the supremacy of the private spirit over historical and objective Christianity—over the certainty and permanence of the faith once committed, once delivered in definite form and feature, to the saints. This liberty began by questioning the cross in baptism and the use of the surplice; it next attacked the efficacy of the sacraments and the authority of Bishops; before the Revolution of 1688 it had, in the course of a perfectly consistent and logical development, denied the necessity and the legitimacy of creeds; within an hundred years, the whole descendants of those who claimed it had lapsed into Socinianism; and four years ago, appearing before Parliament as a body in that character, they obtained from it a statutory recognition of their right to occupy the bequests of their forefathers. It is because Laud divined the fatal tendencies of the movement,—because he regarded not only the thing asked, but the spirit and the grounds of the request, and the effect of the concession,—because a deep instinct aiding a profound learning and an acute intelligence, gave him a prophetic sense of what was to come, that his name has been for two hundred years the favourite symbol of regard and veneration among those who have appreciated the constitution of the Church, of natural and consistent aversion among those who have rejected or compromised her principles. He stamped upon the mind of his own generation in the Church . . . a character positive and determined as the Covenanted type itself, but having, what this had not, its immovable basis, and its living connexion with our Lord, in the continuous history of the Church. Within the course of only half a century that character was thrice subjected to searching trial. [* * * during "the Great Rebellion" — "at the Restoration" — "at the Revolution" * * *] On all these occasions, without delay or doubt, her part was taken; but it is not historically clear that Laud was the man who thus fixed and organized the feeling of the Church—who gave it the discernment to discover, and the vigour to eject opposing elements—who built up the bulwarks that have done their work for two hundred years, and that remain to do it still? Either he saw much farther into the future than other men, or if he did not, he was but the more signally an instrument in the hand of God to make provision for that which he did not see.

"Not that we propose to set him up as an idol. In the first place, as a statesman and magistrate we must altogether give him over. Excused he may be for the errors of his age; but God forbid that he should be imitated. As a theologian, we are far from saying that he or any other man should now be taken for a model." * * *

If the Reviewer be correct, the following reflections, among others, offer themselves to our notice.

1. Archbishop Laud was no Puseyite,—an important fact. And we all know that he was not a Calvinist or a Puritan. It remains that he was a CHURCHMAN,—not, of course, without faults. The basis of his mind was large; but, like many other great minds, it was not free from pettinesses.

2. The English Reformation, not being an inspired work, and being vigorously resilient from bondage to Roman wickedness and putrescence, was more intent on escape than on the prospective route of the exodus, whether it should be Catholic or Puritan. On that point, it reserved its PRIVATE JUDGMENT for the greater part of a century. Then, under Laud, by a decisive and still mighty impulse, though not by a formal act, its PRIVATE JUDGMENT determined (more strongly than by votes and parchments) for the Catholic rule.

3. It must be nearly futile to plead as authority, on this question, the English Reformers, and the Homilies, for they all belong to the oscillatory period. Which brings us just where we ought to be, in the protection of Scripture fundamentally, and of Common-sense as the obedient handmaid of Scripture.

4. The Puritanism of the early English Reformation was not the virulent embodiment which it afterwards became. Nor was Anglo-Catholicism, in those days, the thing of gew-gaws and of superlunary sentiment and metaphysics that now usurps that name and teases the Church. Neither of these developments belongs to the primal Reformation in England.

5. If, in our branch of the Church, we tolerate developed Puritanism, we are equally bound to indulge the pseudo-development of Catholicism. Both are "grievous burdens" to the daughter of Jerusalem. Both tend to betray her to stern and cunning foes. But human nature will have it so,—men are not angels,—not one pure good hath ever been given to men, but they dashed it with evil,—and the Church must "endure," in common with all the good and the beautiful of God's creations. Only this: Remembering that they both are pitifully and equally objects of her charity, let her not, while she suffers the sleek Puritan, persecute the gas-inflated and gas-buoyant personation of a Catholic.

Happy the day,—if such happiness do not make us start some fresh quarrel among ourselves, because we are so happy,—like "Jeshurun," who "kicked when he waxed fat:"—happy the day, that shall see both these appendages either dropped from the Church, or melted into it!—So

ANOTHER INTERPRETATION.

I was glad to find in the "Banner" of the 2nd instant, an article on the "Witness Within," from so able a pen as that of your well-known correspondent "O." This is a subject which has repeatedly exercised my own mind; and has recently been the subject of some reflection. I regard it as one of considerable interest and importance in both its theological and its practical bearings; and could hardly mention a writer in the American Church, whose views I could have been so much gratified to learn as those of the talented and clear-headed author of the beautiful hymn, "The Spirit, in our hearts, is whispering 'Sinner come.'" Few men, this side the Atlantic, have, by their writings, done such efficient service to the Church as he; and my very heart rejoiced to find, from the "Banner," that the cloud which has so long hung over him, bowing down his submissive spirit to the earth, is beginning to turn out its "silver lining," giving fair promise of better and happier days to come.

It may seem both presumptuous and hazardous to differ on such a point with a theologian so prominent and approved; yet no man would be less disposed to preclude candid and fair discussion than the writer of the article alluded to. If the author of that article be now considerably advanced in life, still, as the principal "remarks were first penned" "almost thirty years ago," the production is, substantially, that of a young theologian; and "I also will show mine opinion."

Much of the article in question has my entire approbation; and I by no means present myself as an antagonist to the writer. I wish merely to express my views, and then let them go for what they are worth, with no present intention of defending them should they be controverted.

I agree entirely with "O" in rejecting the interpretations which he disapproves; in having no sympathy with those who hold the crude and other fanatical notions entertained by many of the religionists of our day; and in contending that there are "two witnesses," each of whom must testify to the same thing—the testimonies being distinct and concurrent;—"the Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God." I also agree that "the Spirit itself" is the HOLY GHOST. Nor can there be any diversity of opinion with respect to the point, or fact, to be established; it is, "that we are the children of God."

We shall probably agree also that the testimony to this fact is not direct or immediate: it does not run thus, "You are a child of God." The fact, or conclusion, is inferred. Two witnesses give their testimony; the evidence is collated, and found to be concurrent; and the witnesses being unimpeached and credible, the conclusion is drawn, that the person in whose favour it is given is a child of God. Or this point may, as "O" contends, be established with various degrees of probability. But this concurrent testimony, when ascertainable, always furnishes more or less reason to believe the fact. And it is equally true, that, from various causes, the person most concerned may not perceive or appreciate the testimony on one side or the other; and may not, consequently, even when the evidence is strong, feel assured that he is a child of God. So that it is possible that a person of an inferior degree of piety may enjoy a higher degree of assurance than one of different constitutional temperament who lives nearer to God.

It is important to ascertain, before we proceed any farther, what the apostle means by "our spirit." It is clear that he does not mean "the spirit of adoption," or a pious spirit, or any mere quality or affection. Any thing of this kind might be the whole or part of the testimony; but, as the Holy Spirit is a conscious and intelligent person, so also must be the other witness; and if so, then our spirit must be our conscious and intelligent soul—our spirit, in the strict sense of the term, or our spiritual nature. I can see no good reason for making it to be any thing else. If, however, I understand the communication of the venerable "O," he makes "our spirit" to be our conscience. He says, "the Holy Spirit bears joint testimony with our spirit," with our conscience, to our mind or soul, "that we are children of God." Again, "Man has the testimony of a holy conscience—the Sanctifier adds another, a concurrent, a confirming, testimony along with this." This sense of the word rendered "spirit" can hardly be sustained. There seems to be no sufficient reason for departing from the usual sense as given above—the human soul or spirit.

Let us now consider the testimony of the first of these witnesses, that of "our spirit." How is this testimony given? By our own consciousness. I am inclined to think that theological writers often fail to recollect the important distinction between conscience and consciousness. This may be in some measure due to the fact that in the New Testament the same word is used for both. The distinction, however, is necessary. Conscience is a moral or spiritual faculty, whose province is—not, as some imagine, to distinguish between what is right and what is wrong, for this is the province of the judgment, comparing things with the law of God, but—to cause us to approve the right and disapprove the wrong; and, having first prompted to the one and dissuaded from the other, afterwards to approve or condemn us, and give us pleasure or pain, according as we have acted in accordance with the dictates of our judgment, and its own approval and promptings, or the contrary. Conscience, therefore, is not a judge as to what is right and what is wrong; but an approver or condemner of both things and agents. Its concern is not so much with laws and truth, as with obligation and retribution. It is an umpire between God and moral agents; not an intellectual faculty which decides upon the meaning of the law, and the rectitude or obliquity of actions. Therefore it cannot testify as to the state, the operations, or the relations of the soul.

Consciousness, on the other hand, is that faculty which takes cognizance of what is passing within us, and of our actual state and sympathetic affinities. It informs us of our own impressions, perceptions, judgments, ratiocinations, desires, aversions, aspirations—in a word, of our internal states and operations. Of course, conscience itself, and all its workings would be entirely unknown to us, were it not for the evidence of our consciousness. We are cognizant of them only by consciousness.

It is, therefore, by our consciousness that "our spirit" bears witness to the fact that we are the children of God; and conspiring with this testimony is that of the Spirit itself. There are not only two witnesses, but two testimonies, and two kinds of evidence; and these two, not flowing in the same channel, or from the same fountain, meet and concur, in establishing the fact. Since, then, all that is matter of consciousness, and known directly only by consciousness, must pertain to the testimony of our own spirit, we must not make any thing which we know only from consciousness, the witness, or testimony of the Holy Ghost; for this would be at variance with the two points already established, namely, that there are two witnesses and two distinct testimonies, distinguishable in both their origin and nature, and concurring, like two rivers, not flowing together from the beginning, and identical in kind.

The items of the testimony of "our spirit" are such as conscious faith, love, joy, peace, meekness, gentleness, rectitude of principle and purpose, holy aspirations and sympathies, aversion to sin, humility, internal tranquillity. This accords with the views of "O," who says, "The testimony of the Holy Ghost is not figurative or indirect,—not the 'fruits of the Spirit,' faith, works, affections,—for our having these is the testimony of man's 'spirit.'" We must not, then, confound the testimony of "the Spirit itself" with any thing of this nature, or any thing the knowledge of which comes only in this way, i. e. by consciousness.

The next thing is to inquire, what is the testimony of the Holy Ghost, and how it is given. The author of the article in the "Banner" says on this point,—and these are his most definite remarks, "The divine testimony within ranks generically with the emotions of joy, peace, hope; they all, like gracious love, are 'shed abroad in our hearts through the power of the Holy Ghost;' and like the entire 'religion which is from above,' these emotions are 'pure, peaceable, gentle, full of mercy and good fruits.'" Here, be it respectfully observed, identity of cause does not produce generic sameness, else would there have been but one genus of animals. If, however, the testimony of the Spirit itself is said to "rank generically" with these already admitted items of the testimony of "our spirit," because they are generically like them, then we can become cognizant of them only by our own consciousness, through which our own spirit gives its testimony; and how then can we distinguish the testimonies of the two witnesses? Here is the difficulty. Being generically the same, they are not distinguishable in themselves; and, coming through the same channel, and coming from the same place, they are not distinguishable in their origin.

But the author says again, "Holy joy, and peace, and hope, and love, are degrees and variations of the inward testimony of the Spirit, akin to the ASSURING WITNESS from Him that we are the 'children of God.'" It is not a rampant, positive security, but a calm, confirming assurance,—not of final pardon, but of present actual acceptance."

Now, I must acknowledge that I cannot see the accuracy, or logical sequence, of this statement. Certain holy affections, already admitted to be the testimony of "our spirit," are here said to be "degrees and variations of the inward testimony of the Spirit." Here the two testimonies are confounded; the lower degrees and simple forms, as appears, being the testimony of "our spirit," and the higher degrees and the variations are made to be the testimony of the "Spirit itself!" Then again, we are told that these things are only "degrees and variations of the inward testimony of the Spirit, akin [the italics are mine] to the ASSURING WITNESS from Him that we are children of God." Are not the "testimony" and the "witness" the same thing?

But, after all, it appears that the "assuring witness" is an inward and strong conviction of our own! "It"—I suppose, "O" must mean the "assuring witness," for neither grammatically nor logically can it mean any thing else—"It is not a rampant, positive security, but a calm, confirming assurance,—and not of final pardon, but of present actual acceptance." Now of the existence of this "assurance" in ourselves, we can know nothing but through our own consciousness, through which comes also the testimony of "our spirit," and, therefore, the two testimonies are undistinguishable. Moreover, if a person rejoicing in this assurance be asked upon what it is built, he will not tell you that it is the testimony of the Spirit; or the very "Witness within," but that it results from inferences drawn by his own mind, from certain feelings of his own, or from something else which may be equally deceptive and illusory.

I put it, therefore, to the profound, sagacious, and logical "O," for whose judgment, in all ordinary cases, I have the very highest respect, whether he does not here leave open the widest door for the use of delusion and fanaticism? If this door be opened, and left open, in Holy Scripture, be it so; we must not dare to close it. But this, I respectfully submit, is not the fact. Besides, the exposition itself is self-destructive. It is incompatible with a proposition previously laid down; "Man has the testimony of a holy conscience, well examined of course, and most humbly estimated: the Sanctifier adds another, a concurrent, a confirming testimony, along with this,—superinducing an impletory, [a filling up, completing, a plenary] conviction of faith, on the rational conviction already existing, and deliberately and rationally approved." Here are two testimonies, nay, three testimonies, the testimony of conscience, the testimony of the Spirit, and the testimony of rational conviction. The subsequent representation, already examined, makes but one testimony, given, indeed, by two witnesses, but through the same channel—our own consciousness, and therefore but one, as the voices cannot be distinguishable.

Moreover, instead of "the conviction of faith" being "superinduced upon the rational conviction already formed, and deliberately and rationally approved," would it not be better to say, that the rational conviction, when deliberately and rationally approved, results from the testimony of the Divine with the human spirits, that we are born of God? The testimony, as "O" himself says, is made or delivered "to our mind or soul;" and our own mind or soul takes cognizance of the testimony, weighs it, collates it, judges of it, and decides. The result, when satisfactory, is the conviction, the "rational and deliberate conviction," that "we are sons of God." And whatever well-founded assurance we have, is the result of this conviction founded on decisive evidence.

I do not affirm that the Holy Spirit is not concerned in the production of the testimony of "our spirit;" for that He is the moving cause of the whole all must admit. In this sense He indeed concurs in testifying together with our spirits; so that what is called the testimony of "our spirits" is in fact the joint product of the Divine and human spirits. But as this is but one testimony, given by two witnesses whose voices are undistinguishable by "our mind or soul," we must look for something else as the testimony of the "Spirit itself." What, then, is this testimony, and how, and through what medium does it come? And how shall we ascertain that it is indeed the testimony of the Holy Spirit, and not that of some lying spirit, endeavoring to deceive and destroy us; or the testimony of fancy, imagination, or mere natural feelings and emotions?

As already intimated, we cannot receive as the testimony of the Spirit, mere dreams, visions, spectral illusions, imaginary voices, the occurrence of certain texts of scripture, vagaries of imagination, or new and peculiar feelings; for things of this kind cannot be certainly traced to the Holy Spirit; and may come from the spirit of all evil. We must not confound this testimony with any of those affections which constitute the items of the testimony of our own spirits; for although they are the fruits of the Spirit, they are not the testimony of the Spirit. Nor, again, will it do to say that the testimony of the Spirit is some direct, miraculous, or physical operation of the Holy Ghost upon the substance of the soul itself; for although the possibility of such agency cannot be denied, yet this, unless there were some miraculous manifestation proving the presence of the Spirit, would not be testimony, except in our consciousness; and if it were merely a matter of consciousness, then it would not be distinguishable from the testimony of our own spirit, and we should not have the benefit of the distinct, but concurrent and conspiring testimony of two different witnesses. Whatever exists, or is going on, within ourselves, which may be regarded as evidence in this case, is the testimony of "our spirit."

The testimony of the Spirit itself, at least since the days of Inspiration and miracles, is found in the written Word of God, which is the very testimony of the Holy Ghost on all points pertaining to life and godliness. "Holy men of old spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost." "All Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable, &c." There are two passages which seem to me definitely to settle this point. The first occurs in Heb. x. 15-19. The first word, "Whereof," is supplied by the translators, and ought probably to be omitted. It then runs thus;—"The Holy Ghost is a witness to us: for after that he had said before, 'This is the covenant that I will make with them after those days,' saith the Lord, 'I will put my laws in their hearts, and in their minds will I write them; and their sins and iniquities will I remember no more.' Now where remission of these is, there is no more offering for sin. Having therefore, brethren, boldness [or confidence, assurance] to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus," &c.

The Holy Spirit then gives His "witness" in and by His written Word. He was to put His laws into our hearts, and to write them in our minds. Thus, beside the establishment of the theological point which the apostle had in view, we are taught that when the truth is clearly revealed, introduced into the mind, and lodged, or inscribed, deep in the soul, this is the work of the Spirit. But it is his laws previously revealed, and written in the Bible; and thus he indirectly, and the written word immediately, become witnesses to us of certain things; and the result is that holy boldness, confidence, or assurance of faith, that we are forgiven and accepted, which enables us to come into His immediate presence without fear. The truth is the medium of His testimony. Hence we are told that "the Spirit is [the] Truth," i. e. according to Bishop Burgess [of England] the Spirit is a true witness.

AN ENCOURAGING FACT.

MY DEAR MR. EDITOR;

Believing that the following little incident will cheer the hearts of those who are laboring for the good of seamen, I would be glad to make your paper the medium of its publication. In my visitations of the sick wards connected with the Blockley Alms-House, I recently met with a patient whose case elicited immediate interest. He was a sailor, a South American by birth, and possessed of a good degree of intelligence. I found him busily occupied in perusing a Spanish New Testament, and upon further inquiry, ascertained that it was the gift of the Rev. Mr. Robinson, a clergyman of our Church, in charge of the Seamen's Chapel of the Port of Boston. He said that he attended the ministrations of that gentleman whenever he was in port, and was much attached to him as a Minister of Christ. Originally a member of the Roman Church, he had been brought to a knowledge of the truth, and for the last few years, had been endeavoring to lead a consistent life. He said that the New Testament, thus kindly furnished him, had been his companion in successive voyages to the West Indies and London, that he prized its contents, and regularly read it through, and now, that blessed volume is his guide and counsellor while confined to his bed in weakness of body, "rejoicing his heart," and "giving light" to his mental eye. I must say, that I never saw an instance where a more exalted estimate seemed to be placed upon the sacred volume. Should not this fact encourage those who are engaged in furthering the spiritual interests of those who "do business in great waters?" Should it not induce the good Churchmen of our own city to sustain with noble liberality the Mission for Seamen, so auspiciously begun among us? Should it not stimulate us all to redoubled ardour in the great work of Christian effort? and lead us not only to pray, but labour for the advent of that day, when "the ways of God shall be known upon earth"—his saving health among all nations?"

Very truly yours,

EDWARD C. JONES,
Missionary at Alms-House.

From the Churchman's Companion.

LITTLE AMY, OR THE FIRST SUNDAY AT CHURCH.

The bells were ringing a merry peal, and calling the careless and the worldly to the sanctuary, as well as the dutiful children of the holy Church, when little Amy and her mother, fearful of being late, quickened their pace, and reached their seats (for at Burton there were no pews) before the last chime was finished. It was the first Sunday of the little maiden's appearance at Church; but she had been well instructed at home: and instead of idly staring about the church, as I fear some little girls too often do, she kneeled and softly whispered, "Let the words of my mouth, and the meditations of my heart, be always acceptable in Thy sight, O Lord, my strength and my Redeemer." Little children should remember, that when in Church, and indeed at all times, they are in the presence of the holy God. The service began, and little Amy, though she could read but very little, with her mother's assistance found her places, endeavouring to follow the responses. I wish all my young readers could have seen this little child; but to form a just idea of Amy, they shall see her in private; so we will follow her home, and show how truly this lamb understood the privileges and duties of those who have been admitted into "holy baptism."

Mrs. Dendalle had lost her husband in the autumn of the preceding year; but, though badly off, she honestly tried to earn a livelihood for herself and her child, without being a burden on the parish: for this purpose she took in washing and needlework. The neighbours said that, though a widow, Mrs. Dendalle ought to consider herself a happy woman in being blest with such a child as Amy. She had been taught from her earliest infancy to consider herself (at least if she tried to behave as such) a child of God, and an inheritor of the kingdom of heaven; and it was Amy's chief delight to read that beautiful little book, "The Shadow of the Cross," and to fancy herself dressed in a white robe, endeavouring to keep it as clean as it was given her at her baptism.

It was the Monday following the commencement of my tale, that Mrs. Dendalle desired Amy to take up some work to the parsonage. Amy, after being duly wrapped up in a warm cloak, set out. It was an errand which she exceedingly liked; for the Clergyman's sister was always very kind to her, and Amy loved her dearly. When she arrived, she was shown into the parlour by the servant, and desired to wait there. Amy, when left to herself, looked round the room, and seeing a large pot on the table she peeped into it; and seeing it was jam, took up the spoon, and was raising it to her mouth, when she suddenly exclaimed, "What! blot my white robe!" and throwing herself on her knees, sobbingly exclaimed, "Lead us not into temptation!" At that instant the door opened, and Miss Scriven entered. "What, crying, my little pet!" she exclaimed, on seeing Amy's red eyes.

"O, Miss Scriven, I have been so near committing such a sin! If it had not been for your kind teaching, I should not have known better, and should have broken the eighth commandment." And as Amy spoke, she pointed to the jam pot.

"Amy," said her kind instructress, "do you remember the hymn I taught you the other day?"

"Yes," replied Amy, "and it was the last verse I thought of when I was tempted." And she began in a sweet voice to repeat the following lines:—

"O LORD my God, I pray Thee, give Thy child and servant grace to live
According to this promise given:
Teach me to keep my raiment bright,
That I may 'walk with Thee in white,'
When Thou with Thine shalt reign in heaven."

"You know my dear child," said Miss Scriven, "before you could understand the difference between right and wrong, you were taken by your dear parents to be baptized, where God gave you His HOLY SPIRIT to guide you in the right way; and then you have been placed in a happy home, have been taken to Church, and now know how to distinguish between good and evil."

At this instant the door opened, and Mr. Scriven entered. He had heard the concluding words of his sister; and laying his hand on Amy's head, he said, "And may the HOLY SPIRIT, my dear child, follow you, and may you be one of the lambs of JESUS, the Great Shepherd."

Seven years are passed away: it was a bright Sunday morning, when a little boy knocked at Mr. Scriven's door. "Sir! Mr. Scriven! Amy, poor Amy, is dying." And the little fellow caught the Priest by the coat.

"Why, my little fellow, and is Amy so much worse?" asked the Pastor.

"The cough, sir, took her in the night so badly, that she broke a blood-vessel; and she said she could not die without having you to pray with her," answered the boy.

When the Clergyman arrived at the house, he heard that Amy was asking for him. He ascended the narrow stair, and had spoken to her once or twice, before she heard him. "What is it, my child?" asked the Priest.

"O sir, do you think I have kept my baptismal robe clean?"

"Amy," said the Pastor, "it is not possible for mortal man to keep without sin; but the spots that are on it will, I have no doubt, if you truly repent, be forgiven for the sake of the holy JESUS."

"How happy," said Amy, "to die with such an assurance from your lips. LORD JESUS, receive my spirit!" So saying, the gentle creature bowed her head, and her spirit departed to the realms above.

Died.

In this city, early on Tuesday morning, the 19th inst, JANE D. BIDDLE, daughter of Marks John Biddle, Esq.

In the departure from this world of this estimable lady, society has lost a choice and useful member, and the Church to which she was long attached, a devout and consistent professor of her holy faith.

To portray her many virtues and to speak of the excellencies which formed her character, as a daughter, sister, friend, and Christian, would require much more space than a few paragraphs. There are volumes of biography written of persons, whose lives were marked with less of worth—though more perhaps of stirring incident—than belonged to the name recorded at the head of this brief article.

In the domestic circle—where a delicate and failing constitution, as well as loved and assiduous attention to an aged, and greatly beloved parent—confined her for the last few years—there was exhibited a rare and beautiful example, of amiable, gentle, patient discharge of duty.

The loveliness of gospel truth, and simplicity—a tender heart, the kindest feeling—and benevolent action, were conspicuously, though unostentatiously to be seen in all her ways and doings.

She adorned in all things the doctrine of God her Saviour.

None knew her intimately, but to love her.

Her death was like her life, peaceful, calm, tranquil—in the communion of the Catholic Church; in the confidence of a certain faith; in the comfort of a reasonable, religious and holy hope; in favor with God, and in perfect charity with the world.

"Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his Saints."

LIVER COMPLAINT, Jaundice, Dyspepsia, Chronic or Nervous Debility, Disease of the Kidneys,

And all diseases arising from a disordered Liver or Stomach in both Male and Female:

Such as Constipation, Inward Piles, Fullness or Blood to the Head, Acidity of the Stomach, Nausea, Heart-burn, Disgust for food, Fullness or weight in the Stomach, sour eructations, sinking or fluttering at the pit of the stomach, swimming of the head, hurried and difficult breathing, fluttering at the heart, choking or suffocating sensations when in a lying posture, dimness of vision, dots or webs before the sight, fever and dull pain in the head, deficiency of perspiration, yellowness of the skin and eyes, pain in the side, back, chest, limbs, &c., sudden flushes of heat, burning in the flesh, constant imaginings of evil and great depression of spirits, can be effectually cured by Dr. HOOFLAND'S CELEBRATED GERMAN BITTERS. Their power over the above diseases is not excelled—if equalled—by any other preparation in the United States as the cures attest, in many cases after skillful physicians had failed.

Derangement of the liver and stomach are sources of insanity, and will also produce disease of the heart, skin, lungs and kidneys, and lays the body open to an attack of the cholera, bilious, or yellow fever, and is generally the first cause of that most baneful disease, Consumption.

OPINIONS OF THE PHILADELPHIA PRESS.

An Invaluable Medicine.—We have frequently heard the celebrated German Bitters, manufactured by Dr. Hoofland, spoken of in terms of commendation, and we know deservedly so. It is a too common practice, in certain quarters, to puff all manner of useless trash, but in the case of the above Bitters, hundreds are living witnesses of their great moral and physical worth. As a medicine for the liver complaint, Jaundice, Nervous debility and Dyspepsia, it has been found invaluable, effecting cures and thoroughly eradicating diseases, when all other medicines have failed. We feel convinced, that in the use of the German Bitters, the patient does not become debilitated, but constantly gains strength and vigor to the frame—a fact worthy of great consideration. The Bitters are pleasant in taste and smell, and can be administered under any circumstances, to the most delicate stomach. Indeed, they can be used by all persons with the most perfect safety. It would be well for those who are much affected in the nervous system, to commence with one teaspoonful or less, and gradually increase. We speak from experience, and are of course, a proper judge. The press far and wide, have united in recommending the German Bitters, and to the afflicted we most cordially advise their use.—The Dispatch, December 31.

Do our good citizens who are invalids, know the many astonishing cures that have been performed by Dr. Hoofland's Celebrated German Bitters? If they do not, we recommend them to the "German Medicine Store," all who are afflicted with Liver Complaint, Jaundice, Dyspepsia, or Nervous Debility; the Doctor has cured many of our citizens after the best physicians had failed. We have used them, and they have proved to be a medicine that every one should know of, and we cannot refrain giving our testimony in their favour, and that which gives them greater claim upon our humble effort, they are entirely Vegetable.—Spirit of the Times, June 24.

We speak knowingly of Dr. Hoofland's celebrated German Bitters, when we say it is a blessing of this age; and in diseases of the biliary, digestive and Nervous System, it has not, we think, an equal. It is a Vegetable preparation, and made without Alcohol, and to all invalids we would recommend it as worthy their confidence.—Daily News, July 4.

Read the following, it is from one of our first druggists, a gentleman favourably known throughout the United States—the proprietor of the "Medicated Worm Syrup."

Philadelphia, Nov. 22d, 1848.

Dear Sir,—It is with much pleasure that I testify to the extraordinary virtues of your German Bitters, having sold largely of them these last few months to various persons, afflicted with Liver Complaints, Dyspepsia, and debility of the Nervous System. I can say conscientiously, that they are the best article of the kind I have ever sold, (and I deal in all the popular medicines) and I consider it the only medicine for the above diseases before the public.

I have never sold one bottle that has not given satisfaction, and brought forth the commendation of those who used it. I deem this my duty both to you as the proprietor of this highly valuable article, and to those afflicted with the above complaints, that they may know of its curative properties and to enable them to select the good from the various articles with which our market is flooded.

With much respect, I remain yours, &c.,

Jaundice and Liver Complaint cured after physicians had failed.—

Philadelphia, Dec. 27, 1848.

Dear Sir—It is with feelings of pleasure I communicate to you the sanative effects (and in a short time) of your invaluable "Hoofland's Celebrated German Bitters," upon my system while laboring under the Jaundice. About two years ago I had an attack of the Jaundice and was confined to the house six weeks under medical treatment of the Family Physician, and for some time after, when I went out I had to be very careful of myself, since that time I have had several attacks of the same disease, and your Bitters have entirely relieved and cured me in two or three days. My next door neighbor, Mr. John Diehl, last spring, had a long and serious spell of Jaundice, he had it sometime before I knew it; he was confined to his bed. As soon as I heard of his condition I called to see him and told him of the effect your Bitters had upon me in the same disease. He immediately sent for a bottle, and in a few days he was cured. I have in several instances recommended the Bitters in other cases, always producing the same happy effect. My wife has been considerably afflicted with Liver complaint and Neuralgia, by the use of the Bitters she is well, now enjoying good health. We believe from the many cures we know of these Bitters effecting, that they possess in a remarkable and extraordinary degree, great curative properties, and that which enhances their value with us, they are entirely vegetable. We always keep the Bitters on hand and would not be willing to be without them.

Very respectfully, yours,

C. PEIRCE, 370 South Front Street.

Can stronger testimony be adduced by any preparation before the public? A single bottle will convince any one of their power over disease. They are entirely vegetable, and will permanently destroy the most obstinate costiveness, and give strength and vigor to the frame, at no time debilitating the patient; being also grateful to the most delicate stomach under any circumstances, and can be administered with perfect safety to delicate infants—they are free from Alcohol, Syrup, Acids, Calomel, and all mineral and injurious ingredients.

They can be taken at all times and under all circumstances, no ordinary exposure will prevent them having a salutary effect, and no bad result can accrue from an over dose.

For sale, wholesale and retail, at the principal depot, GERMAN MEDICINE STORE, No. 278 Race street, Philadelphia; and by respectable dealers generally throughout the United States.

PASTORAL LETTER.

TO THE REVEREND THE CLERGY:

Dear Brethren,—The following official recommendation of the President of the United States, comes to us from the highest secular authority. It has a claim upon us, as Christians, superior far to that: "the powers that be are ordained of God." I commend it, therefore, to your cordial and devout adoption.

BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A RECOMMENDATION.

At a season when the PROVIDENCE of God has manifested itself in the visitation of a fearful pestilence, which is spreading its ravages throughout the land, it is fitting that a people, whose reliance has ever been on His PROTECTION, should humble themselves before His THRONE; and, while acknowledging past transgressions, ask a continuance of DIVINE MERCY.

It is, therefore, earnestly recommended that the first Friday in August be observed throughout the United States as a day of Fasting, Humiliation, and Prayer. All business will be suspended in the various branches of the public service on that day; and it is recommended to persons of all religious denominations to abstain, as far as practicable, from secular occupations, and to assemble in their respective places of Public Worship, to acknowledge the INFINITE GOODNESS which has watched over our existence as a nation, and so long crowned us with manifold blessings; and to implore the ALMIGHTY, in His own good time, to stay the destroying hand which is now lifted up against us.

Washington, July 3, 1849.

Z. TAYLOR.

In the perfect confidence, that you will heartily carry out the objects of this pious paper, I appoint, as the service, for the day, which is designated therein, the service for Ash-Wednesday, in all its parts: inserting, in addition, in its proper place, the prayer "in time of great sickness and mortality." Most heartily commending you, beloved brethren, and all the people committed to our care, and the whole Church and country, of which we are a part, to the merciful protection of Almighty God; with fervent prayers that the great Intercessor for sinners may stand "between the living and the dead," and so the plague be stayed; I subscribe myself affectionately your brother in Christ.

G. W. DOANE,
Bishop of New Jersey.

Riverside, 7th July, 1849.

OHIO.

REV. MR. LOUTRELL.—The Board of Trial in the case of the Rev. A. M. Loutrell, presented by the Standing Committee of this Diocese, commenced at Columbus on the 16th May, and again by adjournment on the 22d of May, when the accused not having appeared, and the Board having received a sufficient excuse for his not appearing, the same adjourned to meet again at the call of the Bishop.

On Wednesday, June 13th, the Board again convened at the time and place appointed by the Bishop. Mr. Loutrell not appearing, the Board adjourned from time to time, and finally resolved unanimously to report him to the Bishop, for contumacy. The Bishop having received the report, has proceeded, according to the requisition of the first canon of the Diocese, to suspend the Rev. A. M. Loutrell from all exercise of the ministry. The canon provides that if, within three calendar months, the accused shall tender himself ready, and shall accordingly appear and take his trial—his suspension may be reversed.—Western Episcopalian.

III. But we are not only ministers of religion; we are ministers of the RELIGION of CHRIST. Ours is not a religion of types and prophecies like that of Israel; nor is it an engine of state like that of ancient Rome; nor is it tributary to a refined but voluptuous taste like that of ancient Greece. It is neither enumbered and made oppressive through ceremonies, like the law of ordinances; nor is it destitute of all positive institutions and precepts, like the religion of nature. It reveals to us the Word made flesh, and in thus bridging over the mighty void between the human and the Divine, it lays the axe to the root of Deism with its doctrine of fate, and to that of Pantheism with its notions of Divine Impersonality. It solves the awful question which it offers to us, there is peace for the true penitent; and in the ministrations of the Comforter with his gifts of wisdom and understanding, of counsel and ghostly strength, there is abounding succor for all that would live soberly, righteously and godly. In Him who is the High Priest of our sanctuary—the Author and Finisher of our faith, we have the only faultless specimen of human wisdom and goodness that the world has seen, while in the evangelic records this model of a perfect and now glorified humanity is ever kept before us. And then, in its word read and preached, and in its ordinances duly given and received, Christianity has definite and simple channels, through which its divine and regenerating influences can flow down on the human soul—quickening the dead spirit into life, enlightening the eye of faith, warming the heart of devotion, deepening and hallowing the sigh of penitence, kindling the flame of love towards all mankind, and pouring a soothing and strengthening cordial into every fainting heart. Ours is not a religion that has its esoteric and its exoteric system. It has no gross conceptions and imposing pomp to catch the vulgar; it has no decent skepticism to conciliate the proud and self-styled wise. With inflexible constancy, it proclaims to all the same gospel, it exacts from all the same faith, and the same obedience; and yet with a wondrous adaptive and plastic power, it can adjust itself to every state and condition of human life. It has, too, an all-comprehending, reconciling spirit, through which it harmonizes the most opposite and seemingly incongruous principles of man's nature, affording food both for reason and for imagination—for conscience and for the affections, conciliating the love of man with the love of God, and making both consistent with the love of ourselves. Finally, it has a zeal for God's honor, and for the redemption of mankind, that makes it aggressive towards every form of error, sin and suffering, and that can never rest till the triumphs of righteousness and peace have overspread the globe. And when it goes forth to achieve this moral conquest, how does it eschew all the weapons employed by the religions and the governments of man's device, applying no constraint but TRUTH, offering no attraction but LOVE.

Is this Christianity, brethren? and what then is their duty, who are its Ambassadors and Ministers? It is plain. Their duty is to render their preaching and their practice definitively Christian. It is to remember, always and everywhere, that the dispensation they proclaim is a remedial dispensation, that their grand work is first to bring men to a proper sense of their sins, and then to bind up, with balm from Calvary, the wounds that have been opened at the foot of Sinai. In enforcing duty, too, their appeals are to be drawn from the cross—from Christ's constraining love, as at once the source and the centre of the Christian's inner and outer life. And ever in their own lives should they recommend the meek, the condescending, the gentle, the forgiving, yet the uncompromising spirit of their Master. The religion they preach is a religion that teaches by example. It is a religion for sinners. It is a religion for the tempted and the weak. It is a religion for the poor, the afflicted and the oppressed; and God grant that to the sinful, the weak, the tempted and the sorrowing our thoughts and efforts may always be directed.

May I not add that inward sanctity—holiness of heart, is preeminently the duty of a Minister of Christ. He is to seem holy, that his conduct instead of countervailing, may enforce his precepts; and he is to be holy, lest the coldness or corruption of his own heart, obstruct the movements of that Spirit, who through him, would brood, with recreating power, over the hearts of others. Be ye clean that bear the vessels of the Lord, was the injunction even of a ceremonial dispensation; how much more of a spiritual and soul-renewing one. It is the glory of the religion of Christ, that it indissolubly binds together religion and morality; making them identical in principle, adjudging each to be worthless, unless it spring from an honest and true heart, and decreeing that he only can share in the grace of God, who is willing to love his neighbour. Before the Saviour, too, there is little of that distinction, between personal and official sanctity, which the imperfection of human tribunals sometimes compels them to make. Christ holds no one faithful as a Minister, who is delinquent as a man; nor any one innocent as a man, who is derelict as a Priest. His religion blends, and as it were fuses our personal and sacerdotal characters into one; so that the individual is to account for the acts of the officer, and the officer is to stand dishonoured by whatever would stain and disgrace the individual. Serving near the Holy of Holies, that becomes criminal in us which might be allowed in others. Though our personal sins may not invalidate, in respect to others, the force and virtue of our official acts on earth, they often must do it in Heaven; and always our official character goes to aggravate our personal transgressions, since on us—the anointed of the Lord—rests a peculiar obligation to be holy as our Master is holy. And when we go before that Master to render in our last account, office and dignity will all drop away from us, and nothing can remain but our character and our responsibility. Be these, then, the object of our supreme concern!

IV. But we are Ministers of Christ in the PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH. We owe allegiance to that branch of the visible Body of Christ, from which we derive our external commission. We owe allegiance both to its Protestant, and its Episcopal or Apostolic character.

As Protestant it honours the Reformation. That great religious revolution, like all others directed by human and uninspired agency, was doubtless marred by errors of judgment, and by infirmities of temper and motive. But we must be recreant (it seems to me) to our trust, as guardians of the Bible and of religious liberty, if we do not commemorate, with ever-recurring gratitude, this memorable reaction towards the primitive faith. The indefeasible right of the people to the Bible in the vernacular tongue, which was then asserted and maintained—the adjourning of all questions, that touch an article of faith, to that one Book, as the only Divine and infallible arbiter—the distinct and effectual protest then made, against the arrogant assumptions of foreign Bishops and foreign churches to exercise jurisdiction beyond their proper sphere—the restoration to the adorable Trinity of that homage which had been divided between the Virgin, and Angels, and Saints, and Relics, and Images, and Pictures—the lifting to its proper place of the One Oblation, once made by Christ, for the sins of the whole world—the downfall, wherever the Anglo-Saxon race dwells, of a superstition which enabled Priests to tyrannize over conscience, and even to invade the prerogatives of civil magistrates and the sanctity of private families—what were all these but a blessed boon alike to the Church and to mankind! And the fact that at this day there is most of domestic purity, most of general intelligence and enterprise, most of public spirit and public virtue, where the faith of the Reformers is held in its integrity, does not this show that that faith has been approved of God, and is entitled to be embalmed in our fond and reverent remembrance?

Be it ours, then, to cling to that faith. We are Protestants by name, and we are Protestants in principle. We protest against the domination of foreign Bishops, and against assumptions of infallibility by any council or metropolitan, living or dead. We protest against all attempts to shut out God's word from the people, or to fetter the human mind in reading and thinking, so long as it inquires with becoming modesty and reverence. We protest against an intolerance which would visit aberrations of opinion with fire and sword, or with any penalties, save such as imminent and unquestionable danger to social order may demand;—and that intolerance we abhor alike when displayed by those who hate the Reformation, and by those who profess to honour and adore it. We are protestant in regard to some things which obtained even in the Church of the first three centuries, but which were either plainly transient in their nature, or which experience shows are unfriendly to a simple, heart-transforming, conscience-soothing faith. The twelve centuries, which rolled away from Cyprian to Luther, we are far from denouncing. We recognise, with thankfulness, the enlarged and dear-bought experience which the Church then gained; and we would profit by that experience. Errors which were committed unconsciously, and therefore innocently, then, it becomes us not to repeat now. Accretions which the Christianity of the New Testament gathered from various concurring causes, and which were made to further for a time the advancement of society, would now be only incumbrances. We are therefore not to covet them—innocently we cannot strive to restore them. We are not to forget the fate of those who have undertaken to unprotestantize the Church of our fathers. We are to remember how wide is the gulf that separates that Church from the one she has renounced; and that if union is to be effected—coalition achieved, it must not be solely through concessions of ours. It must be union on principles common to both. When the rulers and doctors of that communion shall seem willing even to consider a plan of comprehension—when, for instance, they shall incline, though in the least, to regard as loyal sons of theirs those who would subscribe to the doctrinal statements of our articles, it will then be early enough to ask whether those same articles may not, by some means, be translated into the dialect of Trent, and the creed of a persecuting Pope be made to express the faith of his martyr victims! Until then, it rather becomes us to gather warning from the errors, and instruction from the vicissitudes of that great power. Towards her children and her ministers, we are to cherish only feelings of good will. We are always to remember that, as citizens and Christians, their rights before the law are equal to our own, and that as moral and social beings, with palpitating human hearts like ours, they can be sooner won by kindness, than by railing or by scorn. It is against her too prevalent spirit, that we are to guard, even more assiduously than we guard against her rites and her external regimen;—for that insidious spirit, alas! lives and reigns in many a Protestant heart, in the administration of many a Protestant function, and when thus disguised, it only merits our intenser abhorrence.

But if we are protestant, so also we are Episcopal or Apostolic, holding not only the Apostles' fellowship, but also the Apostles' doctrine and prayers. Ours is an historical religion. We make no attempt, in our reverence for the Scriptures, to ignore the wisdom and accumulated experience of the past. Those who went before us, in the Church, lived, and laboured, and suffered, not for themselves alone, but for us also; and we have entered into their labours. To cast all these contemptuously from us, to launch on the great ocean of Scripture truth, without chart, compass or fixed star, to forego all the contributions to the meaning of the Bible, that have been supplied by the toilsome studies and the eventful vicissitudes of eighteen hundred years, would be a thankless return,—alike to God who made us children rather than fathers in the Church, and to those who have thus bequeathed to us the fruits of their suffering and laborious lives. To attempt to construct for ourselves, unaided, a system of Bible truth, is not, after all, to honour the Bible,—for he who goes to the study of it, goes, almost inevitably, with some preconceived judgment of its import; and unless he have rare candour and force of mind, his prepossessions will be sure to colour its declarations, and will urge him to seek, in Scripture, rather for his own opinions, than for truth. He who would gather from the sacred page the mind and will of God, must have a humble, teachable, truth-loving heart; and with such a heart, no man, it seems to me, can hastily reject the helps that have been provided for him, in the creeds and liturgies of the ancient Church, in the decrees of her councils, and the writings of her fathers. Her pealing anthems, her humble, penitential litanies, her prayers, which first broke from lips hallowed by eminent grace, and mellowed by a wisdom above this world—her creeds, which have borne towards Heaven in every Christian age the confessions of her noblest martyrs and her truest saints—these are the Church's glorious commentary on the Bible. These form her traditionary testimony to its received meaning, and to the faith of those who lived nearest to her days of inspiration. When to all these you add the writings of her greatest doctors, and of those especially who wrote when all around them was toil and danger, you have a mass of venerable lore to which it becomes us all to give heed.

But then the inevitable question presents itself—which, among all this mass of multifarious and sometimes contradictory opinion, is to be regarded as primitive, or Apostolic? To this question, it is obvious, that the whole genius of our Church suggests one answer. We are not to lean, too hastily, to our own judgment. We are to defer to their judgment who were called to consider this great question in the sixteenth century; who considered it amid trials that were fitted to tax to the uttermost their wisdom and their faith; and who have embodied the result of their deliberations—a result which they cheerfully sealed with their blood—in our liturgy, articles, homilies and polity. I am far from holding that no man may go back of these;—but I do hold, that he who does so, and he especially who would set them or any material part of them opprobriously aside, should weigh well the responsibility he assumes. He, with a limited range perhaps of reading; ere he has reached, it may be, the meridian of life; when he has done little or suffered little for the cause of Christ—he would replace, by his individual dicta, the deliberate decisions of his Church, and the combined opinion of men venerable alike for age and for services—for sagacity and for learning. For the Apostolic or Catholic system, as defined by such minds and with such authority, he would substitute opinions, gleaned, it may be, at will and under the influence of an exalted and over-fond imagination,—from the vast mass of literature that the Christian writers of the middle ages have left behind them. Is this reverence for authority? Is this modesty? Is it thus that we shall inculcate the duties of meekness and obedience? Is it by such a procedure, that we are to incite our people to respect the constituted authorities of the Church and the land, or are to do our part towards building up, throughout a world convulsed by anarchy, the dominion of law!

Be it ours then, brethren, to remember our mission as ministers of a Church, which is at once protestant and apostolic. We are to be the friends of liberty, but we are not to be the enemies of order. We are to concede to all—ministers and people—the privilege of reading and thinking; but we are to enjoin on all alike, reverence and self-distrust. We are to catch the catholic comprehensive spirit of our baptismal office, which makes belief, in the articles of the Christian faith as contained in the Apostles' creed, the sole dogmatic test for admission to our fold. We are to uphold, and by our practice, recommend those admirable provisions by which, in our system of polity and worship, we combine the sober with the earnest—the fixed with the variable—the material with the spiritual—the corporate with the individual—the traditionary with the philosophical. We should be sober, because we are always to proceed by rule; we should be earnest, because a large part of our services is uttered in the burning language of Scripture. For the conservative principle we have security in our liturgy and sacraments; for the progressive in our preaching, legislation, and pastoral care. Material symbols we employ and value; but their end is the renovation of a mind enlightened by faith, and their efficacy is made contingent on the humility and true contrition of those who receive them. The corporate relations of the Christian to the Church we insist on as a great and indispensable duty and privilege; but not in such sense as to make that Church his Saviour, nor in any proper sense his Mediator. We may hold to tradition, because our province is to teach no new commandment or gospel; but we are not therefore to scorn philosophical theology, for we are to vindicate the hope we cherish to every man's reason, while we subject all opinions and all systems to that only safe criterion of experience, which is thus set forth by Coleridge, "No article of faith can be truly and duly preached without necessarily and simultaneously infusing a deep sense of the indispensableness of a holy life."*

HIGH AND LOW CHURCHMANSHIP.

We have lately, and more than once, been requested to state the differences between High and Low Church, a request with which we have been in no haste to comply, from a conviction that the terms are pretty well understood, and which we have generally met by referring the querists to the sermon of Bishop Hobart on the subject, which, through the agency of the late excellent Dr. Bayard, was adopted by the Tract Society of our Diocese, and may be had at the Society's Depository, No. 20 John st.

Bishop Hobart's sermon, (we speak from memory, not having a copy of it at hand,) assumes the fact of a division among Churchmen on certain points of doctrine and practice, and argues that as parties exist and we must have names for them, it is better to retain the terms High and Low Church, in a sense suited to the present state of opinion, and without regard to their original historical meaning, than to substitute others in their place. Certain doctrines and usages distinctive of the Church, and plainly declared and enjoined in our Prayer Book, are very dear to some members of the Church, and held, by various degrees, in less estimation by others; and understanding the terms high and low to correspond to these various degrees of intelligent appreciation and attachment, Bishop Hobart takes a High Churchman to be one who is highly attached to the distinctive doctrines and usages of the Church, and a Low Churchman to be one who is less attached to them—who either undervalues and denies or practically contradicts them. It is several years since we read the tract, but we believe this will be found to be a fair account of it.

Episcopacy, the sacraments, order, and the Church as the channel of Christian charity, were the points of the Church system which Bishop Hobart asserted and vindicated against those—the Low Churchmen of his day—who were distinguished by their depreciation of Episcopacy and the sacraments, their extempore prayer meetings, and their amalgamation with schismatics in the distribution of Bibles and Tracts. Since then, Low Churchmen have risen in their estimation of Episcopacy; the outworking of the revival system has dampened the zeal for extempore prayer meetings and other such means of religious excitement; and the feuds and jesuitism of the society system, and at the south the fear of abolitionism, have goaded Low Churchmen into a closer conformity with the order of the Church. This is so much made ground; we have no fear that they who have taken it will be driven from it; but are encouraged to believe that what was at first the result of necessity, will become more and more the offspring of affection and judgment.

So much, indeed, has been gained on some of these points for which Bishop Hobart witnessed, that it is not uncommon now to hear Low Churchmen call themselves "Bishop Hobart men," and say that there would be little division in the Church if all were content with Bishop Hobart's views; and in consequence there has grown up a vague sort of feeling that party lines have materially changed, and that the terms High and Low Church have ceased to be applicable in the sense in which Bishop Hobart used them.

There is no denying the fact, however, that parties exist, . . . as they did under Bishop Hobart himself; and a little consideration will show that the same names are as apt to designate the parties now as then.

We say this in reference to the principle of Bishop Hobart's explanation, rather than in reference to the particular points for which he "fought the good fight." Episcopacy, it is true, and certain stringent rubrics for the observance of order are less cavilled at, but other points, expressed with equal or greater plainness in the Prayer Book, are now the object of hostility to many within and many without the Church; two classes, by the by, which have the same common interests and sympathies on the points now at issue as, in Bishop Hobart's day, they had on the points then at issue.

When we speak of Episcopacy, we do not mean Episcopal regimen. All Episcopalians have admitted that the Prayer Book upholds the government of the Church by Bishops, and this is what we mean by Episcopal regimen; but the point to which many Low Churchmen have risen since Bishop Hobart's time, is to regard ordination by Bishops as the sole channel for conveying the divine commission to minister in holy things; and this is what we mean by Episcopacy.

The points expressed or necessarily implied in the Prayer Book, for which the Church is specially called on to witness in the present day, but to the intelligent appreciation of which many of her members have not yet risen, are chiefly these:

1. Baptismal Regeneration. The Prayer Book says expressly that every person, man, woman or child, that is duly baptized, "is regenerate and grafted into the Body of Christ's Church;" and yet there are many Churchmen who unite with Dissenters to reject the statement or explain it away.

2. The Real Presence. . . . This doctrine is plainly expressed in the Prayer Book; as e. g. "Grant us, therefore, gracious Lord, so to eat the flesh of thy dear Son Jesus Christ, and to drink His blood, that our sinful bodies may be made clean by His body, and our souls washed through His most precious blood, and that we may evermore dwell in Him and He in us." Many Churchmen, however, unite with Dissenters and infidels to deny or evade the statement, and revile it as "Popish."

3. The Prayer Book declares that the sacraments of Baptism and the Supper of the Lord are "generally necessary to salvation;" a declaration of which no intelligible account can be given in respect to the latter sacrament, unless it be that the words of our Lord "Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of Man, and drink His blood, ye have no life in you" refer to it, and so place it on the same ground on which baptism is placed by the parallel words, "Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot see the kingdom of God." There are Churchmen, however, as well as Dissenters, who, by resolving the new birth and the spiritual life into faith, put it in the place of the sacraments as that which is alone necessary to salvation, and explain away the sacraments to be no more than edifying ordinances or symbolical exponents of truth.

4. The sacrifice of the Eucharist as a distinct thing from the sacrifice of prayer and praise. "The Oblation" in our communion service is a plain expression of this doctrine, and yet there are Churchmen who unite with Dissenters to deny it and revile it as "Popish."

Connected with this point are the terms priest and altar, which are plainly used in our Institution Office, while the fact of our having priests and altars is as plainly denied by many members of our Church.

5. Absolution. The Prayer Book limits the declaration of absolution to priests, which were a senseless provision unless priests alone had the power to declare it; and yet one Bishop, in an Episcopal Address, has condemned "sacerdotal absolution" with almost the same recklessness that another has spoken of the legerdemain of the sacraments.

6. The Rule of Faith. Any man who compares the office of Baptism in the Prayer Book with the order for Daily Service, may see that the Apostles' and Nicene Creed, and not the Bible, according to private interpretation, is the Rule of Faith which the Church prescribes to her members. And yet there are many Churchmen who unite with Dissenters in scouting the creeds, and representing the Bible, according to each man's private interpretation, as the rule of faith.

Some of these, e. g. the doctrine of the sacraments and baptismal regeneration, were prominent points of assault in Bishop Hobart's time; and hence his frequent and unequivocal testimony in their favor. Others of them, e. g. the Real Presence, the Sacrifice of the Eucharist, and the Rule of Faith, then attracted less notice. But they all rest on the same ground: that is to say, they are all either plainly expressed, or . . . necessarily implied in the Prayer Book; at least as necessarily implied as Episcopacy. We are not now saying whether the doctrines are right or wrong, but only that they are the doctrines of the Prayer Book, which we believe no unprejudiced man of plain unsophisticated sense will deny. A large portion of the Church proclaim them openly as they stand in the Prayer Book, in the plain grammatical sense of the words; teach them, glory in them; while on the other hand many members of the Church seek to evade or deny them, and unite with Dissenters and infidels to treat them with contempt or ridicule. These are statements of fact, for the truth of which we appeal to every man's observation. Now, adopting Bishop Hobart's principle of explanation, and understanding the terms High and Low to denote different degrees of attachment to the Church and her doctrines as exhibited in the Prayer Book, it is obvious that the former class are properly termed High Churchmen, and the latter Low Churchmen.

The above principles are, in our judgment, identical with Christianity and Churchmanship; and if all others took the same view of the matter, their supporters would need to be designated by no other terms than those of Christians and Churchmen. But as many think otherwise, and as distinctions in fact require to be denoted by names, we, of course, as well as others, must consent to receive some narrower terms than those which are claimed by all adherents to the faith and Church of Christ. What these names shall be is a matter of comparative unimportance; and we can pardon men for calling us Puseyites, Tractarians, Romanizers, Semi-Papists, Anti-Protestants, or what they list, so they do us the justice to ascribe to us the principles which we profess to maintain. Our present object, however, has merely been to defend our use of the terms High and Low Church, against some whose queries have seemed to assume that the terms were either incapable of explanation, or had essentially varied from the meaning which they had in Bishop Hobart's time.—The Churchman.

Those who have met with Professor Agassiz will be especially interested in the following narrative. We do our readers the justice to suppose that all will read this account with pleasure and with profit.

SCIENCE ON THE GLACIERS.

The celebrated Swiss naturalist, Agassiz, has for many years been accustomed to make excursions into the Alpine regions of his native country for the purpose of scientific investigation. Sometimes the tour is "a pilgrimage in which, with one or two companions only, he goes to discover new subjects for meditation and study." At other times he is accompanied by a party of philosophers, both native and foreign, setting out with a specific object in view, each one undertaking a different portion of the subject under inquiry, and thus an exploring expedition is formed, whose united knowledge and perseverance make the journey contribute in no small degree to the interests of science.

Interesting accounts of these expeditions have been preserved in the pages of a periodical published at Geneva, from which we gather various particulars of the journey in the summer of 1841. On this occasion, the grand object was to determine the temperature of glaciers, the effects produced upon them by the fluctuations of the atmosphere, and to note the process by which snow increases their bulk. Besides these questions, many others connected with the animal and vegetable phenomena of icy regions remained to be settled, and their relations traced to similar phenomena in other regions. Numerous philosophical instruments and mechanical tools were prepared before hand; the hospice of the Grimsel was selected as head quarters, from its vicinity to several interesting localities, including the glacier of the Aar, on which the experiments were to be made, and in the month of August the savans started for the scene of action.

At the Grimsel they were fortunate enough to meet with the two best guides in the country; one the brother of Papa Zymbach, superior of the convent, the other a mason noted for his fertile resources in the construction of impromptu cabins for the shelter of benighted travellers. Here the party learned that the glaciers were practicable, and that red snow, one of the objects to which their researches were to be directed, was abundant in many places. They set out for the glacier, situated on the heights between Bernese Oberland and the Valais, at a height of nearly 6,000 feet above the sea level. The icy mass was extremely difficult of access, its steep sloping base being covered by a stratum of large blocks of stone, which slip from under the traveller's feet, and give him half an hour's hard climbing before the pure ice is reached. It is a remarkable fact that a glacier never retains foreign substances within its body; these, consisting chiefly of stones, are extruded from the sides and top of the huge mass. When in the latter position, an enormous block may sometimes be seen on the top of an icy pedestal several feet in height. The explanation given of this singular appearance is, that the stone shelters the ice beneath it from the action of the sun's rays, and is by this cause gradually elevated above the surrounding surface, which melts away in the warm season. Sometimes, however, a single day suffices to dissolve the column of ice, when the stone is left lying on the surface of the glacier.

A place for a temporary dwelling was found under the projecting angle of an enormous block of mica schist; a perpendicular wall was built up to meet this angle, inclosing a space about three feet high, where six persons could lie down. A thick layer of dry grass was spread on the floor, and covered with oil-skin to prevent the rising of damp; above this a second layer of grass formed the beds. Places were found under another portion of the block to serve as kitchen, dining-room and cellar. This rude residence was called "Hotel des Neuchâtelois," which name, together with the distance from one extremity of the glacier was inscribed in large characters on the sides of the rock, as an index for the verification of future observations. Since the preceding year the glacier of the Aar had increased its length by 200 feet.

The duties of each individual were duly prescribed. Agassiz made all the barometric, thermometric, hygrometric, and similar observations; Vogt was to examine the red snow and its organic elements; to Nicolle was assigned the study of the flora of the glacier and surrounding rocks; to Desor the phenomena of the ice, its structure and appearance under different conditions of the atmosphere. To Agassiz, as chief of the expedition, all the observed facts were statelily communicated; his was the task of putting them together as a complete system. The effect of this social organization was to expedite and perfect the various operations.

The party were rarely together except at night and during meals; at four in the morning the guides arrived from their own hut, about half a mile distant. Their first business was to light a fire and prepare breakfast; then the daily conversation began, inquiries issued from the sleeping place as to the weather, the height of the barometer, promise of a fine day, &c. The chocolate was soon ready, when Jacob, approaching the dormitory, said, "Now, gentlemen, you must come out if you wish to take your chocolate while it is hot." The philosophers, some of them unwillingly, then crept from beneath their coverings; it was, however, remarked that the morning wash in the icy cold water of the glacier never failed to put them all into good humour. Provisions were sent to them daily from the Grismel, a precaution rendered necessary by the extreme dryness of the air on the glacier rendering food unpalatable if kept more than a day; such, however, were the appetites of the party that they ate double their usual quantity.

"Isolated as we were," writes M. Desor, "in our little colony in the midst of the sea of ice, and occupied exclusively with our scientific observations, we rarely thought of the ordinary subjects of social life; in fact, the most extraordinary political events interested the most of us but very indirectly and remotely. I remember, when the news reached us of Prince Louis Bonaparte's landing at Boulogne, we could hardly believe that people in their senses would go so far astray. Although our manner of living was nearly the same every day, I do not recollect that we had a single moment of weariness. Even the most monotonous occupations, such as the barometrical and hygrometric observations, possessed a certain interest. The smallest facts were submitted to discussion, and whenever one or the other of us returned from an excursion on the glacier, it was rarely without some new and instructive observation. The microscopes, besides, offered a charm always new in the varied forms of the novel fauna which we were enabled to study on the spot; every day, in fact, passed in good humour and pleasure."

The approach of evening produces a striking effect in Alpine regions. At sunset the explorers retired to rest: the temperature at that time generally falls below zero, the little streams which the sun's warmth sets in motion on the surface of the glacier cease to flow, the noise of cascades insensibly ceases, and a most profound stillness prevails over the whole icy solitude. The animal heat of the party sufficed to keep their little cabin warm, but one night they were awakened by an unusual cold; on looking up, an opening of several inches was seen, where the wall finished against the projecting rock. Daylight was anxiously waited for, and showed them a crevice across the whole mass of the glacier, close to their sleeping place, which had opened during the night, and thus displaced the masonry. From observations based upon this and similar facts the conclusion was come to, that the formation of crevices is due to the unequal tension produced by differences of temperature in the internal and external layers of the icy mass. The glacier, it is said, is never more beautiful than in rainy weather; then the numerous fissures and little cavities which everywhere intersect the surface become filled with water, and give a bluish tint to the huge mass, which has an extremely pleasing effect. Should the rain be followed by a night's frost, all this water congeals in the superficial cracks, and stands up in relief like a network of blue veins, while the surrounding ice resumes its usual white hue, presenting the appearance of veins of azure quartz in calcareous scoria.

One of the objects of the expedition was to ascertain the interior temperature of glaciers; this could only be effected by piercing holes in the ice. The guides were set to work with iron instruments constructed for the purpose; but after several hours' labour they succeeded only in penetrating to a depth of six inches. The tools were the especial contrivance of Agassiz, and his companions with sly humour joked him on the non-complaisance of the glacier. The next day, however, the philosophers were confined to their cabin by fog and rain, where they smoked their pipes and passed the time in microscopic observations on the colouring matter of red snow and some extraordinary insects that inhabit the ice. As soon as the weather cleared up, the boring was resumed, and the glacier, before so refractory, was now easily penetrated, and by the following day two holes, one twenty and the other eight feet deep, were dug side by side. Every evening a thermometer was suspended in each of these cavities, which were closely covered to prevent the admission of external air, and the results showed, when compared with observations made outside, that at a depth of eight or nine feet the temperature of a glacier is constant a little below zero, while the surface is generally at zero. The spot on which the party were assembled was surrounded by an accumulation of snow and ice, covering a surface of eight leagues. "What beautiful pastures these would be," said one of the guides, with a sigh, "were it not for that horrid ice!" Glaciers, however, if of no use to the shepherd, have rendered important services to the meteorologist and geologist, who otherwise would have been at a loss to explain many apparently inexplicable phenomena. Geologists show that the quantity of ice on the surface was at one time much greater than at present. The traces of glaciers have been found in various parts of England, Ireland and Scotland. M. Agassiz considers that their melting is not caused by terrestrial heat, and has proved that their mass, instead of being, as was supposed, exceedingly close and compact, is, on the contrary, full of innumerable veins. On making experiments by infiltration with coloured fluids, they were found to run through a block of ice twenty feet thick in two hours and a half.

Red snow appears to have been first noticed by De Saussure in 1760; he found it lying in hollow patches, generally of a deep red in the centre and pale on the edges, and attributed the colour to the presence of a vegetable pollen. Red snow was afterwards seen by Ross in 1818, during his arctic voyage; a range of cliffs eight miles in length, covered with it, were named the Crimson Cliffs. Some of the snow was preserved and submitted to analysis, which gave a species of fungus, uredo nivalis, as the colouring agent. Since that period the attention of the most distinguished naturalists has been directed to this phenomenon, with a view to determine its real nature. In 1839 it was ascertained that the red matter of snow consisted of living animals, intermingled with algæ. Some of the animals were of a gray colour, but the greater number of a deep crimson; their motion was so swift as scarcely to be followed by the eye. Some were pear shaped, and spun round like a top with incredible velocity; others had two red transparent stomachs, with which a singular apparatus was connected. These little animals frolic and disport themselves in a temperature below the freezing point, exhibiting all the activity of the insects that flit about in the more genial sunshine. A degree of warmth barely sufficient to melt the snow invariably kills them.

As for the other passage alluded to, it is too long for transcription; but the reader will find it in 1 John, v. 6-14. The point to be established in that passage is, "that Jesus is the Son of God." The persons to be convinced, and to receive the benefits of co-sonship and eternal life, are those who read or hear the Gospel. The tribunal is the human mind or judgment. The testimony to us is all contained in the written Word of God, "the record that God gave of His Son;" "for this is the witness of God which He hath testified of His Son." "And it is the Spirit that beareth witness, because the Spirit is truth"—a perfectly truthful witness.

And what is the result? "He that believeth on the Son of God hath the witness in himself." That is, hath—not the testifier, but the testimony, in himself. According to Dr. Bloomfield, "holdeth this testimony with a firm assent, and in his own mind."

After this follows the declaration, "He that hath the Son, hath life; and he that hath not the Son of God hath not life." The apostle had previously said, that "Whatsoever is born of God," and is therefore a son of God, "overcometh the world;" and this is the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith. Who is he that overcometh the world but he that believeth that Jesus is the Son of God? Of course, he who, convinced by the testimony of the Spirit, believes this, hath the Son; and "he that hath the Son hath life." Now, the existence of faith in ourselves is, in the first instance, known by the evidence of our own consciousness, concurring with the testimony of the Spirit as to the truths of the Gospel. Afterwards, the proof is rendered more clear, and the assurance of sonship stronger, by the testimony of the Spirit, in the written Word, respecting the virtues, graces, principles, affections; of the Christian, concurring with the evidence of our own consciousness that we really feel corresponding things within us. In due time the case is rendered still more clear, and the assurance is strengthened, by the Spirit's testimony as to what constitutes "a godly, righteous, and sober life," in conjunction with our own consciousness that "the life which we now live in the flesh, we live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved us, and gave himself for us;" and that so far as it conforms to the precepts and examples of Scripture, it is sincere, and springs from this source.

Immediately following the last quotation from St. John, follows a passage which, if rightly understood, seems to me sufficient of itself to decide the point.—"These things have I written unto you that believe on the name of the Son of God, that ye may know that ye have eternal life, and that ye may believe [more firmly and steadfastly] on the name of the Son of God." Of course, this assurance will be conceded to be tantamount to an assurance of being a son of God.

Thus it appears that the knowledge in question is to be derived, so far as the Spirit is concerned in the testimony, from something that is "written;" and that St. John wrote certain things for the express purpose of rendering this knowledge attainable. The Spirit itself, having by His gracious influence upon our souls, furnished our consciousness with the testimony which it bears in this case, brings before the tribunal of our mind the Scriptures adapted to this purpose, and thus bears witness with our spirit that we are the sons of God.

The "spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba, Father," is the filial spirit awakened in our souls by the Holy Ghost. It is the fruit of the Spirit of God's Son, who is formed within us, the hope of glory. It is not the witness of the Holy Ghost, but part of the testimony of our own spirit, and a matter of consciousness.

Let it not be thought that this is a cold and chilling view of the subject; for, while it gives no countenance to the delusions of the enthusiast or the fanatic, it recognizes the highest degrees, and the greatest variety, of Divine influence, both direct and indirect, for which any sound theologian will contend. But making none of the effects thus produced the witness of the Spirit, except as he is concerned in producing them within us, and thus enabling "our spirit" to give its testimony, it precludes delusion by bringing all to the ordeal of the written Word of God. If this clear and authenticated testimony of the Spirit concurs with the testimony of our own spirit, then indeed we are sons of God.

The notion of a direct and immediate testimony of the Holy Ghost, that we are sons of God, is not only fraught with great danger, but attended with insuperable philosophical difficulties. "O," indeed, perceiving the difficulties, while he contends in words for this sort of testimony, mentions as the testimony itself, things which, from the nature of the case, cannot be regarded as direct, or immediate testimony to the fact to be proved. "Softer breathings of the Spirit than inspiration proper"—"a superaddition, from the Sanctifier, to the general felicity of virtue, and the general consolation of piety,"—"a calm, confirming assurance of actual acceptance." The "softer breathings," as the writer disavows inspiration, must be the same as their subsequent exponents, or the previous "imprecatory conviction of faith."

But a direct and immediate testimony must be given, either in the unequivocal words known to come from the Spirit, "Thou art a son of God," or words equally direct and of equivalent import; or it must be given by such direct, supernatural, and unequivocal impression, or physical revelation, to this effect, that it can be known to a certainty to come from the Holy Ghost. In neither case could any doubt whatever remain as to the fact of filiation. The end aimed at by the miraculous interposition would certainly be accomplished. All thus visited and favored would have a full assurance. Any others who entertained the comfortable persuasion, would do it despite the absence of an essential witness.

But none, except fanatics, or enthusiasts, contend for the former testimony—a direct revelation of the fact in words, or even in unequivocal and significant signs.

As for the other sort of direct testimony—such physical contact and impression of the Divine Spirit upon our souls, or such supernatural and unequivocal impulse, or creation of consciousness of sonship, as to leave no doubt of its origin or aim,—the whole is a gratuitous assumption, for—

1. Nothing of this kind is promised. The utmost that is promised is the testimony of the Holy Ghost; but this would not be testimony at all. It would not even be so near it as a simple revelation of the fact of filiation. It would not even admit concurring and confirmatory testimony.

2. Wherever the Holy Scriptures speak of the way in which we come to the knowledge of filiation, it is not said to be in this way, but by inference from evidence. "We know that we have passed from death unto life, because we love the brethren." But even this evidence itself must be tested by something more palpable, and less liable to be mistaken;—"By this we know that we love the brethren,—if we love God, and keep his commandments." St. John wrote certain things "that we might know that we have eternal life." The existence of the "spirit of adoption" within us—the filial spirit, teaching us in our hearts to cry "Abba, Father," is mentioned as the evidence, in part, of our own spirit, that we are sons of God. There is nothing in any other part of the Bible which directs us to any such evidence of sonship, as that supposed. If there were any such evidence, it would of itself be all-sufficient.

3. But, thirdly, we could not be cognizant of any such supernatural and extraordinary operations upon, or within, our secret souls, except by our own consciousness, and this, as we have elsewhere seen, would preclude the possibility of a double and distinct witness, one by our own spirit, and the other by the Holy Spirit. For if a difference of channel, or direct testifier, were not indispensable to direct testimony, there cannot be imagined to be any such difference in the degrees of consciousness, or the manner of consciousness, as to enable us to ascribe one consciousness to the agency of the Holy Spirit, and another to our own spirit; and the object is the same. But without this we could not recognize two witnesses.

4. Moreover, on this supposition the testimony of the Spirit itself would be simply to our spirit directly, and not a testimony concurrent with that of our spirit, and given in before the bar of our own mind, understanding, or judgment.

To make the witness of the Spirit to consist in an increased intensity in those things which constitute the items of our own spirit's testimony, or in the superaddition of some pleasurable emotions, or delicious ecstasy, connected with them, would be equally exceptionable; for who could so distinguish between the original state of the feeling, or whatever else it might be, and the supernatural addition, so as to have the testimony of two witnesses upon which to rely? Here fanaticism and delusion would run riot.

Now, can any one imagine any other way in which the Holy Spirit can give direct or immediate testimony to the fact in question? It appears, in point of fact, that they who contend for this kind of testimony, have no very definite or intelligible conception on the subject, it amounts only to a vague and intangible notion; so that when an attempt is made to define it, it either vanishes away, or turns out to be something else than direct testimony, or something which is not testimony at all, and admits no corroboration.

We are sorry to apologize again for the absence of the Editor, and the more so for the cause. Severe sickness, from which he is now happily recovering, still detains him in New York; and we fear that the readers of the Banner will have to bear with an inferior substitute for one or two numbers more. Due notice will be given of the resumption of his duties. C.

HIGH AND LOW CHURCHMANSHIP.

The article on this subject in our present number was cut from the editorial columns of The Churchman some four years ago, and will be found worthy of attention at the present time. It will prove particularly interesting, and, we hope, useful, to those among our "Low Church" brethren who "call themselves 'Bishop Hobart men,' and say that there would be little division in the Church if all were content with Bishop Hobart's views." Indeed, it is only about six years since a distinguished "leader" of that party in this country, and who was recently their favourite candidate for the Episcopate of this diocese, said to us, "I should be perfectly satisfied if we could all settle down on Bishop Hobart's Churchmanship." We were much and agreeably surprised at the remark, and have several times since heard it repeated, in substance, by others of that school. Now we venture to say that there is not one amongst those called "High Churchmen" who holds, or desires to see advanced, any higher views of the distinctive doctrines and usages of the Church, than those which were asserted and vindicated by Bishop Hobart. Why, then, are we not all agreed? It must be because many who of late style themselves "Bishop Hobart men," are not really acquainted with the true principles of that venerated prelate. Having before us the Bishop's tract on the subject, alluded to by The Churchman, we have thought that it would be well to accompany our contemporary's article with a few extracts from it. It is entitled, The High Churchman Vindicated, and was his fourth Charge to his Clergy, delivered at the opening of the Convention of the diocese of New York, October 17, 1826.

Dr. Coleman

The term CHURCHMAN . . . and especially the term HIGH CHURCHMAN, denoting an eminent degree of attachment to the essential characteristics of the Church, and zeal for their advancement—appellations dignified and honourable in their correct acceptance—sometimes expose him to whom they are applied to charges as unjust in their nature as they are injurious in their operation. Into the causes of these charges it is not my intention to inquire. But it is due to the interests of that divinely constituted society, the characteristics of which High Churchmen profess to maintain, to expose the fallacy and injustice of these charges.

It is said that High Churchmen are bigoted. In this case, as in many others, the term is certainly used without understanding its real import. Bigotry cannot consist merely in maintaining exclusive opinions; for then, in every department of science, natural, moral, and religious, he is a bigot who advocates correct theories in opposition to those he deems erroneous; and the encomium of liberality is merited by him who thinks all opinions are alike. Bigotry respects not tenets in themselves, but the spirit in which they are held, and the manner and the means by which they are avowed and advanced. . . . The Low Churchman, who depreciates the distinguishing characteristics of the Church, or is lukewarm or indifferent in advancing them; as well as the High Churchman, who exalts their importance, and is zealous in enforcing and defending them; may subject themselves to the imputation of bigotry, by the spirit, the manner, or the means by which they maintain their respective views. . . . Is the charge of bigotry against the High Churchman founded on the fact, that in his efforts for propagating Christianity, and of extending the kingdom of Jesus Christ, he devotes himself to the extension of his own Church exclusively? And if a correct spirit, manner, and means are cherished and employed by him, the imputation is unfair and unjust. He regards the Church which the Redeemer and His apostles founded, as subsisting under certain distinctive and essential principles of doctrine, ministry, sacraments, and worship. He regards his own Church, (every duly constituted Protestant Episcopal Church,) as possessing these essentials. In advancing, then, his own Church, he propagates, in his view, the Gospel as Christ and His Apostles proclaimed it—he extends the kingdom and Church of Christ as they established and extended it. In what other way is it to be expected that he should propagate the Gospel, or extend the Church of Christ? He may highly respect the varying or opposing denominations of his fellow Christians, and respect individually their character and motives; honour their piety and zeal; cherish esteem for their virtues, and the utmost affection for their persons; and seek to be first among the foremost in the reciprocity of all the endearing charities of social and domestic life. But he remembers that his Redeemer declared, "he who loveth father, or mother, or wife, or children, or brother, or sister, more than Me, is not worthy of Me." Hence the principle of supreme love to his Redeemer leads him to love supremely the Church in that form of doctrine, ministry, sacraments, and worship, under which he believes it was constituted by this its divine Head. * * * *

But again: the High Churchman is accused of formalism. Undoubtedly the advocate for any set of religious opinions may rest in speculation merely—may not bring them to act with exciting power upon the heart and the life. But assuredly there is no deadening influence in what are called High Church principles which prevents him who professes them from the most fervent and active exercise of the religious affections. He loves supremely the Church. Because it is the varying creature of human polity, the supple instrument of human ambition? No; but because she is "the spouse and body of the Redeemer," for "which He gave Himself," for which He constantly "intercedes," which He enriches and sanctifies with His spiritual gifts, for which He is preparing the triumphs of everlasting glory. These views of the relation which the Church bears to her divine Lord, when sincerely entertained and cherished, must excite and engage the warmest feelings of gratitude and devotion to that blessed Personage who thus distinguishes her. . . . Look at the long series of illustrious clergymen and laymen who have been foremost in advocating those principles which, in reference to the Church, distinguish those who are denominated High Churchmen. Select from them the venerated names of Andrews, of Ken, of Stanhope, of Horne, of Jones, among the clergy; of Nelson, of Morgan, of Waldo, among the laity. Listen to those strains which these primitive men poured forth, and which still cheer and warm the devout and pious soul, lifting its most fervid affections to heaven; and withdraw the imputation of the necessary connection between High Church opinions and formalism. The charge generally arises from the ardour, zeal, and vigilance with which the High Churchman guards the prescribed worship of the Church, condemns every departure from it, and resists every practice that may lower it in the estimation of the people, and gradually lead to its disuse. . . . If, whatever may be the professions of respectful attachment to the Liturgy, which is prescribed on account of its scriptural and primitive sanctions, as well as its numerous advantages in opposition to extempore prayer, this latter mode be sometimes used on occasions of public social worship; if it be used especially on those occasions of the more select assemblages, where the object is to excite, to cherish, and to indulge more than ordinary religious sensibility, and where it is thought a more than ordinary degree of religious improvement and pious joy has been experienced; may not the High Churchman, who is zealous for this Liturgy, be excused if he opposes this inconsistent attempt to unite opposite modes of devotion? May he not be excused, if, judging from what we know of human nature—judging from the recorded page of history, he deprecates this attempt as calculated ultimately to bring into disrepute and disuse that ritual which, though best fitted permanently and beneficially to satisfy and interest the understanding and the affections, is certainly not so well calculated as the extempore mode to rouse the animal sensibilities? But let every Churchman seriously reflect how far in his own case this charge of formalism may be well founded; and let him, in humble dependence on the quickening grace of God's Spirit, seek to engage with sincerity and devotedness in the use of the Liturgy; and its holy and pious sentiments impressed upon his heart, and influencing his tempers and his conduct, there will be full evidence that he is controlled by the life and power of godliness.

Another charge against High Churchmen is, that they are not evangelical. Let us ascertain the meaning of this much used, and, I must say, much abused term. . . . It is claimed by, or it is applied to, those in our own Church, who, while they profess more than usual fidelity in preaching what they consider the distinguishing doctrines of the Gospel, insist little on the distinctive principles of the Church, especially in reference to the ministry; and are less tenacious than others of her liturgical services, and in the irregular use of them. . . . It would be difficult to prove the correctness of the claim of those to be "evangelists," preachers of good tidings, who confine the redemption of the Gospel to only a portion of the fallen race who need it. In this application of the term, however, the charge of not being evangelical is not correct as it respects some High Churchmen in former days. For undoubtedly, at one period of the English Church, many of those divines who most ably asserted the high pretensions of Episcopacy, were what are styled doctrinal Calvinists—holding the peculiar tenets of Calvinism, but not much insisting on them. . . . In the application of the term evangelical to those who, professing extraordinary fidelity in asserting the distinguishing doctrines of the Gospel, insist little on the distinctive principles of the Church, and depart from her established ritual, most certainly, High Churchmen disclaim it. The Church they consider as a society divinely constituted—its ministry divinely commissioned by God's providence and Holy Spirit, in those three orders that distinguish it as Episcopal. Union with this Church, as the mystical body of Christ, by its ministrations and ordinances, they regard as the divinely prescribed mode of union with its divine Head, assuring to the faithful all the blessings of redemption and grace, which Christ purchased for His mystical body. The liturgical mode of worship appears to them sanctioned by Scripture, by primitive usage, by its decided utility, as securing sound doctrine, and a correct, impressive, dignified, enlightened, and fervent devotion. . . . The laws of the Church and their own solemn promises bind it upon their conscience. There appears to them but one course of duty and expediency—a scrupulous and sacred adherence to it. And they earnestly deprecate a departure from it, by omissions of its parts, and by the introduction of extempore devotions, not merely as forbidden by the most solemn considerations of duty, and as inconsistent with a sincere attachment to it, but as inevitably resulting in depreciating its importance in the estimation of the people, and thus preparing them for its total disuse. They consider the term evangelical as greatly misapplied to those who lay but little stress on the regular ministrations and ordinances of that mystical body of Christ, which convey to believers the benefits of His cross and passion; or who, moulding that Liturgy which correctly and powerfully proclaims the great doctrines of the Gospel to their own views, or disfiguring it by their own prayers, are weakening its hold upon public esteem, affection, and confidence.

In the correct sense of the term, High Churchmen disclaim the imputation of not being evangelical. It is only when faithless to their principles that they are not pre-eminently so. Are they distinguished by their zeal for the Church in the ministrations and ordinances annexed to it by Christ and His apostles? But it is the only object of these ministrations and ordinances, to excite and to cherish a lively and holy faith in the atoning merits of the Son of God, who gave Himself for this Church; and to convey to the soul the quickening and sanctifying influences of the divine Spirit which animates this mystical body of the Redeemer; and thus to assure to the faithful that they are "heirs, through hope, of God's heavenly kingdom." Pardon, justification, eternal life, as the free gift of God the Father, through the merits and intercession of His eternal Son, and through the renovating and sanctifying agency of the Holy Ghost—these are the great evangelical truths which alone render of value or of efficacy, the ministrations and ordinances for which the High Churchman contends—and which so deeply pervade that Liturgy which he cherishes with a sacred affection, only inferior to that with which he regards the inspired volume. These, then, are the truths which, faithful to his principles, he must most ardently cherish, most strenuously and zealously inculcate. Evangelical, the High Churchman must be; or, in contending for the Church and Liturgy, he will prove, either that he understands not their nature, their excellencies, their divine and spiritual objects; or that the deep guilt of inconsistency with the most sacred principles, and of an indifference in the most important of all interests, the salvation of the soul, rests upon his conscience. * * *

Is High Churchmen, then, brethren of the Clergy, an appellation of which we should be ashamed? No! Let it be our boast. Unpopular it can be, only as it is misunderstood. The principles which it covers are those of the first and purest ages of Christianity, of the age of apostles, of martyrs and of confessors. The time will come, when those who have professed it through good report and through evil report, will be held in grateful honour. For the errors and heresies that deform the fair face of Christianity, can be corrected, under God, only by the principles and the policy of High Churchmen. At that period when the discordant sects that now divide and distract the Christian family, profess with "one heart the faith once delivered to the saints," and with "one mouth glorify God," the principles professed, the feelings cherished, the language uttered, will be the principles, the feelings, and the language of High Churchmen. * * *

I have deemed it my duty to call your most serious attention to the topics which I have now laid before you. Much and solicitous observation has satisfied me that correct as our own Diocese as yet is generally in all these particulars, our Church is in no small danger from practices that assail the integrity and impair the efficacy of her Liturgy; from the generally increasing spread of indifference to her distinctive principles; and from the extensive operation of measures that are calculated to render those principles odious, to keep them out of view, or to bear them down. It is the duty of Christians to receive from one another, and from their Pastors, the word of exhortation. It is the duty of Christian Ministers, as occasion offers, to admonish one another. And certainly it is the higher duty of the Christian Bishop to exhort and admonish those of whom God has given him the oversight.

What effect the course of remarks which I have submitted to you may have on my general popularity, is a question which ought to have but comparatively little weight with me. I avowed and advocated these principles at a period when popularity comes decked to the youthful bosom in her most attractive charms; and pursued through the succeeding stages of my ministerial and episcopal course, I ought not, cherishing an increased idea of their truth and importance, and of the danger to which they are exposed, to shrink from enforcing them at a period when some serious monitions of my uncertain hold on life, and when much longer experience of the world have brought with greater force on the mind, the truth of the declaration, "vanity of vanities, all is vanity," stamped upon all objects and all motives not sanctioned by the grace and hopes of the Gospel of Christ. Next to that support which is always inspired by the consciousness of integrity, I have been fortified and cheered by the general confidence, as I have thought, of my Diocese; and by the humble hope that the cause of God and His Church has not suffered in my hands.

May this humble hope cheer and fortify us all, my brethren; and God of His mercy grant that when removed from the errors, the toils, and the conflicts which assail us in His Church militant on earth, we may, at the consummation of all things, enter into rest; and in His Church triumphant unite in ceaseless praises to Him, the Lord our God, our Saviour and Redeemer!

DIOCESE OF INDIANA.—Since our notice last week of the election of the Rev. Dr. Upfold, of this diocese, to the Episcopate of Indiana, we have been favoured with a letter from a distinguished source, dated Terre Haute, July 4; of which the following is an extract:—

"I trust most earnestly that Dr. U. will accept the highly arduous, but yet very interesting office. The nomination was canonically made by the Clergy, after consulting together for about an hour; and was unanimously confirmed by the Laity in the course of five minutes. Every member of the Convention signed the testimony in his favour. We are anxious to have him consecrated, if possible, at Madison, in Indiana, during October. It will be a pleasant trip for many of his friends."

* We have italicized this sentence, as prophetic, in the case of Bishop Hobart himself. Where is the man so aspersed in his day, whom all, both within and without the Church, now more unite to honour?

Dr. Coleman and Ravenscroft

MEETING OF THE BOARD OF TRUSTEES OF THE GENERAL THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.

Since our last week's notice of the annual meeting of this body, we have become indebted to The Churchman for the following additional particulars.

On the second day of the session, the Rev. Dr. Anthon rose to bring a matter of great importance before the Board, and professed to be actuated solely by his deep interest in the welfare of the institution. "He then presented a lengthy preamble and resolution, which seemed to take for granted, that the duties of the Professorship of the Nature, Polity, and Ministry of the Church were left unprovided for. No one else made any observations. The Chairman put the question. Two or three faint ayes were heard, then came a general vote in the negative, and the resolution was declared lost."

Three gentlemen, members of the present senior class, applied for permission to continue their studies for another year at the Seminary, with the customary privileges of students; which was granted on condition of strict conformity to the Statutes, except so far as relates to the attendance on recitations by the classes.

The report of the Dean of the Faculty, (Rev. Dr. Ogilby,) very emphatically declared the sound state of the Seminary for the past year, and the general fidelity and dutifulness of the students; and it was received with all but universal satisfaction.

The most important report was that by the Rev. Dr. Jarvis, chairman of the Committee on the Final Examination of the Students; which, coming from a source so eminent for learning, wisdom, and accurate scholarship, met with the most respectful attention from the Board, and produced, in general, sentiments of the liveliest pleasure. We alluded in our last to the strange remarks and resolution offered by the Rev. Arthur C. Coxe, declaring that the Committee had transcended their powers, and proposing that all expressions commendatory of the fidelity and soundness of the students, as disclosed by the examinations, be stricken out. Our contemporary says, "the Rev. chairman, with much courtesy, defended his report, and was ably supported by Rev. Dr. Mead of Connecticut. Mr. Wharton, of Pa., suggested that the mover should define in his resolution wherein an academical examination differed from the examination mentioned in the report; and the Rev. Mr. Ogilby offered some very judicious observations on the subject. Bishop Whittingham, in order, as he said, to cut short a debate which might become intricate, and yet to indicate disapprobation of an uncalled for censure upon a committee that had properly and ably discharged its duty, moved to lay the resolution on the table, which passed, we believe, with hardly a dissenting voice."

The following is a copy of Dr. Jarvis' very able and gratifying report:—

The Committee on the final examination of the students, in presenting their report, regret to state that on Monday the 25th of June, when the examinations were begun, three only of their number, the Rev. Mr. Henderson, the Rev. Dr. Schroeder, and the Chairman, were in attendance. On their assembling after Divine service, they agreed to request the professors to conduct all the examinations with reference, as far as practicable, to any supposed tendencies among the students to Romish errors; a request to which all promptly acceded. They were obliged, of course, to divide their own attention. The Chairman of the Committee was requested to continue throughout with the Senior or graduating class, while the other two members attended severally the Middle and the Junior classes. The latter have read in Hebrew the first two chapters of Genesis, eleven Psalms including the principal prophecies respecting the Messiah, and nearly sixteen chapters, selected in like manner, of the Evangelical prophet Isaiah. In all these portions the examination was generally satisfactory. In Greek the same class have studied exegetically the four Gospels, and about half of the Acts of the Apostles, and their examination thereon was also satisfactory. By the professor of Pastoral Theology, they were examined on the principles and modes of the composition and delivery of sermons. They have studied Gresley's work on preaching, and attended a more enlarged course of lectures on the same subject. On the same day the Middle class were examined on the Epistles of St. Paul to the Ephesians, Philipians and Hebrews, and they afforded satisfactory evidence that as a class, they had creditably availed themselves of their Professor's able instructions.

The senior class, twenty-four in number, were present, with two exceptions occasioned by illness. Several of those present had been ill and would have been excused on that account, if they had not earnestly requested to be examined. The first half on the printed catalogue were examined for nearly three hours by the Professor of Systematic Theology, on the rational evidences of the Being and Attributes of God, and on the Scriptural evidences of the Trinity in Unity, the Incarnation, and the Personality of the Holy Ghost. The Articles of the Church were then taken up from the eighteenth to the twenty-first inclusive, and the answers, which of course included many of the points at issue, between the reformed branches of the Church and those who profess the corruptions of later ages, were in general clear and satisfactory.

The whole class were then examined by the Professor of Ecclesiastical History, on the period in the affairs of Western Europe from the death of Gregory VII., to the end of the Council of Trent; and secondly, on the Constitutional history of England from the Reign of William the Conqueror, contemporary with Gregory VII., to the Reign of Queen Elizabeth. The Chairman was requested to name the students, which he did in the same manner as if they had been selected by lot. Neither the Professor nor the student knew in what order each was to be called, while the examination was conducted strictly in the order of time. A more thorough and searching examination was continued for three hours than has commonly been given. The causes and consequences of the struggle between the pontifical and regal authorities, the rise and decline of the papacy, the motives and the errors of their respective movements, and the counteracting influence of Divine Providence in overruling the affairs of the Church and the world, were clearly exhibited in a way equally creditable to the ability of the Professor and the industry and accuracy of the students.

On Tuesday the number of the Committee was increased by the presence of the Rev. Dr. Sherwood, who was requested to divide his time with the other members, as he and they might judge expedient. The Professor of Biblical Literature and Interpretation, continued his examination of the Junior class, and the Professor of Ecclesiastical History also examined them on the Epistles of the Apostolic Fathers, Christian Antiquities, and the History of Eusebius during the Ante-Nicene period. On all these particulars the Committee were well satisfied.

The middle class were examined in Hebrew by the Professor in that department. Since the intermediate examination they have read from the 53d to the 56th chapters inclusive of Isaiah, the 23d chap. of Jeremiah from v. 8th, the 31st from v. 31, and the 33d at v. 10; the first three chapters of Hosea, and the first three of Joel. Your committee are of opinion that they read and translated Hebrew with a readiness not to be expected from their limited attendance on the Professor, which has been but once a week during the year. The second half of the Senior class were examined by the Professor of Systematic Theology, in like manner as the first were yesterday; at first, on the evidences of our Lord's resurrection, and the objections of unbelievers to the doctrine of the Atonement. The Articles were then resumed from the 22d, and a very searching examination was made on that and the 25th, which occupied nearly three hours. The students answered promptly and satisfactorily on all the points in controversy with the Church of Rome. There was not time to go farther; but the Committee were satisfied that no just imputations could be sustained of any unsoundness in the faith. They were then occupied for more than two hours, one half of the class at a time, by the Professor of Pastoral Theology. The Chairman was now assisted by two other members of the Committee. The students were called as yesterday, neither the Professor nor the students knowing who would be required to answer. The Committee were much aided by a printed syllabus of subjects of examination. The Liturgy in the order there exhibited was commented upon by the first half of the class, down to the subject of persons officiating. The last half were then examined upon Pastoral Theology. The examination was of necessity superficial. The Committee were exhausted by an unremitted attendance of six hours, but the syllabus enabled them to see how much and how profitably the examination might have been enlarged. The Professor of Pastoral Theology reported to the Committee that the provision of the Statutes with regard to the composition of sermons had been very generally complied with by the students; the few exceptions being occasioned by ill health.

On Wednesday, the 27th, two classes only were examined, the middle and the senior; the former by the Professor of Pastoral Theology on the Liturgy, the Ministry, Vestments, the Daily Morning and Evening Prayer, and the Litany; the latter by the Professor of Hebrew on the Book of Job. Eight of the middle class and five of the senior were absent. The examination of the middle class was well sustained; that of the senior class has increased the regret expressed with regard to the other two, that Hebrew is not more attended to. The Committee also regret that the small number present, renders their report less satisfactory than if all had been in attendance.

All which is respectfully submitted.

Signed,

The Van Buren (Ark.) Intelligencer mentions that Bishop Freeman has preferred charges against Gen. Belknap, the commanding officer at Fort Gibson. What Gen. B. has been doing, does not appear. There is an absurd story, to the effect, that his offence is that of refusing to allow the Chaplain to preach over an hour. For ourselves, we think the General might be pardoned if he had ordered the drums to beat at the expiration of half an hour.

The English Churchman states that the Bishops of the five British North American dioceses purpose to meet at Halifax on Ascension-day next. This will be the first Episcopal Synod in the Colonial Church; and perhaps something in the shape of general rules or Canons for the government of the Church in their several dioceses may be agreed upon.

It is stated that Lieut. Lynch intends to appropriate a large portion of the proceeds of his most interesting work on the Dead Sea, to the orphans of Lieut. Dale, his first officer, who died while engaged in the expedition. Such a noble act of liberality is only in keeping with the entire character of the accomplished and pious author.

CLERICAL CHANGES.—The Rev. O. Harriman, Jun., has resigned the Rectorship of St. George's church, Hempstead, Long Island, N. Y.

The Rev. Chas. E. Bennett, deacon, has removed from the diocese of Rhode Island, and become assistant to the Rector of Calvary church, Stonington, Conn.

The Rev. J. Radcliff Davenport has become Rector of Grace church, Albany, N. Y.

A DAY OF PRAYER.

We invite attention to the following Official Proclamation. Its suggestions are every way proper, and will, we doubt not, be universally responded to, as becomes the character of a Christian nation. It was the custom of the devout patriots of '76, to whom our happy country owes so deep a debt of gratitude, to recognize the Divine government on all fit occasions—alike in seasons of joy and affliction. During the eight years of the Revolution, Congress proclaimed eight public Fasts and eight days for Thanksgiving. Mr. Madison proclaimed a Fast in August, 1812, on account of the war, by direction of Congress; and Mr. Tyler one in 1840, in consequence of the death of Gen. Harrison, at the instance of the Cabinet.

OFFICIAL.

By the President of the United States.

A RECOMMENDATION.

At a season when the PROVIDENCE of God has manifested itself in the visitation of a fearful pestilence, which is spreading its ravages throughout the land, it is fitting that a people whose reliance has ever been on His protection, should humble themselves before His throne, and, while acknowledging past transgressions, ask a continuance of Divine mercy.

It is, therefore, earnestly recommended that the first Friday in August be observed throughout the United States as a day of Fasting, Humiliation and Prayer. All business will be suspended in the various branches of the public service on that day; and it is recommended to persons of all religious denominations to abstain, as far as practicable, from secular occupations, and to assemble in their respective places of public worship, to acknowledge the INFINITE GOODNESS which has watched over our existence as a nation, and so long crowned us with manifold blessings; and to implore the ALMIGHTY, in His own good time, to stay the destroying hand which is now lifted up against us.

Washington, July 3, 1849.

ROMANIZING.

The New York Recorder says, "The Independent, in an article on Dr. Bushnell and his position, calls out another distinguished Congregational clergyman, whose tendencies towards Rome have long been talked about, and thinks it would be a good thing for that man to define his position. That gentleman is the President of a New England college."

The Right Rev. John Tyler, a Roman Catholic Bishop, died at Providence, R. I., on the 18th ult. It is said that he was "a nephew of Virgil Barber, a pervert of by-gone years, and was under his instruction in early life."

Bishop Hughes has called on his diocese to renew, in behalf of the Pope, the old contribution of Peter-pence. For the information of some of our young readers, we may state that this was an annual tribute of one penny, paid at Rome out of every family at the feast of St. Peter. When the Saxon king, Ina, went in pilgrimage to Rome, about the year 740, he gave this to the pope, as alms; and it continued to be paid generally until the time of King Henry VIII., when it was enacted, that henceforth no persons should pay any pensions, Peter-pence, or other impositions, to the use of the bishop and see of Rome.

We are pained to find the following notice in The Calendar of last week. The editors state that it was placed in their hands by clergymen and laymen of high standing and character in the diocese of Connecticut, who regard its publication as necessary to the ends of justice, and who hold themselves responsible for its truth. The individual alluded to was formerly editor of the Evergreen, and a candidate for Holy Orders.

MR. JOSEPH SALKELD.—It is now known from his own confession, that this individual intends to profess publicly, (if he has not already been secretly baptized,) his adherence to the ranks of the Romish communion. It is due to the Church, in whose service he has hitherto been somewhat prominent, to say that his late apostacy is evidently an after-thought. His most singular baseness of conduct, of long continuance, though but recently exposed, has already excluded him from the pale of respectable society. A full statement of facts will, if necessary, be laid before the public.

July 2d, 1849.

THE PRAYER BOOK.—In a notice of an elegant edition of the Book of Common Prayer, recently published by Messrs. Stanford & Swords, New York, the editors of the Charleston Gospel Messenger say that they asked one of their booksellers the other day, "What becomes of all the editions of the Prayer Book which are continually published?" "Do you know," he replied, "notwithstanding the numerous new editions, I can never keep my assortment complete. The Prayer Book is bought not only by Episcopalians, but by Christians of all denominations." We of course rejoice to hear this; for we are sure the more they become acquainted with our pure, primitive and scriptural Liturgy, the more desirous will they be to seek shelter in that fold, which is guided by its holy teaching.

The annual meeting of the House of Convocation of Trinity College, Hartford, will be held on Wednesday, August 1st. An Address will be delivered by the Right Rev. J. P. K. Henshaw, D. D., Bishop of Rhode Island; and a Poem, by the Rev. Ralph Hoyt, of New York.

 Reconciled to the Church, and to death.*

GIRARD COLLEGE.—We are happy to announce that the vacancy in the Presidency of this Institution, created by the resignation of the Hon. Judge Jones, has been filled by the election of Fred. A. Packard, Esq., long well known as the prominent and efficient head of the American Sunday School Union. We congratulate the public on the admirable choice which the Directors have thus made. Mr. P. is no less distinguished for piety than for fine literary attainments, practical good sense, and great amenity of manners; and is eminently suited to conduct the education of youth.

We are gratified to observe that the proceedings of the late Pennsylvania Convention in relation to the Right Rev. Henry U. Onderdonk, D. D., are noticed by the English Church journals with evident satisfaction.

ORDINATIONS.—On Trinity Sunday, 3d ult., in St. Stephen's Chapel, Charleston, S. C., Bishop Gadsden admitted Mr. Benjamin F. Taylor to the holy order of Deacons; and the Rev. Wm. B. W. Howe, deacon, to that of Priests.

On Tuesday, 3d inst., in Trinity Church, Geneva, the following gentlemen, candidates for Orders in the diocese of Western New York, were admitted to the holy order of Deacons by Bishop De Lancey; viz.: Messrs. Edmund Roberts, Caleb B. Elsworth, George H. McKnight, Malcolm Douglas, and Wm. Allen Fiske.

ORDINATION.—In St. James's Church, Philadelphia, on Thursday, July 5th, 1849, the Rt. Rev. the Bishop of the diocese admitted to the holy order of deacons, Mr. Samuel Cox, Jr., A. M. an alumnus of the General Theological Seminary. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Henry Eglinton Montgomery, A. M. The candidate was presented by the Rev. Henry J. Morton, D. D., Rector of St. James's.

ANSWER OF A COMMITTEE FROM THE CONGREGATION OF ST. GEORGE'S CHURCH, BEEKMAN ST., &c.

This is one of several pamphlets which have appeared of late, in relation to certain matters at issue between two different portions of the corporation of "St. George's Church in the city of New York." It is a reply to a statement made by a committee from the Vestry of that Church to the Vestry of Trinity Church, in reference to certain restrictions upon the corporate property of St. George's; growing out of a wish on the part of some to sell old St. George's to meet the heavy debt incurred by the erection of the magnificent new edifice in Stuyvesant Square. The name of the late Rev. Dr. Milnor having to some extent been connected with the latter enterprise, his son, Dr. Wm. H. Milnor, addressed a letter to the committee of the congregation, of which the following is an extract:—

"The attempt which, for some time past, has been so sedulously made, both by ingenious calculations and bold assertions, to fasten upon my father, the origin of the lamentable errors of the Vestry of St. George's Church, has been exceedingly offensive to his family, as being wholly at variance with the general tenor of his character, derogatory to his prudence and judgment, and opposed to facts. It is painful to us to be at issue, on any points, with those whom he considered his best and warmest friends, but who since his decease, have most strangely misconceived his character and views. A paramount duty, however, rests upon the living, to shield the memory of the dead from injurious imputations. Such an imputation, we think, has been cast upon his name, by the manner in which it has been connected, with the late movements in St. George's. We have not forgotten the lovely simplicity of character—the total disregard of self—the exclusive devotedness to the cause of Christ, for which he was pre-eminent; and the remembrance presses upon us still more strongly, the duty which we now fulfil."

THE CHURCH REVIEW, and Ecclesiastical Register.—Vol. II. No. 2, July, 1849.

This able quarterly continues to be distinguished by sound Churchmanship, and a high standard of literary and theological merit. The contents of the present number are—Milton's Prose and Poetical Works—Prof. Stuart on the Wine Question—Translation of the Syriac Ignatian Epistles—Miss Strickland's Queens of England—Noel's Church and State—Morell's Philosophy of Religion—Layard's Remains of Nineveh—The New Hegira—Book Notices—and Literary Intelligence. The Ecclesiastical Register contains the usual summary of Home and Foreign Intelligence.

THE CHURCH VINDICATED against the assault of W. T. Hamilton, D. D., &c.; by the Rev. Richard Johnson, Rector of Zion Church, Talbotton, Georgia.

Dr. Hamilton is a Presbyterian parson, and in his own neighborhood is considered as one of the brightest luminaries of that "order." It seems that he is Pastor of the "Government Street Church, Mobile;" and in a sermon, since published, "by request," thought fit to attack the Church, from the text, "ye are too superstitious." (Acts xvii. 22.) The able review of it by Mr. Johnson shows that he is but a pigmy in the hands of a giant.

RELATIONS OF THE PAST, TO THE PRESENT: a Discourse delivered before the Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company, on their 211th Anniversary.—By the Rev. Thos. M. Clark, Assistant Minister of Trinity Church, Boston.—Published by request of the Company.—

This eloquent discourse is worthy of the author's high reputation as a preacher. The appropriate text, or motto, is Isaiah ix. 15: "The ancient and honorable:"—and its object is, to consider the relations of the present to the past, and to see how the past bears upon the present; endeavouring to reconcile a true conservatism with a true spirit of progress; and showing why and how far that which is "ancient" is to be esteemed as "honorable."

THE MEDICAL EXAMINER, and Record of Medical Science. Edited by Francis G. Smith, M. D., and David H. Tucker, M. D.—New Series; Vol. V. No. 7: July, 1849.

This valuable periodical is published monthly, and consists of original articles from members of the Medical Profession throughout the United States, reviews of new books of importance, and bibliographical notices of new works on Medicine published in this country and in Europe; together with a complete record of all that is new or important in Medicine. It is published by Messrs. Lindsay and Blakiston, N. W. corner of Chesnut and Fourth sts., at $3 per annum. We observe that one of the Editors, Dr. Tucker, has recently been appointed Professor of the Theory and Practice of Medicine in Hampden Sidney College, Richmond, Va.

THE PENNSYLVANIA JOURNAL OF PRISON DISCIPLINE AND PHILANTHROPY.—July, 1849.—Vol. iv. No. 3.

This excellent work is issued quarterly, at only $1 a year, by the "Philadelphia Society for Alleviating the Miseries of Public Prisons;" a venerable institution, which has been mainly instrumental in introducing the great reform in Prison Discipline that has distinguished the last half century.

LITTELL'S LIVING AGE.—Nos. 268 and 269; July 7, and 14th.

We have always considered this one of the most useful of all the periodical journals devoted to literature and science, either in Europe or this country. It contains the cream of all the foreign publications, and is published weekly, at the low price of 12½ cents a number.

JOURNAL OF THE LXI. ANNUAL CONVENTION OF THE PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN MARYLAND.

Appended to this journal, is the very able and timely Charge of Bishop Whittingham to the Clergy of his Diocese, the subject of which is sufficiently indicated by its title—The Doctrine of this Church, and that alone, to be held and taught by the Ministry of Christ in the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States.

Of the condition of the Diocese of Maryland, in a general view, the Bishop says, in his address—

"There has been little change, of a kind to attract notice; yet the most careful estimate I am able to make, satisfies me that notwithstanding discouragements and drawbacks in many parts, a steady growth, though slow, pervades the whole."

THE MERCERSBURG REVIEW, July, 1849.

This bi-monthly is "designed to be a free, liberal, and independent journal." "In theology and philosophy, it will be the organ of the so styled 'Mercersburg' system, a name not of its own seeking, but forced upon it from abroad; and as such, of necessity, will countenance neither sectarianism nor a heartless indifferentism, narrow prejudice nor latitudinarianism." We can testify to the ability with which it is conducted as an exponent of "views which, in this country, [among the sects,] are as yet but partially understood, or misrepresented."

Communications.

We have been politely favoured, in advance, with a proof of the following beautiful poem, from the Knickerbocker Magazine for July. It will enhance the gifted author's already high poetic reputation.

A MARTYR'S VICTORY.

BY REV. JAMES GILBORNE LYONS, LL.D.

WHEN ALARIC the Goth was defeated at Pollentia and Verona (A. D. 403,) by STILICHO the general of HONORIUS, and so driven for a time from Italy, the Romans celebrated that event with great rejoicing and magnificence. A triumphal procession and a conflict of wild beasts at once dazzled and gratified the multitude. The shows of gladiators were then forever brought to an end by TELEMACHUS, an Asiatic monk, whom the people stoned to death in the amphitheatre for attempting to separate the combatants. HONORIUS was thus reminded of his duty as a Christian emperor, and soon after put forth an edict forbidding all such exhibitions for the future.

The streets are throng'd in mighty Rome,
The gleaming ensigns spread,
While warriors march in triumph home,
With firm and measur'd tread;
For, bow'd at last and forc'd to yield
On rough Pollentia's crimson field,
Stern ALARIC has fled,
And left his ruthless Gothic powers
All crush'd beneath Verona's towers.

Those who once quail'd at that dire name
May now deride their foe,
And boast as if they shad'd the fame
Of glorious STILICHO,—
Of him who felt no craven fears
Rise at the flash of northern spears,
And struck no feeble blow,
But match'd, with trophies green and high,
The monuments of days gone by.

But, when the clear Italian sun
Pours down its noontide fire,
The trumpet speaks the games begun
Which idle crowds admire;
And soon, from barr'd and gloomy caves
Driven howling out by troops of slaves,
In grim and sullen ire,
Beasts, the wild brood of many a land,
Pace with loud rage the level sand.

Gætulia's lion, freshly brought
From scorched and desert plains,
And ravening tigers newly sought
On Parthia's waste domains;
Bears from the frozen Oder's mouth,
And panthers from the burning South,
Bred in old Nubian fanes,
Make there a stern and ghastly fray
For tribes more savage far than they.

But hark! the trumpet's warning peal
Is sounding as before,
And bondsmen clear, with staff and steel,
The red arena's floor;
The fainting brutes are swept away,
This sav'd to bleed another day,
That weltering in its gore,
And MEN, of martial frame and race,
Take with slow step the vacant place.

Two, chosen from the warlike throng,
Begin a deadly strife;
One a gray swordsman, scarr'd and strong,
One in the bloom of life;
This nurs'd where snows on Hæmus shine,
That torn from hills beside the Rhine,
From children, home, and wife;
And high-born matrons hold their breath,
All bent to see the work of death.

Their toil was fierce but short; and now,
Flung bleeding in the dust,
The Thracian waits, with pale cold brow,
The last and mortal thrust;
When rushing forth, till then unseen,
A swarthy pilgrim leaps between,
Strong in a Christian's trust,
And drench'd with blood, yet undismay'd,
Stays with fix'd grasp the uplifted blade.

A light smooth cross of cedar wood
The gentle stranger bore,
Long worn in holy solitude
On Syria's palmy shore:
'Romans,' he said, 'for HIM whose birth
Gave hopes divine of peace on Earth,
Arise, and evermore,
Servants of God in act and name,
Cast off these works of guilt and shame.'

He ceas'd; a scowl like noon's eclipse
Spreads fast from seat to seat,
And fourscore thousand hostile lips
Loud words of wrath repeat:
They rave and roar, as groves of pine
Wak'd on the Etrurian Apennine
When storms the tall crags beat,
Till, heav'd and troubled furiously,
Breaks in one surge that living sea.

The German leaves his task undone,
The Thracian creeps aside,
The swordsmen flee like herds that shun
Vex'd Arno's foaming tide;
But, as a pharos meets the shock
Of waves on some unshelter'd rock
Where seas are deep and wide,
TELEMACHUS look'd up and trod
That path of danger true to God.

And, when the stony tempest burst
On his defenceless head,
He stood unshrinking as at first,
As free from doubt or dread:
With aspect full of peace and love,
As if he came from worlds above,
And hands in prayer outspread,
He laid him down, nor breath'd again,
Whelm'd by that host of vengeful men.

Yet deem thou not the martyr died
Warring for right in vain;
HIS WAS THE PRIZE FOR WHICH HE SIGN'D,
AND HIS THE ETERNAL GAIN:
Fierce ALARIC shall yet return,
And Rome's fair dwellings blaze and burn,
Fill'd with red heaps of slain;
But scenes, where man must bleed for mirth,
Shall blast no more the ransom'd Earth.

MISSIONS, VERSUS THE CLERGY.

MR. EDITOR:

It has always been clear to my mind that the clergy are mainly responsible for the pitiable support given to the cause of missions. Our congregations do not possess an intuitive knowledge of the wants of the Church; and to contribute liberally of their substance, without being exhorted so to do, is no more to be expected of them than the performance of any other christian duty, when they have no arguments and persuasion thereto. And yet how many of our clergy, who minister to large and flourishing parishes, make no continued effort to enlighten the minds of their people as to the subject of missions, and entirely neglect to urge upon them the necessity of their devoting largely of their goods for the advancement of the cause of Christ in distant parts of our country.

I know from my own observation that some clergymen whose congregations might each support a missionary, are never known to present the subject at large to their flock, and their only mention of it, at all, is when they give notice of the collection.

As long as our clergy thus fail in their duty, our missions must languish, and the Church be disgraced with imputations of lukewarmness and niggardliness.

Certainly, Mr. Editor, we possess as much influence over our people as ministers of other denominations have over their congregations; and yet these latter, where they are of no more than equal ability, will contribute to missions five times as much as our churches. The reason is manifest; the subject is frequently presented to them, they are enlightened and instructed, and are incessantly plied with argument, exhortation and entreaty.

I cannot doubt, therefore, that if all our clergy would awake to a sense of their duty in this matter, and in season and out of season present the wants of the Church, our empty treasury would soon be filled, and our suffering missionaries relieved.

A great means of conveying information is found in the "Spirit of Missions." If the clergy were personally active in the matter, one hundred subscribers might be obtained for this periodical where there is one now. Thus would our people be generally instructed in the state of the Church, and carry in their hands a constant reminder of their duty. Still, nothing should take the place of the personal appeals of the clergy themselves. Nothing short of this, I am persuaded, will ever relieve the Church from her embarrassments, and induce her children to carry on the work of the Lord.

If you think as I do, Mr. Editor, and will, in your interesting and forcible style, enlarge upon this subject in the Banner, I have no doubt much good may be done. I am under the painful necessity of subscribing myself, Yours,

ONE OF THE GUILTY CLERGY.

Died, at Lewes, Del., on the 15th of June, 1849, ROBERT BURTON, in the 77 year of his age.

He was one of those pillars of the Church whose loss leaves a chasm which cannot easily be filled; and his life being devoted to the Church, and his Divine Master, has also in his death exhibited to all men the depth and the strength of Gospel truth, upon whose foundations were laid the ordinances and teachings of the Church of which he was a worthy member. Mr. Burton had been, in his youth, baptized into the Church, and under the instruction of pious parents early trained to follow the precepts of the Gospel. So soon as he became the head of a family, he took upon himself the most solemn responsibilities of religion, and became a communicant of the Church; bringing his children to holy baptism in their infancy, and training them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord; and well and truly was he repaid by being blessed with seeing them all become members of the mystical body of Christ. In his last illness he had the unspeakable joy of having them all around his dying bed, and could say, "that of all the Lord had given him, not one was lost;" and thus was his faithfulness, and the blessed means of grace afforded by the Church, made manifest in their salvation. He was a man of great integrity of character, and by his industry, temperance, and good management, had been able to do much to promote the welfare of his fellow-men, and to sustain the cause of religion in the Church. He had been for about fifty years a Vestryman and Warden, and had in many ways exerted himself in advancing the temporal and spiritual interests of the Church. Last year, he and another gentleman put a new roof on a church in the neighbouring parish of St. George's; and this year, he had largely subscribed towards building a new one in his own parish; and the only desire he seemed to have to live was to aid in completing it. He was a man that loved truth and justice, and was always foremost in vindicating the laws and resisting injustice and error among men; he was deeply versed in the Scriptures, and profoundly read in the history of the Church; he spared no expense to obtain the most valuable books on ecclesiastical polity; he was a sound churchman, and always ready to give a reason for the faith that was in him; his religious motto was "to do justly, to love mercy, and to walk humbly with his God;" and though his illness was protracted for a month, and from the first of the attack he felt that it was unto death, yet he had no fear, he had no pain, and his mind seemed more than ever bright and active. He knew in whom he trusted; he knew that he had as a wise master-builder laid his foundation in faith on a rock, and that his work was well done; his mother, the Church, had guided him through life in the ways of pleasantness and peace. He settled his affairs with composure; he called around him his children from distant homes to minister and pray with him, and receive his blessing and counsel; his servants were not forgotten; they were manumitted; and two favorite serving men not only made free men, but a farm given to each to make them in a measure independent. His advice to all was, to follow him in all that he did right, and shun everything he did wrong. Thus departed this aged Christian, firm in faith, and with hopes full of immortality. All who enjoyed the privilege of witnessing his last hours, must join in the exclamation, "Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his!"

"THE MEN THAT MAKE A STATE."

Who are they, and what are the marks which characterize their youth?

DEAR MR. EDITOR:—I have just returned from the celebration of the Fourth at Burlington College, where I heard this subject treated by the Rt. Rev. President in a way that made my heart bound within me. I will not attempt a sketch of this admirable "state paper," trusting that, in compliance with the request of those who heard it, it will be published. "Like apples of gold in pictures of silver," it reminded me of the best passages in the "Proverbial Philosophy," only far more racy, and free from all affectation. Indeed, one great charm of it was, that it came, evidently, fresh from the heart, and in style and manner such as became a father speaking to his sons.

It is a peculiarity of the bishop's style, and a great advantage to one whose office it is to teach, that he rarely ever reasons with his audience, but enunciates the truths which he has previously reasoned out in his own mind, and makes them apparent to others by means of the most apposite illustrations. While listening to him on this occasion, I could not but ask myself; How can the sons of New Jersey, and those from the neighboring states, who are placed here to be educated, come daily in contact with a mind that glows as his does, and not be fired with every noble impulse? What, then, is needed but wise direction and faithful culture, to mould youths thus impelled into the fashion of men who make and defend a state? And I will own to you, that, after an observation of several weeks, I feel great confidence in the Faculty of Burlington College, that they are men such as may be safely trusted with the guidance and culture of our sons.

In the College Hall, a collation had been provided, which bespoke not only good taste, but excellent judgment. Thither, after the address, the faculty and students, with their guests, repaired. I need scarcely add, that this second course, was relished as heartily as the "feast of reason," with which the entertainment commenced. The intervals were enlivened by several patriotic airs, from an amateur band in attendance, and from that accomplished vocalist, Mr. Dempster, who resides in Burlington.

In the evening, Mrs. D. entertained the young ladies of the Hall, in her own peculiarly happy style. A repast, at once elegant and simple—music at convenient intervals—conversation overflowing with good humour—an occasional turn in the beautiful grounds adjacent; and about half-past nine, prayer and benediction by the Bishop—and then, with beaming countenances, and accompanied by their teachers, away they tripped to their dormitories. A few moments, and all was silent. The lights were extinguished. They were lost in sleep.

Thus closed the most delightful celebration of the Fourth, in which it has been my good fortune to participate in many a year.

P. S.—I was glad to hear, next morning, that there were no headaches, or other painful souvenir of the celebration, either in Hall or College, to keep any young man or maiden from the post of duty. So may it ever be.

Faithfully, your friend,

For the Banner of the Cross.

The ladder of Jacob still hath its foot on earth, and top in heaven; and there walketh the city streets many an angel.

The good have power to see them; but the wicked feel their presence by the fragrance of their deeds; seeing them they would despise them for their lowliness.

True Piety commandeth admiration even from the hardened, and commendeth itself to the careless; how much more, then, should it be held in honour by the Christian!

It is not to be sought out in the gilded pages of the biographies of the great, but is found in the unwritten lives of the humble.

It is not wont to dazzle from thrones so much as it hideth itself within the cottage.

It seeketh not the applause of voices; yea, it shunneth with blushes of shame the words of approbation; for it knoweth that nothing is its own, save its own weakness, and it loveth that God alone should be praised.

It courteth not observation; but rather shrinking from notice, wisheth darkness to befriend its good doing from prying eyes.

It loveth the great family of Eve, because Christ, the Lord of all, died for it; it desireth the happiness of the erring, because Heaven's upper angels are interested in it.

It doeth good continually, but soundeth no trumpet; and with hesitating lip half hideth the truth, lest it betray its charities.

It speaketh evil of no one, but covereth rather faults with words of charitable defence; for knowing well its own hear it knoweth no one liveth and sinneth not.

It hopeth for the reformation of the poor world—cast aside, giving none up for lost whom Christ died for; so its charity never faileth while life continueth.

It beareth injuries patiently, pitying and praying for the wronger, and early seeketh occasion to return with good the evil.

It suffereth misconception in good doing without losing temper, or being anxious to make its defence; for it knoweth how to endure, leaving explanations for the last day.

It findeth a bright side where all other eyes see darkness and sin; it bloweth up the smoking flax, and bindeth the bruised reed, having all faith.

It wearieth never with the carelessness and torpor of those it would benefit, but persevereth in kindness; and perverseness becometh fuel for its love and patience.

Its foot-print is found impressed in the muddy lanes of poverty, and its unseen hand putteth bread into many a door; yet it is not puffed up, and vaunteth not itself for its good deeds.

Though most time poor, it maketh many rich; and the sick room echoeth to its gentle voice; the good physician knoweth its face well, and its presence assureth him.

It envieth not the rich, nor mocketh at the vain; but happy with its own littleness, is content, and craveth nothing but that all may become good and wise, and love God.

It seeketh not its own honour, but doeth good deeds as the tree droppeth fruit; and so without knowing it, she worketh side by side with angels in the world.

It thinketh no evil, however evil appearances; but believeth ever that some good lieth at the bottom, as there can be no darkness without light.

The gilded coach bespattereth it in its charitable walks; but it taketh no offence, for it hath taught itself to bear all things.

It entereth God's house with a worshipful, solemn air, as if it came sudden into God's presence; and, scarce noticed by the prideful eye, it glideth to its seat with holy timidity.

It kneeleth in prayer, as if its head lay on Christ's feet; for it realizeth that the place of prayer is the step of his footstool.

The worldling lady wondereth at its reverential manner, and sneereth at the simplicity of its piety; and contemneth it in her heart.

It listeneth to the words of God's minister with attentive ear and fixed eye, as if Christ were in the pulpit; as in His ministers He ever preacheth to its eye and ear.

It rejoiceth to see the bustling preparations for the offertory; for it knoweth that the gifts at God's altar make glad many a widow's hearth.

Though poor, yet it always giveth of its poverty somewhat; though it be little and tinkleth, in the ear of the proud woman, poorly upon the silver dish.

The sickly poor in the alleys, the bed-ridden old man, and the pale lame child, all know its foot-fall when it draweth nigh; and speak its name softly with love and honour.

Orphans know the way to its lowly house, and find close room at its table, which miraculously lacketh not; and the newly widow taketh counsel of it, as of Providence.

Its humility reproveth the haughty dame who scorneth to sit in the same church with its cheap shawl and faded bonnet; and its example ever standeth before the hypocrisy of ostentatious profession; the purity of its walk troubleth evermore the conscience of the careless, and so ever its life preacheth.

When Death beckoneth, it feareth not to follow; but smiling on him with holy courage, setteth its house in order, and joyfully entereth into its rest.

The eye of the poor glisteneth at the low-voiced whisper of its death; and even the wicked, when they hear that it hath departed earth, do boldly give heaven to it as its just recompense.

The rich, cold-hearted lady, whose idle life hath been made uneasy by its life of acts, secretly rejoiceth that it is dead, and hateth its memory; but the truthful ones take heart and are strengthened.

The careless earth turneth round and round, and the world upon it heedeth not that it hath lost one more of those few "little ones" for whose sake God continueth the world in stay.

The above reflections have been suggested by the recent decease of Mrs. ANNA BOWMAN LYNCH, of Nashville, Tenn., late of South Carolina, who died of cholera, Friday, June 16, 1849.

ORMES B. KEITH, } PRINCIPALS.
JOHN H. STORM, }

Will be opened on the 10th of September next, in the building immediately adjoining St. Mark's Church on the west.

The object of the School is to unite with thorough instruction, religious influence. To this end the Bible and Prayer Book will form part of the boys' studies.

Application for the admission of pupils can be made until July 10th, at No. 24 Chancellor Street, where further information respecting the School can be obtained.

It is earnestly hoped that no boy of vicious disposition will be presented for admission.

Attached to the School, and preparatory to it, is a JUNIOR DEPARTMENT, to which a limited number of boys between six and nine years of age will be received.

This department will be taught in separate rooms from the other school, and under the general direction of the Principals; the particular care of it to be committed to a lady well qualified for the task.

The Principals refer to the Bishop of the Diocese, who takes an interest in the undertaking.

PASTORAL LETTER.

TO THE CLERGY AND LAITY OF THE

Z. Taylor

BRETHREN:—The President of the United States has recommended that the first Friday in August be observed throughout our land as a day of fasting, humiliation, and prayer. Such an observance eminently becomes a people who owe so much to the God of nations, and who are now suffering so severely under his chastening hand. I therefore affectionately invite the Clergy and Laity of this Diocese to a due participation in the solemnities of this National Fast; and I set forth the following as proper Psalms, Lessons, and Prayers to be used on that day:

1. Instead of the Venite, in morning prayer, the fifty-first Psalm.

2. Instead of the proper Psalm for the morning of that day of the month, the Sixth Selection.

3. First Lesson, Isaiah lviii.

Second Lesson, St. Matthew vi.

4. Before the General Thanksgiving, the Prayer already put forth to be used in this Diocese, substituting visited for threatened, at the end of the first sentence.

5. In the Ante-Communion Office, use the Epistle and Gospel for the fourteenth Sunday after Trinity, with the following Collect.

O, Almighty God! who, by the many instances of mortality which encompass us on every side, dost call upon us seriously to consider the shortness of our time here upon earth, and remindest us that in the midst of life we are in death, so teach us to number our days that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom.

Give us grace to turn unto Thee with timely repentance, and thus to obtain, through the merits of our Saviour, that pardon to-day which to-morrow it may be too late to seek; that so being strengthened by Thy good Spirit against the terrors of death, and daily advancing in godliness, we may at all times be ready to give up our souls into Thy hands, O gracious Father, in the hope of a blessed immortality, through Jesus Christ our Lord! Amen.

(Signed,)

A. POTTER,
Bishop of the Diocese.

Philadelphia, July 12th, 1849.

V. But again, we are not only ministers of Christ, and of his religion as set forth in a Church at once protestant and apostolic; we are ministers in this Church in the NINETEENTH CENTURY. The onward flow of time has brought us to a position, unlike any occupied by our predecessors in the sacred office. We live when, with the many, there is more of intelligence and thoughtfulness: but not perhaps when, with the few, there is more of high sagacity, or far reaching faith. We live when industry has vindicated for itself a new and more commanding place, among the powers that direct the legislation and opinion of the world; but not when the toiling millions it employs are always admitted to a corresponding elevation. We live when there is great activity, and in some sense great and almost universal earnestness; but not when that activity is always tempered by forecast, nor that earnestness duly subdued by religious feeling. We live when there is more of Christian faith than there was in the eighteenth century, and more of Christian toleration than there was in the sixteenth; but alas! it does not become us to boast that even now a practical and life-transforming faith or sincere toleration in the heart is very abundant. We live when despotism of every kind, civil and religious, has much to fear; but not when legitimate authority, be it the authority of law, or the moral sway that belongs to age, wisdom, or parental power has every thing to hope. Practical and all-embracing charity is more active than it once was; but it is not always more wise, or more patient. Institutions, usages, opinions all are arraigned with a free and bold hand, and to all is applied the salutary test "by their fruits ye shall know them;" but the trial is not always conducted with caution or discrimination, and there is too little care to conserve the good, while we eradicate the ill.

Such I conceive, are some of the features of the age in which we live. Beside those which affect all classes of men, there are some that bear, with peculiar effect, upon our own profession. The clergy are no longer the peculiar guardians and dispensers of knowledge. They are no longer clothed with the exclusive privilege of legislating for the Church, nor even of teaching it.

They are no longer an independent corporation, sovereign over the law, or exempt in good part from its jurisdiction. There was a time, when they owned hardly any but an ecclesiastical superior—when they could successfully claim a control over the property and persons even of laymen—when they could, almost at will, summon all the powers of the state to do their bidding—when the absent husband could hardly correspond with his wife, except through the clerk in orders—when all laws were drawn up, all treaties reduced to form, all deliberations of cabinets, and even of parliaments aided and guided by ecclesiastics—and when they held possession not only of cathedrals, churches, convents, and monasteries, but of all colleges and schools of learning also. How different is it now, when they are merged by law, into the one class of citizens,—amenable to the same laws, mere sharers in the same intellectual and social privileges, and left to contend on less than equal terms for the direction of public opinion. I say less than equal, not so much because of the political disabilities under which they sometimes labour, as because I fear, that the growing and almost morbid jealousy of interference, on the part of the clergy, in things secular, excludes them too much from that promiscuous commerce with men, and from that free conflict with the difficulties of life, which seems almost essential to the utmost force of character, as well as to the highest degree of culture.

And what is the duty of the ministers of Christ in such an age? Is it to denounce it? Is it to shut out from our hearts all respect for it—all sympathy with it? Is it to dwell exclusively on its defects, and bring these into exaggerated contrast with the fancied glories of some age that has gone by? Is it to war only against the outward forms which have been assumed by the social, intellectual or religious spirit of the time, while we overlook or take perhaps into our very heart, the worst elements in that spirit?—Or, is it our part, on the other hand, to idolize the age, to seize upon some of its grosser achievements, and to set these in array against all the past? Is it to regard the spirit of the age as a Divine Inspiration, which has only to move on unobstructed and unopposed, to accomplish, for the man, the most beneficial results?—Or, in fine, is it our province to regard the characteristics of our age as inevitable effects from causes that have been at work heretofore, and to conceive that the vicissitudes of the future, like those of the past, must be governed by a blind and uncontrollable destiny?

Neither of these courses, I should suppose, was the dictate of true wisdom. We are placed here as teachers and guides of our time. To fulfil that mission as we ought, we must, in the first place, understand our age; we must, in the second place, sympathise to a certain extent with it; and we must, in the third place, be resolved that we will, God being our helper, do something to improve it. We must understand our age, in order to be understood by it. We must so far sympathise with its great movements, that they who are borne along by them will not be disinclined to listen to us; and improvement we must believe to be possible, or we shall not be induced to attempt it. But how can one understand his age, unless he be willing to see and to admit both its merits and its defects;—or, how can he have due sympathy with this or with any period of history, unless he remember that, in all periods, the same corrupt heart of man holds sway; and that hence the same essential evils, however differing in shape or in degree, must prevail in all. And he who, with a right good will, would labour to exalt and bless mankind, must surely have faith in the efficacy of right efforts rightly applied; and he must go forth hopefully, in the strength of God and of a good cause, to his work. He must be neither a fatalist nor an optimist. Both the form and the spirit, the body and the pressure of the time, he is to accept as facts—facts which he cannot set aside though he may leave them out of view; and he is to consider that it is through these facts, and in the light that they cast upon his path, that he is to labour for the service of the Church of God. These facts he would study and analyse by the aid of a high scriptural philosophy; and he would study them, not for the purposes of speculation, but that he may the better help to guard whatever of blessing we inherit from the past, and to compass whatever of blessing is possible in the future. Could we but station such minds, vigilant, large-hearted, forecasting, hopeful, at the great reservoirs of human opinion and influence, what a benign change might be wrought even in a single generation on the moral habits of mankind! The faithful and enlightened student of history finds, since the flood, no age or civilization that he would willingly reproduce, even if he could; and he knows full well that there is none, though ever so much desired, which could be reproduced; since the forces that now mould societies and nations are not the forces that they once were. He turns therefore to the Present, as an inevitable yet ever changing, and never to be modified fact; and he would so work that this great fact shall be the harbinger of one brighter and more blessed soon to succeed it. The blessings that the world has gained, he would remember and own that he may be contented and thankful; the blessings that the world has still, through God's help, to achieve, he would never forget, lest he be tempted to indolence or to self-complacency.

Finally, we are American Ministers of Christ's Protestant and Episcopal Church in this the nineteenth century. The state and institutions of our country are peculiar; and hardly less so is our own position as members and clergymen of this Church. We should be surely unworthy of our place, in one of the most prosperous and peaceful lands on earth, if we were not devoutly thankful for the plenty, the equality, the intelligence and the freedom that surround us. As Christians, too, we should rejoice in the nominal regard for our religion, which obtains throughout the land; and as Churchmen we may well congratulate ourselves, that our ecclesiastical system is to win its way from a position of comparative weakness, to one of general consideration and confidence, beneath the mild sway of equal and tolerant laws.

On the other hand, we may well mourn that with all our blessings as Americans, there is still so little of true contentment among us. We may well mourn, that there is sometimes so much impatience of the restraints of law, and always such overweening national self-esteem, combined with a tone of detraction so ungenerous and undistinguishing in respect to the institutions and condition of other lands. We may well be saddened, when we observe how much of our philanthropy is spurious and superficial; how much of our zeal for the public is but another name for selfishness and ambition. And for the future of our land, may we not sometimes tremble, when we see how the bands of parental authority and domestic affection are relaxed; how much insolent contempt is expressed for the wisdom of the past;—how the religious world is swayed to and fro between dogmatism on the one hand and mysticism on the other; and what a fearful divorce often obtains between the profession and the obligations, the faith and the moralities of the Christian life?

Under such circumstances what is our duty? It seems to me to be obvious. It is to remember that we are Americans, and that both our form of government and the characteristic features of our social system are fixed—fixed both in the habits and in the affections of the people. Our duty is, to guard against the tendency of studies, which lie much with the past, to dis-affect us towards the faith and civilization of the present. We should consider, too, that the traditional beliefs and practice of nine-tenths of the American people are at variance with our own; and that if we would gain a hearing for our cause it must be done through kindness, courtesy, and a blameless Christian life. We must beware, too, of the fatal mistake of confounding the essentials of our Church-system, with the abuses in civil or ecclesiastical administration, which have been sometimes associated with it in our father-land; and never should we be led to speak or act as if we were the champions, the defenders, or even the apologists for despotism. We must also struggle against the somewhat provincial reverence for the current theology and literature of our Anglican mother, which even yet keeps our Church mind too much in vassalage, and which is so apt to embroil us in controversies, or charge us with sentiments alien to our true mission as American Episcopalians. We must, for ourselves, resort to the great masters of ancient and modern theology, and substitute them as our manuals in place of the extracts, abridgements and superficial treatises which too often engross our time. We must strive, too, to lay the foundation of a more stable faith, and of a higher Christian life among our people, by working out thoroughly the principles of our system in regard to the training of the young—whether at home, at school, or at church. And in fine, we must cultivate in our hearts, and in the hearts of all our people, a generous and enlightened interest in whatever can benefit our country, and our whole country—in whatever can purify morals, or raise the tone of public intelligence and public taste—in whatever can promote a healthy feeling of Christian brotherhood among all classes, and in all that can invest our own communion with a more benign and powerful influence in dealing with the prevailing disorders of society, or with the current errors in Christian doctrine and practice.

I have thus sketched, too briefly for the subject, but too much at length for the occasion, some of the main features that characterize our position as Ministers of Christ. As Ministers or stewards it is required that we be found faithful; as stewards of the mysteries of God, that we be about our Master's business; as Ambassadors of Christ, that we know nothing save Christ and him crucified;—and as Ministers here and now—in this church, at this time, in this land, that we be wise as serpents and harmless as doves. Fulfilled in its true spirit, with a large, enlightened and earnest mind, no calling can be nobler than ours. We deal with the highest sentiments of man's nature, and with his most momentous interests. We go with him from his birth even to his death, and never do we leave him till we give back, embalmed with words of hope and promise, his inanimate clay to its last earthly rest. We are with him in his hours of deepest sorrow and of liveliest joy; and if we cleave, in our Master's spirit, to our Master's work, we must wrest from every ingenuous mind its warmest affection and regard. Speaking the truth of God in the name of God; constituted dispensers of his peculiar grace, our words, if meetly chosen and meetly uttered, must go winged with more than earthly power. An unction from the Holy One waits to invest them with a regal authority, and to mark both Minister and people as the chosen of the Lord. Take heed, then, O man of God, to thyself and to the doctrine.

Ye who your Lord's communion bear,
His way of mercy to prepare,
Angels he calls you; be your strife
To lead on earth an Angel's life.
Think not of rest; though dreams be sweet,
Start up and ply your heavenward feet.
Is not God's oath upon your head?
Ne'er to sink back on slothful bed?
Never again your loins untie,
Not let your torches waste and die,
Till when the shadows thickest fall,
Ye hear your Master's midnight call.*

ANNUAL MEETING OF THE ASSOCIATE ALUMNI OF THE GENERAL THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.

We gave in our last, an account of the opening services on Tuesday evening, 26th June, and the delivery of the Annual Sermon before the Association. We now give an abstract of the proceedings.

After the services were concluded, the Association met in the Vestry room of Calvary Church for the transaction of business.

Rev. Dr. Johnson was called to the Chair.

Present—Rev. S. R. Johnson, D. D., Isaac Pardee, A. B. Hart, D. V. M. Johnson, Wm. Watson, Henry Fitch, W. E. Eigenbrodt, Sam'l. M. Haskins, Sam'l. L. Southard, Wm. Everett, Wm. Walton.

Rev. Messrs. Pardee, Hart, and D. V. M. Johnson were appointed a committee On the Room and Library; and Rev. Messrs. Eigenbrodt, Everett, and Haskins, a committee On the Invitation of the Graduating Class.

On motion, Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed to ascertain whether any members of the Association have deceased since the last Annual Meeting, and to prepare a suitable tribute of respect to their memories. Rev. Dr. Haight, and Messrs. Southard and Walton were appointed.

Adjourned to meet at 1 o'clock P. M. to-morrow at the Seminary Hall.

Wednesday, 1 o'clock P. M., Rev. Messrs. Lloyd Windsor, C. R. Duffie, Stephen Douglas, and George W. Fash attended, not before present.

Rev. Mr. Hart was called to the chair.

Minutes of yesterday read and approved.

The Secretary read the following Report from the Executive Committee.

"Their ordinary duties have been very light during the past year, in consequence of the limitations imposed upon them at the last meeting. The amount received for contributions, during the past year has been but $62; and the amount of indebtedness for printing the publications of 1847 still is nearly $60. In consequence of this, they have been unable to take any measures for printing the other sermons and essays; and also the Constitution and By-laws with a list of the members as directed two years since.

The committee had good reason to expect that the whole burden of publishing the Essay of 1847, would not be suffered to fall upon the Alumni exclusively, but their expectations thus far have not been realized. It is much to be desired that the debt should be cleared off both for the credit of the Society and the benefit of the publisher who needs the money.

It has been suggested, that the annual contributions, if promptly paid, would be sufficient both for the annual publications, and for the support of a scholarship at $125 per annum; and they make the suggestion that a special effort be made for this purpose, as calculated to be productive of more interest among the members of the Association than now exists.

The student who has occupied the room and Library for two years past, will graduate this term: other provision, therefore, will have to be made. Respectfully submitted.

The Treasurer's report was then read.

Amount received in 1848-9,	$62
Cash paid for publications of 1847, on account,	39

Balance June 26, 1849,	$23
Due for publication about $60.

The election for officers was then held.

The Secretary declined being a candidate for re-election on account of other engagements; and Rev. Mr. Eigenbrodt declined serving on the Executive Committee.

The following gentlemen were declared the officers for the ensuing year.

President, Rt. Rev. William R. Whittingham, D. D., ex officio.
1st Vice President, Rt. Rev. Alfred Lee, D. D., ex officio.
2nd Vice President, Rev. William Shelton, D. D.
3d Vice President, Rev. John M. Forbes, D. D.
4th Vice President, Rev. Benjamin J. Haight, D. D.
5th Vice President, Rev. Albert Smedes,
6th Vice President, Rev. William Ingraham Kip, D. D.
Treasurer, Rev. Edward N. Mead.
Corresponding Secretary, Rev. Robert B. Van Kleek.
Recording Secretary, Rev. A. Bloomer Hart.

* Keble's Christian Year. (2d Sunday in Advent.)

Executive Committee.—Rev. Edward Y. Higbee, D. D. Rev. Richard Cox, Rev. William Walton, Rev. Samuel L. Southard. The following gentlemen were elected Preacher and Essayist: Preacher, Rev. Robert Lloyd Goldsborough. Substitute Rev. William B. Ashley. Essayist, Rev. James A. Williams. Substitute, Rev. John A. Spooner.

2 o'clock P. M.—The annual Essay was read as mentioned in our last.

Adjourned to meet at the Sunday School Room of St. John's Chapel on Friday next, after the commencement.

FRIDAY, ST. PETER'S DAY.

Met pursuant to adjournment.

The President, Bp. Whittingham, took the chair, and explained that his absence from the previous sessions had been caused by imperative engagements.

Rev. Dr. Haight and E. Harwood, not before present.

The Constitution was then read, and all the members of the graduating class, except Mr. McViekar, (who is absent from the country,) signed the roll, and became members of the Association.

The minutes of the preceding session were then read and accepted.

Rev. Mr. Walton from the Committee on deceased members, reported the following resolutions:

Whereas, since the last meeting of this Association, two of our late friends and brethren, the Rev. John W. Brown, Rector of St. George's Church, Astoria, and the Rev. John B. Gallagher, Rector of St. Paul's Church, Louisville, Kentucky, have, in the wise Providence of God, been taken from among us, while travelling for the benefit of their health—the former having died at the island of Malta, on the 9th of April last; and the latter at Tuscumbia, Alabama, on the 1st of February last; therefore

Resolved, That, while we deeply feel these dispensations of Divine Providence, admonishing us both of the uncertainty of human life, and of the necessity of ministerial fidelity and diligence "while it is day,"—we have abundant reasons for consolation and encouragement, in the well-assured hope afforded by the lively faith, the pious aspirations, and the charity unfeigned, exhibited in their closing hours.

Resolved, That we cordially bear witness to the amiable qualities, the cultivated talents, and the mental endowments of our departed brethren;—to their devotion as ministers of Christ, and to their fidelity in the discharge of their parochial duties; and the acceptableness of which is attested by the unanimous voice of their bereaved congregations.

Resolved, That we rejoice in the knowledge that the departure from this world of the first-named brother, though in a foreign land, was cheered by the kind attendance and the consoling dispensing of the ordinances of religion, by that eminent prelate, the Lord Bishop of Gibraltar, whereby we are practically instructed that the members of the Church Catholic, though widely separated by country and by distance, are still one in the bonds of a common Faith, Hope and Baptism; and that the last-named brother, though he died among strangers, yet found them "the kindest of friends," abounding in every work of benevolence, and every office of charity which his case required.

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be transmitted to the respective families of the deceased; to the Vestry of St. George's Church, Astoria, and to the Vestry of St. Paul's Church, Louisville, with the assurances of our sincerest sympathy in their distressing bereavement.

Which were unanimously adopted.

Rev. Mr. Walton also read a communication from Wm. H. Harrison, Esq., resigning the Office of Treasurer of the Fund for the Endowment of the Professorship of Pastoral Theology; and also a statement of the present condition of the Fund, as follows:

Securities, Bond and Mortgage,	$1500.00
Note on demand,	1581.67
Produced by Contributions,	2066.87
Increase, viz., by interest,	866.75
Profit on stock,	160.65—1027.40
	3094.27
Less expenses,	12.60
	$3081.67

He then offered the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the resignation of Wm. H. Harrison, Esq., as Treasurer of the Fund for the Endowment of the Professorship of Pastoral Theology be accepted, and that the thanks of the Association be presented to him for his care and attention bestowed upon said business, and that the Recording Secretary notify him of this resolution.

Resolved, That Abel T. Anderson, Esq., Treasurer of the General Theological Seminary be, and hereby is, appointed Treasurer of said fund, and that the Secretary notify him of this appointment, and request his acceptance of the same.

Rev. Mr. Walton also offered the following resolution:

Whereas, a Committee has been appointed by the Board of Trustees, to inquire into the expediency of constituting the Alumni of the General Theological Seminary an Academic Association, in connection with said Seminary, with power to confer with a Committee of this Association; therefore,

Resolved, That the Executive Committee be appointed the Committee on the part of the Associate Alumni to confer with the Committee of the Board of Trustees—which was unanimously adopted.

Rev. Mr. Harwood, on behalf of the Committee appointed last year to devise means of giving greater interest to the meetings of the Association, requested that said Committee might be continued—granted.

On motion of Rev. Mr. Eigenbrodt,

Resolved, That so much of the report of the Executive Committee as relates to the establishment of a Scholarship, be referred back to said Committee, with power, &c.

On motion of Rev. Mr. Harwood, amended by Rev. Mr. Eigenbrodt,

Resolved, That a Committee of Three be appointed for the purpose of procuring the publication of a complete catalogue of the Library of the General Theological Seminary, with the consent of the Library Committee of the same, with power to take such measures as they may be able to devise to that end.

Rev. Mr. Walton, Eigenbrodt and Harwood were appointed. On motion adjourned to the Seminary, to witness the presentation to the Library of a portrait of Bishop Hobart.

The Association then adjourned sine die.—Churchman.

SCIENCE ON THE GLACIERS.

The party whose labours we are describing ascertained these minute creatures to be infusoria; they had taken care to provide themselves with Ehrenberg's great work on the subject, and were thus enabled to compare and classify them. The most interesting, as above specified, is one of the rotifera, named by the German naturalists Philodina roseola. It was found in abundance at the foot of the glacier of the Aar; the animal's head consists of a trunk opening with a ciliary orifice, behind which are two rotatory organs like the wheels of a mill, which are often seen in rapid motion, the means apparently of conveying nutriment to the stomach. At the base of the trunk the eyes are placed obliquely; it is in the stomach and its appendages that the peculiar red colour is seen, varying in intensity according to the nature of the organ, some portions of the intestines being of a pale and others of a deep crimson. The tail is made to lengthen and contract after the manner of a telescope, and consists of seven joints or rings, the last being furnished with two feet similar to those of the caterpillar. This singular animal has other peculiarities of which it is scarcely possible to give a familiar description. The question of red snow is no longer a puzzle; that which was supposed to be devoid of all life is now found to be the abode of millions of living creatures, in whose stomachs the substance of the snow is converted into a red fluid.

Not less extraordinary, perhaps, is the fact that fleas live and breed upon glaciers. These insects had been seen by some of the party on a former occasion, but Agassiz had refused to consider them as tenants of the ice. "Judge then," writes M. Desor, "what was my pleasure when I saw them again; not that they are pretty, for they are very ugly, but because it gave me the opportunity of convincing Agassiz that these animals really lived in the glacier, and were not thrown there by chance. On turning over some stones, we found an incredible number, sometimes thousands within the space of a foot, and carried away many specimens to be examined with the microscope. We afterwards met with them all over the glacier, but they seem to prefer the shelter of stones, and the edges of pools and crevices. But what surprised us most was to see these little animals introduce themselves with extraordinary agility into the most apparently compact ice, to such an extent that whenever we broke off a fragment we saw them circulating like globules of blood through their canals. This is a fact which deserves to be taken into consideration, as it confirms the truth demonstrated by Agassiz, that glacier ice, whatever may be its compactness and transparency, is always traversed by a plexus of minute fissures which escape an ordinary eye, and furnishes besides a manifest proof that glaciers are by no means incompatible with the development of organic life either on their surface or in their interior."

"These little insects are about the size of the common flea, and leap in the same way when disturbed. It was for this reason that we gave them the name of the glacier fleas, although, zoologically speaking, the relationship is very false, for, when examined with the microscope, it is soon seen that their organization has nothing in common with that of the parasite so inconvenient to the human race." They belong to the family of the Podurellæ, and have been named from their discoverer, Desoria saltans. Their bodies are of a deep black colour, thickly covered with fine short hairs; their food consists of solid matter, which is ground between their jaws before descending to their stomachs. A remarkable fact has been observed with regard to their circulatory system: the motion of the blood is intermittent, or rather, ceases at the animal's will. It may be seen for hours without a sign of life, when all at once a movement takes place, attended by regular pulsations, beating 140 times in a minute.

M. Topffer, the author of "Voyages en Zigzag," gives an amusing account of a meeting which he had with some members of the party at the hospice of the Grimsel. "Complaisant and well informed," he tells us, "they gave us a familiar account of the sort of life they lead upon the glacier of the Aar, for what reasons they are sinking a well, how glaciers have fleas just the same as cooks and poodle dogs, and that red snow owes its colour to an insect with a crimson stomach. Quick we sent to fetch some red-snow water, mounted a microscope, and there we were taking our turn to look at rotifera as many as we pleased. What a curious animal! Figure to yourself a creature which keeps two mill wheels in perpetual activity at the two corners of its mouth, for no other purpose than to make the water constantly renewed enter in greater abundance. This water rushes into the gulf, sweeping along all sorts of matters, and at last reaches the red stomach, where two mill-stones, placed at the entrance, bruise, crush, and reduce to a jelly every thing that comes. Truly, we are only animalcules of cotton by the side of this grinding animal, and our gastric juice is nothing but lukewarm water in comparison with this redoubtable mechanism, which pulverizes all it lays hold of. As for the fleas, they are about the same size as our own, and velvety, apparently to keep them warm. But what in the name of mischief do they find to bite on the glaciers—those mighty lymphatics? And is it not, after all, a melancholy fate for fleas to have to bite something which feels nothing at all of their stinging?"

After a week's residence on the glacier some of the party determined on attempting the pass of the Strahleck, by way of the mer de glace between the Finsberaar and Grindewald, a feat which had only twice before been accomplished. The whole of their collections and apparatus, excepting a few of the observing instruments, were packed up and sent to await their return by the ordinary route to the Grimsel. They started early in the morning, and arriving at the foot of the Straleck, found it less formidable in appearance than had been anticipated; but distances and heights are very deceptive in mountainous districts. "We ranged ourselves in file," says M. Desor, "to make the ascent. Jacob and Wahren, the guides, marched in advance, sounding the granulated snow, or neve, to find out the crevices. Gradually the slope became steeper, and the snow so loose that we sank in it to our knees at every step. Fearful of accidents, our guides now thought proper to attach us together at convenient distances by a long cord, which we carried for the purpose, and passed round our bodies. Our two guides left themselves at liberty, the better to observe our route. It was interesting to observe with what circumspection, and confidence at the same time, these two intelligent and robust mountaineers beat the path before us, sometimes stamping on the snow to prevent our sinking into it, at others chopping steps in the hardened surface with an axe, and encouraging us by voice and gestures not to change our footing, to remain always at an equal distance from one another, and not to look behind; for the slope was such as to create a giddiness even in those not subject to it. It is impossible to travel up such an inclination in a direct line, and we only accomplished it by deviations from right to left. It was with inexpressible pleasure that I pressed Agassiz's hand when we at length reached the summit of the pass, from whence we suddenly beheld the chains of the lower Alps, and the magnificent pyramid of the Niesen bathed by the waters of the Lake of Thun."

The instruments were unpacked and the required observations made; the dryness of the air was extreme, and, notwithstanding the bright sunshine, the thermometer remained below the freezing point. The party were in such high spirits that, after their repast, they began to dance and sing like schoolboys on a holiday. At the end of an hour and a half, however, it was time to cease frolics and commence the descent. It was judged best to slide down the slope of frozen snow; the adventurers again attached themselves to the cord, as a measure of safety, and had scarcely started when one of them sunk up to his breast into the snow, one of the fearful crevices was beneath him, but by the rapid motion of the others he was drawn out in safety. Sometimes where the route became rougher or steeper than usual, one of the number fell and dragged two or three others down with him. After various mischances of this nature, they separated, and each slid down in a sitting posture. Agassiz found himself suddenly at the edge of a yawning chasm, from which he saved himself by a rapid spring to the opposite side. Here his footing failed, and before he could recover himself he was carried some distance down the rugged surface of the snow, and his hands lacerated by vain endeavours to stop himself. At length the whole party reached a resting place, where the guides were waiting with outstretched arms to break the shock of their descent. Before going further it was found necessary to set one of the guides to sew up the rents in their trousers caused by the rough passage. "Notwithstanding the trouble and fatigue," says M. Desor, "we never shrank from the trouble of going out of our way, or getting over a crevice, to pluck a little stunted plant, or to examine a stone or lichen of an uncommon appearance. It is the privilege of science to furnish to the naturalist at each step new subjects of recreation and meditation, when even the greater scenes of nature begin to lose something of their interest."

The last portion of the descent, which occupied five hours, was the most dangerous and fatiguing, and effected by following the bed of a small watercourse, which one of the guides discovered after much difficulty. "All at once," pursues the narrator, "a spontaneous exclamation of joy broke from our little troop, when, on turning the projecting angle of a rock, we saw the church and village of Grindenwald. Never had a valley appeared more beautiful than that now presented to us. We felt our eye-balls, contracted by the dazzling reflection from the ice and snow, dilate with pleasure upon the green turf watered by the sparkling current of Luthine. The first thing we did on our arrival was to rub our legs with brandy, in order to continue our walk on the following day." The two subsequent days were passed in returning by the ordinary mountain-road to the hospice of the Grimsel, where the whole of the party again met, and having exchanged notes and made up the sum of their observations, each one descended to resume his customary avocations in the lower regions of the earth.

A HERITABLE HABITATION.—Miss Baillie has had the happiness of residing in one house nearly all her life. Who can tell how much the unbroken associations of that pleasant home, the quiet of those rural shades, the inspiration of that splendid landscape, have done towards making her a poet? John Quincy Adams reckoned among the blessings to be peculiarly thankful for—a "hereditary habitation;" and so do I; but so do not my countrymen generally. That dear, quiet, old house, with its shrub-girdled court-yard, its pretty garden, its old-fashioned windows, and love-hallowed furniture, would never have remained unaltered through lives passed in the full blaze of success, and world-wide fame like that of Dr. Baillie and his sister Joanna, if they had been scions of our young Republic. But here they have lived, from infancy to advanced age, the honored centre of a large circle, without a thought or wish to put on any outward splendor or fancied correspondence with their acknowledged claims. The house is the very ideal of comfort, and rich everywhere with the memorials of the dear, the good, and the eminent who have been associated with the inmates; but it lacks everything for which houses are prized in New York. But how dignified did the sisters, who are now its only and honored occupants, appear in the midst of those simple, unaffected surroundings.—Kirkland.

In pain, sickness, trouble, methinks I hear God saying, Take this medicine, exactly suited to the case, prepared and weighed by my own hands, and consisting of the choicest drugs which heaven affords.

MY FATHER IS IMMORTAL.

BY THE REV. EDWARD C. JONES.

"A certain disciple was informed of the death of his Father; but he said to the messenger, 'Cease to blaspheme; for my Father is immortal.'—Palmer's Church History.

Ah, tell me not in rueful strain,
That Death has sundered dearest ties;
The lost to Earth shall live again,
The withered flower resume its dyes;
But that sweet bond which links my soul
To Him who is of Life the giver,
Renews its strength as ages roll,
And, blest be God, dissolveth never.

Parent and child may vanish hence,
Acquaintance into darkness go;
And o'er life's fair inheritance,
Its gloomiest pall may sorrow throw;—
But that sweet bond which links my soul
To Him who is of Grace the giver,
More closely knits as ages roll,
And, thanks to God, dissolveth never.

My Father lives—my guide—my stay,
Pillar and Cloud, in Him I see;
When all I cherish pass away,
Immortal Friend, He clings to me;
And that sweet bond which links to Him;—
Of Life—and Grace—and Heaven the giver,—
But firmer grows as ages roll,
And wraps me up "in Christ" forever.

MR. EDITOR:

HILDEBERT, (a learned ecclesiastic of the latter part of the eleventh and the beginning of the twelfth century,) was born at Lavardin in the diocese of le Mans, in France, A. D. 1057. He was a pupil of the celebrated Berenger, or Berengarius, (famous for the ground he took and the persecutions he suffered in the early controversies respecting transubstantiation,) and became a monk of the monastery of Cluni, and archdeacon of the church there. Afterwards he was made the Bishop of his native diocese, being consecrated on Christmas day of the year 1097; and, subsequently, on the death of Gilbert, Archbishop of Tours, in the year 1125, was elevated to that Metropolitan See. He died on the 18th of November, 1132, leaving a high reputation, won by his writings and by the unblemished sanctity of his life. His character has been expressed by the following highly eulogistic distich:

Inclutus et prosa versusque per omnia primus,
Hildebertus olet prorsus ubique rosam.

His Latin works, which have certainly considerable merit and no small share of erudition, were collected, and published in folio, by the Benedictine friars, at Paris, in the year 1708, with annotations by Anthony de Beaugendre, a French monk of St. Maur. This is the princeps edition. These works contain one hundred and thirty letters, one hundred and forty sermons, various treatises on moral and theological points, and a large collection of poems; besides the biographies of Radegonda and of St. Hugh, Abbot of Cluni. These writings are not much known now; and have been, for a long time, much neglected, as have been most of the productions of that obscure and superstitious age. But, much of what Hildebert wrote, deserved a better fate. He certainly was a writer of more than ordinary vigour; and, for the times in which he lived, of great merit. It was he who first reduced theology to something like a system. Before his day, it had been taught very vaguely and unmethodically, without any plan, analysis, or arrangement. Some feeble attempt had, indeed, been made to systematize the science, by Tajo, a Spanish ecclesiastic of Saragossa, in the seventh century, and by John Damascenus of the eighth century. But, they accomplished little in that way. Another attempt to methodize theology, was made by the famous Anselm, Archbishop of Canterbury, in the eleventh century, in his well known treatise, entitled "Cur Deus homo?" (See p. 74—96 of his works, ed. Paris, 1721, folio.) But he, by no means, embraced the whole range of divinity; but confined himself, mainly, to the points indicated by the title of his book. To Hildebert belongs the high honour of being the very first writer who conceived and composed an entire system of theology. Such a thing as a "body of Divinity" was unknown till then. This body of divinity is found among his tracts, at p. 1010 of the folio edition of de Beaugendre, and is entitled Tractatus Theologicus. It is divided into forty-one chapters, and occupies about ninety pages folio. The latter part of it seems to have been lost, or, as some think, never to have been finished. Succeeding systematic writers and composers of Summaries of Divinity have only trodden in the path indicated by him. His editor, de Beaugendre, in the preface to his edition of his works, shows clearly how much his successors, and even such men as Peter Lombard and Robert Pulleyn (Cardinal Pullus) were indebted to the labours of Hildebert. I may remark, in passing, that, although Hildebert was the scholar of Berenger, (the great opposer of the innovation which, about his time, began to be thrust upon the Church, touching the change in the eucharistic elements,) he did not adopt (as some have supposed he did*) the views of his distinguished preceptor. He was the advocate of transubstantiation; and was the first writer who introduced the term. It had never been heard of before. I do not mention this to his credit; but merely as a memorable fact in his history, and for the purpose of suggesting, how little idea the church in ancient times had of the doctrine of transubstantia-tion, when, for nearly twelve hundred years, there was not even invented a word to express it! And, yet, it is the characteristic dogma of a church which lays claim to antiquity! Antiquity indeed!

Among the poems of Hildebert, (generally perhaps devoid of high merit, and said sometimes to violate the rules of quantity,) there is one piece of a very striking character, and marked by no common excellence. It is called an "Oratio ad Dominum." I send it to you, Mr. Editor, in the original Latin. It is at least curious as a literary production. Perhaps you may think it worth a place in the Banner of the Cross.

HILDEBERT'S ORATIO AD DOMINUM.

Tu intrare me non sinas
Infernales officinas;
Ubi mæror, ubi metus,
Ubi fætor, ubi fletus;
Ubi probra deteguntur,
Ubi rei confunduntur;
Ubi tortor semper cadens,
Ubi vermis semper edens;
Ubi totum hoc perenne,
Quia perpes mors Gehennæ.

Me receptet Sion illa,
Sion David urbs tranquilla,
Cujus faber auctor lucis,
Cujus porta signum crucis;
Cujus clavis lingua Petri,
Cujus cives semper læti;
Cujus muri lapis vivus,
Cujus custos rex festivus.

In hac urbe lux solennis,
Ver æternum, pax perennis;
In hac, odor implens cælos,
In hac, festum semper melos.
Non est ibi corruptela,
Non defectus, non querela;
Non minuti, non deformes,
Omnes Christo sunt conformes.
Urbs cælestis, urbs beata!
Super petram collocata.
Urbs in portu satis tuto!
De longinquo te saluto:
Te saluto, te suspiro,
Te affecto, te requiro.

Quantum tui gratulentur!
Quam festive conviventur!
Quis affectus eos stringat,
Aut quæ gemma muros cingat,
Quis Chalcedon, quis Jacintus,
Norunt illi qui sunt intus.

In plateis hujus urbis,
Sociatur piis turbis.
Cum Moise et Eliza
Pium cantem alleluja!

Surely there is nothing in the "Stabat Mater" of Jacopone, comparable to this. And yet this latter piece has been recited and admired, from the fourteenth century to this day; and has been thought worthy to be set to music the most magnificent, by the greatest composers, such as Pergiosi, Jomelli, Hadyn, and Rossini. It forms a part of the services of the church of Rome during Holy Week; and enthusiastic thousands rush to the Sistine chapel to hear it. But no one knows much of Hildebert's "Oratio;" few ever heard of it. Had it been set to music by some great master, it would have been the admiration of the world.

Philadelphia, July 4th, 1849.

P. S. I have said that Hildebert was the first author who used the word transubstantiation. I make this statement upon the high authority of the Abbé Fleury, the ecclesiastical historian, himself a distinguished divine of the Romish communion. I give his words. Speaking of Hildebert's views of the Eucharist, Fleury says: "Il se sert même du mot transubstantiation; et on ne trouve personne qui l'ait employé avant lui." He quotes, in proof, Hildebert's sermon 93, p. 689. (See Histoire Ecclesiastique, par M. Fleury. Tome 14me. p. 427. Paris, in 4to. 1751.)

Dupin, another equally learned and celebrated Romish historian, traces the invention of the word to others. He says that Peter de Celles, Bishop of Chartres, and Stephen, Bishop of Autun, employed the term transubstantiation; and, he adds, "these two authors are the first that made use of it." (See a New Ecclesiastical History; containing an account of the controversies in Religion; the lives and writings of ecclesiastical writers, &c., written in French by Louis Elies Du Pin, Doctor of the Sorbonne. London, 1698: vol. x. p. 156.) Now, Stephen, the Bishop of Autun, was the cotemporary of Hildebert, being put into that see in 1113, and dying some time after 1129, when he left it to enter the Abbey of Cluni, as a monk; and Peter de Celles wrote some years after him, being made Abbot of Celles in 1150, Bishop of Chartres in 1182, and dying in 1187. (See the dates in Du Pin, vol. 10, pp. 156, 170.)

Bishop Burnet also ascribes the invention of the word to Stephen, Bishop of Autun; and Bingham says, "the first inventor of the name Transubstantiation, was Stephanus Eduensis"—the same person—Edua being the ancient Latin name for that place. (See Burnet's Exposition of the thirty-nine Articles, Lond. 8vo. 1827, p. 334, and Bingham's Origines Ecclesiasticæ, London, 8vo. 1829, vol. 5, p. 367.) But, it ought to be stated, that Stephen does not say, that the bread is transubstantiated, but only that it is, as it were, transubstantiated—a most material qualification, which makes a great difference. Be the inventor of the monstrous term, Stephen, or Peter de Celles, or Hildebert,* it is reduced to a certainty that it was utterly unknown before the beginning of the twelfth century. Now, can any reasonable man believe, that so vital a doctrine as the Papal church would make transubstantiation to appear, can have been received or known in the ancient church, and yet have had not even a word to designate it? In the Greek churches, there has never been a term corresponding with the Latin word transubstantiation. They did indeed use, and do now use, certain words expressive of a change of some sort, (not a physical one, however,) by which the elements become, in a sense, the body and blood of Christ—remaining no longer mere bread and wine. What enlightened Protestant does not believe that? Surely we do not deny the real presence, in the true sense. But, the Greek words μεταβολή, μεταρρύθμισις, μετασκευασμός, μεταστοιχείωσις, μεταποίησις, corresponding with the Latin mutatio, transitio, migratio, transelementatio, transfiguratio, &c., (terms often used by ancient writers,) imply no change whatever of the substance of the elements; and have no analogy to transubstantiation.

* Dr. Cave traces the barbarous vocable to the inventive genius of Peter de Blois, a Frenchman of the twelfth century, who was invited to England by Henry II., and became successively Archdeacon of Bath and of London. He flourished about the year 1160, and died in 1200. (See Cave's Historia Literaria, Tom. ii. p. 234.) But, certainly the Dr. is mistaken.

THE BELIEVER'S CONFIDENCE.—The earth may shake, the pillars of the world may tremble under us, the countenance of heaven may be appalled, the sun may lose his light, the moon her beauty, and the stars their glory; but concerning the man that trusteth in God, he knows in whom he has believed; he is not ignorant whose precious blood hath been shed for him; he hath a Shepherd full of kindness, full of care and full of power.

The Banner of the Cross.

GOSPEL TRUTH, AND PRIMITIVE ECCLESIASTICAL ORDER.

SATURDAY, JULY 21, 1849.

The leading editorial of last week was one of a series, which it had been intended to present in regular succession; but being since favoured with the following, from the absent editor himself, his locum tenens is obliged to make room for it by laying aside his own articles, which can patiently "bide the time" for their appearance.

Dr. Oden

THE CALENDAR AND THE SEMINARY.

We had every disposition to deal kindly with the Reverend gentleman who has made himself somewhat conspicuous by his articles in the Calendar, and whose late course in the Board of Trustees of the General Theological Seminary was generally thought to be little creditable to one disposed to pursue a straightforward and open path to the truth.

With singular pertinacity, not perhaps singular in one who is in the wrong, he is determined to force upon us the unpleasant task of referring to a matter which we think the reflection of after years will make sufficiently mortifying. We will confine our remarks very briefly to the points requiring notice. There are three subjects of complaint urged in the Calendar. First, that a "thorough investigation" on the points designated by the Calendar, in relation to the Seminary, did not take place. Secondly, that the Committee on final examination exceeded their powers, and that their report was considered a satisfactory investigation. And last, but not least, that Mr. A. C. Coxe's course and remarks in the Board have been misrepresented in the Churchman and the Banner.

I. As to the first point, we need say little. In the Calendar of the week before the meeting of the Board, there was a long list of points which the Board were directed to investigate. It seemed to be chiefly those points about which the Calendar has made assertions for which it could not give proofs. The task of supplying it with needful proofs it committed to the Board. This body unanimously rejected the appointment of the Calendar!

Further, we beg leave to ask this complainant, upon whom devolved the duty of demanding this investigation? Certainly not upon those who had no confidence in the rash assertions of the Calendar, and only regarded them as empty sounds. It devolved upon those, if any such there were, who believed in the declarations of the Calendar. And if none else could be found, the duty devolved most plainly upon the writer of these articles, who was present at the meeting. We vainly hoped that this gentleman would come furnished with those proofs, he has so industriously concealed hitherto. But all this gentleman did in the case, was to make an abortive effort to destroy the just influence of the Report of the Committee on the Final Examination. Be it remembered, that this examination was the last opportunity the large and respectable Senior Class had of showing their soundness in the faith, while attached to the Seminary. After this effort, Mr. Coxe was no more seen in the Board, though we heard his absence accounted for by the statement that he had been threatened with Cholera. Now, what right, after thus acting, has he to cast censure upon the Board for not entering into an investigation? Why did he not bring it forward? There were five bishops in the Board, most of them unsuspected of any leaning to Romanism. Does Mr. C. take upon himself the censure of these Right Rev. Fathers for not obeying the Calendar? We rejoice to say the Board was better employed. And there has not been a meeting, for years, at which so much has been done.

II. The second point of complaint is, that the Committee of the Final Examination exceeded their powers, and that their report was considered a satisfactory investigation. On this point we join issue with the Calendar, and appeal to the good sense of the Church. Is a Church Theological Seminary to be regarded in the light of an ordinary school—are its instructions perfectly analogous? Are the teachings and examinations of those who are preparing to teach others fixed and definite truths, the same as the teachings and examinations of those who are studying classics and mathematics? Does the Church bid the professors of her General Theological Seminary merely cram her candidates for holy orders with the substance of text books in Theology, and when questioned upon a Saviour's Divinity and Incarnation, and upon all the great and mighty truths which they are to teach to others, merely answer "we express no opinion on these subjects," but Magee, and Pearson, and Burnett, and Mosheim say so and so?" This might do with those sects which are ruled by individual authority, and follow Calvin, Luther, or Wesley, but it will not do in a Church, whose teachings are fixed, and who expects her Candidates for Holy Orders to be taught the opinions which can stand the test of that Catholic rule—"semper, ubique, ab omnibus." But Mr. Coxe has placed himself in a dilemma. If, as he asserts, the teachings of the Seminary are purely academic, and have nothing to do with opinions, how could he say that the Romanizing, which was infecting the neighborhood of the Seminary, had such injurious effect upon the teachings of its learned Professors? Romanizing has to do with opinions; it is not at all academic. Now if the Professors have no right to interfere with the opinions of their Pupils, they have nothing to do with Romanizing, either in the neighborhood of the Seminary, or in the Seminary itself. All they have to do, according to Mr. Coxe, is to stuff the students faithfully with orthodox text Books; "their Bishops or the Presbyters canonically appointed" must look to their opinions! If this be so, what on earth has all this fuss been about?

III. On the third point, the Calendar, after a long article on the misrepresentations in the Churchman of Mr. Coxe's remarks and resolutions, thus speaks,

"The 'Banner of the Cross,' though with less of apparent injustice, sails duly in the wake of the Churchman, and claims the Report of the Committee as a complete verdict, and a legitimate one, suppressing entirely the important admission of Prof. Haight. We shall settle with the Banner, in a future article."

As our account of these proceedings was written in the solitude of a sick room, and without consultation with any one, we think the agreement of the Churchman and Banner is strong presumptive evidence of truth. We have a vivid and distinct recollection of the matter, and so far as we gave the history, we stand by its correctness. We did not attempt to give the debate. If the Calendar is so sensitive in relation to Mr. Coxe, why did it not report others fairly? It misrepresents Dr. Jarvis's remarks, and we think, Bishop Whittingham's and Dr. Haight's. But let the following pass as a specimen of its fairness.

"The Rev. F. Ogilby denied that an examination could be purely academic: in which he was followed by a lay-trustee, we believe Mr. Wharton, of Pennsylvania."

We stated no such absurd abstraction—but for the reasons above assigned, "denied that an examination," in an Institution wherein men were trained by the Church for the solemn office of the ministry "could be purely academic." We wonder that the Reporter could be in any doubt as to the name of the Lay Trustee who followed, and who is known so widely for his acuteness and discrimination, and we should think Mr. C. would have a vivid remembrance of remarks he was too wise to attempt to answer, though Mr. Wharton called upon him "to define what he meant by a purely academic examination." He also asked whether if a Theological Seminary were designed to teach opinions, an academic examination in such an Institution did not necessarily include the opinions formed by the students? Having listened with deepest attention to every word spoken by Dr. Jarvis, we cannot think the following, from the Calendar, truly represents what he did say.

"He (Dr. Jarvis) had made the report in the form presented, at the suggestion of others of more experience, and with no idea of transcending his powers, of which perhaps he was ignorant."

If it does, it presents the diffidence of ripe learning and sound wisdom, in refreshing contrast with the confidence begotten of inferior knowledge, and less mature age. The Church at large will not allow her confidence in one who has grown gray in her service, and whose learning is an honor to her ministry, to be so easily shaken.

In conclusion, we only hope the Calendar will make a final settlement with the Banner in that "future article." We are ready to give a receipt in full, at any time, and so end this unprofitable business.

LADY ALICE; OR, THE NEW UNA.

We are induced to give a more extended notice to this work than we usually bestow upon such publications, for several reasons. In the first place, this "Novel" would perhaps be classed by its author and some readers under the denomination of "Religious." Again, it pretends to represent the opinions, views and practices of a class or party in the Church. In the third place, we doubt not that this "Novel" will have a wide circulation. It displays in many parts no mean ability, and is evidently the product of a powerful, thoughtful, but ill-regulated mind. As the author is not confined by the usual laws of probability, or restrained even by the still wider range of possibility in weaving this strange web of fiction, he is enabled to place his actors in most dramatic positions, and to rouse his reader's excited fears by carrying his characters along the dizzy verge of tragedy, only letting a few of the most worthless and least interesting drop into the dark abyss. In fact, this work might be characterized by a single word, EXAGGERATION. Its plot is the exaggeration of possibility. Its characters are exaggerations of mental, moral, and physical beauty and strength. Lady Alice will make romantic youths sigh, from the profoundest depths of their shallow hearts, and wish that earth only contained a belle so worthy of their adoration. One cannot help saying, after reading such works as these, where on earth do such people hide themselves? I never met the like. And some, perhaps, in discontent will ask, why could not Providence have been as lavish of His gifts as these fictitious creators? But the feature we most complain of in this work, is its exaggeration of the practices and views of a large class in the Church. There are many who divide the members of the Church into two classes. The nick-names for these used to be "High Church" and "Low Church," now it is "Puseyite" and "Evangelical." These names are applied, with more confidence, to writings than to persons. A certain class of fictitious writings have especially obtained the name of "Puseyite Novels." Some to which this name has been given, set forth and enforce such just principles that they must secure the approval of all sound Churchmen. Now, this work called "Lady Alice," evidently seeks ostentatiously to be ranked among this class of "Novels." And by its exaggeration of the practices and views of the class of Churchmen it pretends to represent, it will unjustly expose them to the reproach which deservedly falls upon its pseudo-Catholic fictions.

There may be a few in the Church, but thank God they are very few, who would call our holy service, as solemnly performed, "a mutilated rite," (vol. i. page 109.) There may be some who think it right to cross themselves, to show the pride of their private judgment, and who think lights upon the Altar, or even a crucifix needful to assure their gross perceptions of the presence of the "Immortal and Invisible"—there may be some who would proclaim their own shame and folly in words like these, (vol. ii. p. 203:) "We have a sad spectacle of dismantled altars, of lights extinguished or banished; the perpetual symbol of the Divine Presence unknown; the Shekinah withdrawn, which should overshadow our thrones of mercy." But thank God, the number of such religious sensualists, who would walk only by sight, is very, very small. And it will gradually diminish as the hope of infecting others with their folly decreases, until in their desperation these blinded ones will forsake the altars on which the true light shineth, to bow before the altars whose gold and tinsel glitter in the beams of those lights which men's hands have kindled.

There are three points in this work which especially claim our notice,—the plot, the morals, directly or indirectly inculcated, the religious practices and doctrines enforced by precept and example. And first, as to the plot or plan of the story. We have characterized this as an exaggeration; we would go further, and say that it is not merely a work of fiction, but rather a work of falsehood. We deny the right of any Christian mind, which recognizes the ordinances of God's eternal Providence in the circumstances and events of life, to compose a history which shall contradict all reality. And surely such is the fact in this case. Who ever heard of such "a remarkable coincidence" as the first meeting of the hero and heroine? A young gentleman goes to bathe in one of the retired recesses of the bay of Salerno. While he is in the act of preparing for his bath, he hears a faint scream, he looks over the water, and at length spies something white rising to the surface: he rushes out, and brings in his arms a beautiful damsel of fifteen, who had been left to bathe alone, by her protectors, in a neighboring recess, and was so frightened by finding herself in such close proximity to an unknown gentleman, that she began to drown! This gentleman is, of course, possessed of great presence of mind, and he proceeds to restore the half-drowned young lady in the most judicious and approved manner. One of the restoratives is a fraternal kiss upon her marble cheek! Well, the young lady gets back to her own recess, and after declining his assistance at her toilet, though she was very feeble, they exchange names, and her guardians come and take her away. This young lady turns out to be "the Lady Alice," the daughter of the Duke of Lennox, the greatest fortune and greatest beauty in Europe. One thing remarkable in this book, is the lavish manner in which it ennobles (i. e. with titles) and enriches all its characters. It is very delightful for common readers to get into such close contact with Dukes and Duchesses, Lords and Ladies, Princesses and Barons! Nay, we are admitted to the very presence of royalty itself, and all this (so says rumor) by an American! After various striking casualties, the hero and heroine are brought together at a ball given by her father. Our author describes, with minute particularity, all the splendor of the scene, and seems to dwell with peculiar delight upon its pomp and circumstance. After this, the lady invites the hero to visit the chapel, and, on the way, she gives him an opportunity of making a declaration, which he does accordingly. She refuses him on the ground that he is a Roman Catholic, she belonging to the Church of England. After taking him, however, to the chapel, in whose description it is said "the altar was dressed as in Catholic chapels on the Continent," he again very naturally presses his suit, as the Roman Catholic felt quite at home in such a chapel. She again refuses him, on the same grounds, not so much on her own account as on account of the difficulties she foresaw in the education of their expected children! So, of course, he must be converted. Accordingly he has an interview with the uncle of Lady Alice, the Rev. Herbert Courtenay, the model Priest of the book. Judging by the chapel, &c., it did not require much of a change, and so after hearing Mr. Courtenay, and examining the authorities, he writes that gentleman a letter, in which he declares himself a convert on grounds which seem to us to admit that the Romanists are right in Italy, &c., while in England they are schismatics. God save the Church, we say, from such converts. Of course all difficulties are removed, and we might have reasonably hoped that the wedding would now end the "Novel." But the author seems to have had some misgivings, that questions might be raised about the sincerity of motives and the reality of a conversion under such circumstances; accordingly when all is fixed, the lady is stolen away in the very presence of her lover, and carried to sea. The vessel is wrecked, and the abductor only saves her life on her swearing upon a crucifix not to reveal herself except at his will. He accordingly turns "the Lady Alice" into a young gentleman. We next meet her under the name of Mr. Fitzalan, a distinguished painter in Rome, quite a dandy and a bon vivant, and a great favorite with her new sex. In obedience to her promise, as a matter of conscience, she keeps her family and her lover in misery, deceives them and the world, and approves herself a most excellent actor. Her lover comes and takes rooms adjoining those occupied by Mr. Fitzalan, and lives in constant familiarity without recognizing her. He approves himself all the while a true convert, and at last is taken sick, just when he discovers "the Lady Alice," and expecting to die receives the last rites from the English chaplain. After this there is nothing in the way of the wedding, and after a description of the chapel, and the nuptial rites, such as we never have and never wish to witness in the Holy Catholic Church, the "Novel" closes with a voluptuous description of the bridal chamber, which would fit very well in a novel by Eugene Sue.

We have been more particular in giving an outline of the plan of this story, to show our readers that it does not deserve to be classed among novels called "religious." Indeed, there is in many parts a sensuality about it, an intermingling of earthy with heavenly things, which speaks badly for the religious system it would uphold. Its religion is perfectly consistent with the greatest devotion to the world and worldly things. None of its devotees seem to have renounced "the pomps and vanities of this wicked world."

The moral tone of the book is very loose, too much so even for worldly propriety. The lady who figures next to Lady Alice, and whose history forms an episode in the story, illustrates this melancholy fact. We would be sorry to offend the delicacy of our readers by giving the proofs of this assertion in the author's own language. And yet this woman, who had offended against God and man, is put forward as one of the most prominent and prosperous characters in the Novel!

As to the religious character of the book, it reminds us very much of the member of Congress who used to eat profusely of all kinds of delicacies, and then finish with an inch square of dyspepsia bread. While worldliness, pomp, vanity, frivolity and mere devotion to worldly things, with occasional licentiousness abound, we have the "inch square" of religion to modify the whole! The author throws into his incongruous compound crosses and crucifixes, and altars richly adorned, and golden candlesticks, and even holy water, and seems satisfied that these will give religious character to the whole! In proof that we are not too severe, we only quote one passage from page 58, vol. i. He is eulogizing dancing, which he says "is really as essential in its time and place as prayer (not for all alike, but) to maintain, as a general thing, the healthy tone and cheerful decency of social intercourse." In conclusion, we say that this book as little represents the principle and truth of religion, and "the beauty of holiness" to the world at large, as it sets forth the principles and views of any set or party in the Church. It stands by itself, and so let it be judged. It is the work of a single fancy, misgoverned by an ill-directed private judgment, and let its unknown author alone bear the burden of its follies and its misrepresentations. — Rev. Jas. G. Gilly.

BISHOP HOBART'S VIEWS.

We continue this week the full and candid statement, from his own pen, of the true views of this distinguished prelate; who may be considered one of the very best exponents of High Church principles, which, however reviled when he first began so manfully to advocate and assert them, he lived to see become the objects to which many who once opposed them consecrated their talents, their labours, and their lives. The following copious extracts are from the Bishop's second charge, entitled The Corruptions of the Church of Rome, contrasted with certain Protestant errors; which was delivered to his Clergy, at the opening of the Convention of the diocese of New York, October, 1817; and subsequently to the Clergy of Connecticut (of which diocese he had then provisional charge,) June, 1818.

The errors which I shall enumerate are the result of that tendency of our nature, the philosophy of which it would be foreign to the occasion to point out, by which, on all subjects, and particularly on those of religion, men are carried into extremes. The history of religion proves, that, frequently from a lukewarmness which chilled every devout feeling, have been kindled those fires of enthusiasm which consumed almost all that was reasonable and valuable in religion; and from the almost innumerable extremes in which the various shapes of religious error are to be found, men suddenly and rapidly rushed to their opposites. * * * *

But, mark the imperfection of the human mind. The throne of infallibility, from which one oracle was displaced, was usurped by another; and private judgment, renouncing all that the wisdom of ages had sanctioned, all regard to the voice of the Church Catholic, not in the restricted sense in which the Church of Rome claims that title, but in its extension, semper, ubique, apud omnes—always, every where, among all, claimed for itself almost all the prerogatives of Papal infallibility. Hence we have seen, and continue to see, any number of Christians who choose to associate together, and even any individual Christian claiming the right to interpret the Word of God, and to deduce from it the unerring articles of doctrine, without any regard to the faith of the universal Church, which constitutes the best exposition of the sacred volume. God forbid, my brethren, that I should say aught against the right of private judgment in matters of religion, when properly exercised. . . . But there is a wide difference between the unlimited and the restricted right of private judgment; between each individual forming his code of religious doctrine, without employing as lights amidst the innumerable and jarring opinions that perplex his researches, the faith of the universal Church, as far as he can ascertain it; and the same individual, while he claims the right, which no intelligent creature can surrender, of judging for himself, seeking with humility and with deference, that guidance which is to be found in the faith of the Church universal. He may, indeed, fail in his efforts; he must depend frequently on the learning and the information of others; and liability to error is inseparable from our present fallen state. But there is much less danger of error, when he follows the light, as far as it is disclosed to him, which has shone on the Church universal, than when he proudly violates that order of Providence by which, in the present world, the less informed must, in some measure, depend on those more enlightened; and takes for his guide in matters of religion, his own judgment, taste, and fancy; disregarding entirely the faith of the great body of Christians in all places and at all times.

It is on this sound principle of human nature, as well as on those declarations of Scripture, which pronounce the Church to be "the pillar and ground of the truth,"* and which commands us to "hear the Church,"† that our Church declares in her Articles, that "the Church is a witness and keeper of holy writ," and has "authority in controversies of faith."‡ And by the Church she means, "a congregation of faithful men, in which the pure word of God is preached, and the sacraments duly administered according to Christ's ordinances."§ Those are authorized, as she declares, to minister the sacraments, "who are chosen and sent by men who have public authority given to them for this purpose."|| And we can be in no doubt whom she considers as having this public authority to call and send to the ministry, when we hear her declaring that Bishops, to whom she assigns this power as distinct from Presbyters and Deacons, "have been from the Apostles' times," and "instituted by God's providence, and by His holy Spirit."¶

Great, then, my brethren of the clergy, is the responsibility which rests upon us. . . . If we fail diligently to search for the old paths, and continue therein, through that indolence which declines research—that timidity which withholds truth, because it may be odious—or that love of popularity which would rather bow to some modern idol which the multitude hath set up, than worship the God of our fathers in the faith and unity which distinguished the primitive ages of Christianity, but an attachment to which modern liberality may style bigotry and uncharitableness; we shall be answerable for the heresies and schisms which deform and distract the fold of the Redeemer, and for the guilt of those who, misled by us, err from the faith, and depart from the unity of Christ's body.

Connected with this extreme to which the exercise of private judgment is carried in matters of religion, and arising indeed from it, is, the little regard which is paid to the Church as a divinely constituted society. There was a period, when the authority of the Church was carried to an extreme, incompatible with the rights of conscience, and even with personal safety—when her Clergy, lording it over God's heritage, demanded implicit obedience to all their impositions; and forgetting that the kingdom of their Master was not of this world, employed to enforce their decrees the sanguinary weapons of secular power; thus deforming, by this unhallowed junction of the world and the Church, the spirituality of that holy society which its divine Head armed with no prerogatives but such as appeal to the understanding, the conscience, and the heart.

But in renouncing these despotic claims, is there not a contrary extreme, which appears in no small degree to characterize the mass of Protestant Christians? They seldom bring into view the divine institution of the Christian Church, and the divine origin of its powers. In their language, and in their practice, they reduce this sacred institution, which founded by a divine hand, is animated and governed by Him to whom "all power is given in heaven and on earth," to a level with those associations which have no higher origin than human power, and no other object but human policy. Hence the duty of submission to its authoritative acts is made to rest, not on its claims to a divine origin, but on the motives of mere expediency; and hence, the exercise of its discipline is not regarded as a duty demanded by the authority of its divine Head, and the purity of its sacred character, but as dictated merely by those considerations of policy which influence secular associations, and as left entirely to human discretion. Its discipline is thus relaxed; or, when exercised agreeably to established provisions, is secretly assailed, or openly opposed and disregarded. And the divine declaration, "Whatsoever ye shall bind on earth, shall be bound in heaven; and whatsoever ye shall loose on earth, shall be loosed in heaven;"* which certainly, in the exercise of all the discipline necessary to her order, purity, and peace, assures to the Church the protection and support of the Most High; is no more regarded than if it had proceeded from a frail mortal, and not from the lips of Him who is Ruler of the inhabitants of earth, and Lord of the armies of heaven.

There are also erroneous opinions prevalent with respect to the constitution of the Christian ministry, arising from the tendency to extremes which we are illustrating. The Church from which Protestants separated, claims for its visible Head, prerogatives as unfounded in Scripture as they are dangerous in the exercise. Our Lord rewarded the noble confession of St. Peter—"Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God"—by the distinguishing declaration to him—"On this rock I will build my Church—and unto thee will I give the keys of the kingdom of heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth, shall be bound in heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth, shall be loosed in heaven."† But without entering into the discussion, whether the rock meant was the confession or the personal authority of St. Peter—what evidence is there that the Church was not established on the other Apostles, and that the power of the keys, or of remission of sins in the administration of the sacraments and ordinances, and of discipline, was not conferred on them? Are we not told that the Church is founded on all the Apostles?‡ Were not all the Apostles, equally with St. Peter, and with no marks of distinction, commissioned to establish the Church, constituted its governors, vested with all its spiritual powers, and commanded to provide for the continued exercise of those powers in the persons of their successors "always, even unto the end of the world"?§ And are we not struck with the remarkable fact, so subversive of the alleged supremacy of St. Peter, that in the first council that settled the disputes of the infant Church, St. James, Bishop of Jerusalem, even in the presence of St. Peter, enjoyed that precedence, and exercised that power, which are claimed as of divine origin for him?||

Happy would it be, if in opposing the usurped prerogatives of the Bishop of Rome, and in renouncing the corruptions of the Papal hierarchy, there was no evidence of the tendency of human nature to go into extremes. The odium that justly marks the various usurpations of the Roman Church, seems transferred even to those institutions which it possesses in common with the primitive Church, and which are warranted by Scripture, or to which no objection can be found in the dictates of reason. Hence, Episcopal power, equally with Papal, is considered as an anti-Christian usurpation. But if in all points truth be found in the opposite extreme to the Papacy, and if every doctrine and institution hath received an indelible stain in passing through a Papal channel, how does it happen that those who appear to act upon this principle retain any doctrine or institution which is taught or practised by this anti-Christian Church? Is the divinity of the Saviour to be rejected, because, in the midst of her darkest corruptions, this truth shone conspicuously as an ark of the faith of the Church of Rome? . . . Does the Bible cease to be the charter of salvation, because its sacred books must be traced through the Roman Church to the age of inspiration? And does Episcopacy lose its claims to a divine origin, because on its simple and apostolic foundation has been reared the gorgeous and unhallowed structure of the Papal hierarchy? If one extreme opposes its opposite—if the abuse of an institution renders necessary the rejection of it—if usurped prerogative justifies resistance to legitimate power;—what is there in religion—what is there in civil polity—what is there in the departments of science—what is there in social life—that would remain sacred? * * * *

My brethren, our Church holds a most important station in the Christian world; and we, its ministers, in faithfully supporting her in this station, have most important duties to discharge. Amidst the various forms which modern innovators have given to the Christian ministry; some relinquishing entirely its divine origin; others confounding its distinct orders, and altering their original powers; some denying the transmission of its commission from the Head of the Church; others changing the channel of conveyance; and all seeming to think it an honour to retreat as far as possible from the unhallowed precincts of the Papacy;—our Church, temperate, judicious, firm, unawed by Papal threats, unmoved by what she considers the unjust reproaches of some of her Protestant kindred,—takes her stand where Apostles and Martyrs stood; and in her Apostolic Episcopacy, cleared of Papal usurpations, shines forth to the wandering members of the Christian family, as that city “set on an hill,” where they may find repose from the tumults of schism, and communion with their Redeemer, in those ministrations and ordinances which He has established as the channels of His grace, and the pledges of His love. What if her claims, avowed in the spirit of unfeigned charity, and supported by temperate argument, be frowned on by that liberal spirit, the characteristic of the present age, which illustrating the tendency of human nature to go into extremes, seems to think it impossible to recede too far from that intolerant and persecuting bigotry, the disgrace of the ages that are past; and which, if unchecked, would soon become, in its turn, intolerant, and denounce and persecute those who presume to think that all doctrine in religion, and all institutions, are not equally sound and good, and equally acceptable to God? Weak, indeed, my brethren, must be our attachment to our Church, and our sense of obligation to her—indifferent must we be to the vows which we made when we received her ministry, and insensible to the promises of succour and support from that Master whose commission we sustain, and whose cause we advocate—and little must we have of that undaunted spirit, which, in the first professors of the faith, excites our homage, if, awed by popular reproaches, or seduced by popular applause, we should fail in the high and honourable duty of bearing the Christian ark which we have received from an illustrious line of Apostles, Martyrs, and Saints, through difficulties and trials, far inferior to those which they encountered in transmitting it, in its original purity and beauty, an invaluable legacy to us.

In connexion with this prevalent disregard to the divinely constituted ministry of Christ's Church, which arises from a disposition to recede as far as possible from the Church of Rome, appears another error, which has its origin in the same cause, an indifference to the external unity of Christ's mystical body. The Papal opinion of Church unity, that it consists in communion with the Church of Rome, as the visible head of the Catholic Church, has so little foundation in Scripture and in primitive practice, that it could not stand the test of that spirit of free inquiry which the Reformation excited. But many bodies of reformed Christians, who renounced the corruptions and usurpations of the Church of Rome, were not so happy as to carry with them that primitive Episcopacy which subsisted in the Church from which they separated, and which others of their brethren laid at the foundation of the external order of their churches. Such is the natural course of the human mind, through the gradations of error, that a departure from Episcopacy, the Scriptural and primitive principle of Church unity, at first exercised on the plea of necessity, became afterwards wholly justified on the ground of right. The assumption of the Episcopal powers of ordination by Presbyters led to the usurpation of the powers both of Bishops and Presbyters by laymen. The separation of Episcopal Protestants from a Church which imposed sinful terms of communion, has been unwarrantably pleaded in evidence of the right of individual ministers and individual Christians to establish communions as their judgment may dictate, wholly regardless of that primitive bond of Church unity, the ministry of Bishops. Thus we see the Protestant world divided into sects, the numbers or the tenets of which it is almost impossible to enumerate. And as the climax of this scale of error, we now hear the sentiments advanced and defended, on almost all occasions, in the writings of able divines, and in the language of Christian associations, which bid fair to obtain an unprecedented popularity, that all differences among Christians, except as to fundamental points of doctrine, are non-essential; and that separate communions without number, unless there is unsoundness in the faith, do not violate Church unity. But the unity of the Church is an obvious and fundamental doctrine of Scripture; and visible unity is entirely incompatible with distinct communions. Hence, the tenet of an invisible Church, of which all are covenanted members who exercise faith, threatens to subvert the doctrine, professed in the ancient creeds, of a visible Church, “one, Catholic, and Apostolic.” * * *

My brethren, in opposing, under great, and, perhaps, if we may judge from the spirit of the age, increasing odium, those prevalent errors, which, if I know my own heart, a profound sense of duty alone has induced me to endeavour to expose and refute; and in maintaining and enforcing correct views of the constitution of the Christian Church, and of the principles of Church unity;—we must be consoled and supported by the consideration that we are maintaining the principles of the saints of the primitive ages, and for which, sooner than relinquish them, they would have shed their blood. What though it may be said, that these principles would limit the communion of the Church to a small portion of professing Christians, and place in a state of schism a large number of the Christian family? If these principles be true, their obligation cannot be weakened, nor their importance diminished, by the number, the piety, or the zeal of their opponents. The general prevalence of error hitherto permitted by the counsels of an inscrutable Providence, is a trial of our faith, but ought not to weaken or subvert it. Was not the revelation of God's will confined from the beginning to a small number of the human race, in the plains of Shinar, and in the fields of Jordan? Are not large portions of the globe still under the dominion of the prince and the powers of darkness? It is not for man to arraign the dominion of the Most High. For purposes wise and good, but inscrutable by us, did He not permit heresies early to stain the purity of the faith? Was there not a period when the divinity of His blessed Son was doubted and denied by a large portion of the Christian world; and when a venerable defender of this fundamental truth was hunted by his persecutors throughout the earth? Did not the dark cloud of Papal superstition for ages disfigure and conceal the primitive splendour of the Christian Zion? And need we wonder, then, that for purposes equally wise and good, but equally inscrutable, the Sovereign of the universe still permits heresies to corrupt, and schisms to distract the Christian family? He will finally do right. He searches and mercifully judges the purposes of the heart; and, assuredly, honest purity of intention, and zealous endeavour to know and to do His will, will not fail of a reward from Him who is no respecter of persons, but is the equal and kind Parent of all the human race. Still, charity, though it should always soften the rigid features of truth, cannot change her divine character, nor dispense with her sacred obligations.

THE LUTHERAN REFORMATION.—The following is from the Lutheran Standard of the 4th inst. We shall leave our Methodist and Lutheran friends to settle it in their own way.

We invite the attention of our readers to the extract below from an address of the Rev. Dr. Durbin, at the Anniversary of the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church. It is taken from the Christian Advocate and Journal, and as the speech reported in that paper has been corrected by the Dr., we infer that the report is a faithful exhibit of the remarks then made:

“Dr. Durbin was then called to address the congregation. After a few pleasant and highly appropriate remarks introductory, he proceeded to state three propositions, which he illustrated and enforced. He stated that the missionary cause exhibited three periods, each possessing a distinctive character, and marked by striking peculiarities.

“The first period was distinguished by a reformation in external forms. What he intended to say was neither to be considered as eulogistic or derogatory in reference to Martin Luther. The reformation, of which he was the leader, was glorious indeed, but it is not the life of religion—the inner life of the soul, regenerating and spreading its vitalizing power. It was but the revival of a form, such as is essential to Christianity, but not of a power,” &c.!! The spiritual exercises, the martyr faith and fervor of the Reformation, not “the life of religion;” the struggles, conflicts and imprisonments, the wasting away and living deaths of that period for “a form,” and not “the power” of Christianity! A more unhistorical and absurd supposition could not be made. The Reformation, with its central truth, justification by faith, not “the life of religion—the inner life of the soul, regenerating and spreading its vitalizing power”!! Though Dr. Durbin may not be able to appreciate the Reformation, has he forgotten the fountain to which the Wesleys retired when weary and heavy laden with sin, and from which they drew living waters? If so, the words of these eminent men shall refresh his memory, and refute his assertions.

We need not waste time in the refutation of such puerilities. It would be difficult to decide, whether profound ignorance of the Reformation or prejudice are most conspicuous in statements such as these: “the reformation of which he was the leader, was glorious indeed, but it was not the life of religion,” &c.; “It was but the revival of a form, such as is essential to Christianity, but not of a power,” &c.!! The spiritual exercises, the martyr faith and fervor of the Reformation, not “the life of religion;” the struggles, conflicts and imprisonments, the wasting away and living deaths of that period for “a form,” and not “the power” of Christianity! A more unhistorical and absurd supposition could not be made. The Reformation, with its central truth, justification by faith, not “the life of religion—the inner life of the soul, regenerating and spreading its vitalizing power”!! Though Dr. Durbin may not be able to appreciate the Reformation, has he forgotten the fountain to which the Wesleys retired when weary and heavy laden with sin, and from which they drew living waters? If so, the words of these eminent men shall refresh his memory, and refute his assertions.

BISHOP ELECT OF INDIANA.—We are happy to state that the Rev. Dr. Upfold has transmitted to the Secretary of the Standing Committee of Indiana his acceptance of the Episcopate, which has been tendered to him with such gratifying unanimity; and to add, that our own diocese, at the same time, will not be deprived of this distinguished presbyter, at least for the present. The Vestry of Trinity church, Pittsburg, with cordial expressions of affectionate regard, have unanimously responded in the affirmative to his proposition to retain the Rectorship, with the employment of an assistant minister, and leave of absence at such times and for such periods as his Episcopal duties may require. With the numerous facilities of intercommunication by steam-boats and rail-roads throughout the West, which are daily multiplying in every direction, almost any part of Indiana can be reached from that city in from four to six days; and Indianapolis, the capital, (whence several rail-roads branch off in different directions,) in three days and a half.

Indiana presents a most interesting and promising field of labour to a faithful and zealous Bishop, and we feel assured that such a one will be found in Dr. Upfold. It is now the fourth state of our Union, with a population of one million; yet our Church has, in all, less than seven hundred communicants; or only seven out of every ten thousand souls! We are sanguine that, under God's blessing, a far better state of things will now be speedily brought about in this rich harvest, which seems to await only the vigorous arm of the spiritual husbandman to enter it and reap.

We continue to receive assurances, from various quarters, of the great unanimity of the Convention of Indiana in the recent election; and of the cordiality with which the whole diocese, both clergy and laity, will welcome among them their new spiritual head. We stated in our last, their desire that the consecration should take place in Madison; but the Bishop elect has naturally expressed the wish that it should be in his own parish church. Due notice will be given of the time and place.

The Oxford University Herald mentions a rumor that the wife of one who was a member of Sir Robert Peel's cabinet, has become a convert to the Romish faith. She is the daughter of a Scottish nobleman; and the conversion is the more remarkable, as having arisen, not from Anglicanism, but from Presbyterianism.

THE BRITISH COLONIES.—The vast colonial empire which the remarkable providence of God has given to our mother country, is unparalleled in the history of all nations. These colonies have all been acquired since the Reformation, during the period from the reign of Elizabeth to the present day. They embrace possessions in Europe, Asia, Africa, and America, with a population of above 150,000,000 subjects; while in Australia and New Zealand new empires are fast rising up under the sway of the British crown. No other kingdom, ancient or modern, has ever had such a dominion influencing every part of the world. The four chief empires that formerly prevailed on the earth—the Chaldean, Persian, Grecian, and Roman—are not to be compared with it.

We rejoice to see that England's noble Church is endeavouring to keep pace with the widely extending dominion of the State. We lately noticed the consecration on Whit-Tuesday last of two Bishops for new colonial sees; the Rev. George Smith D. D., for the diocese of Victoria, Hong Kong, China; and the Rev. David Anderson, D. D., for that of Prince Rupert's Land, North America. Their consecration completes the number of fourteen new sees, erected in the British colonies within the last eight years; all of which are now supplied with zealous and devoted Bishops and clergy.

Prince Rupert's Land, (or the Hudson Bay Company's Territory,) is four times as large as Great Britain and Ireland; and is the largest bishopric in the world, except that of New South Wales. Dr. Anderson's Episcopal visitations will extend from Canada to Oregon, and from Vancouver's Island to Mackenzie's River and Hudson's Bay.

We trust that the useful lesson contained in the following caustic, but richly merited rebuke, which we copy from the Pittsburgh Catholic of the 7th inst., will not be confined to that paper. There are some others who may learn from it how their readiness to give currency to the vile slanders heaped upon one who by his eminent talents and deeds has made himself “a shining mark,” is regarded by their honourable and high-minded readers.

For the Pittsburgh Catholic.

“MR. EDITOR,—Your lucubrations, both in morals and religion, must have been very scant indeed, and I might say, your charity entirely run out, when you admitted an extract into your paper of the 30th ultimo, headed, ‘The Catholic Clergy.’ Your prefatory to it contained a cruel sneer against Bishop Doane, of the Protestant Episcopal Church of New Jersey. But the Catholic Clergy are indeed hard up when compliments from the New York Police Gazette are thought worthy of insertion, in what should be a high-toned religious Journal. Its editor, (N. Y. Police Gazette) as you cannot but know, has been convicted of libel and infamous slander-destroying character, and attempting to ruin the peace of families, by making marriage a by-word among the nations; and yet in the same line with Universalists, Unitarians, and Infidels, you have eagerly swallowed this little titbit of flattery, vain of it perhaps, that you have obtained its good will (Heaven bless the mark!) by odious comparison with other sects! How low must be such a standard! That the ‘Vade Mecum’ of the burglar and debauchee, the biographer of Monroe Edwards, Helen Jewett, and the stewards of a corrupt city, are worthy of copy and quotation!—It is truly pitiable. It is easy, very easy, to start such slander, and who have suffered more than the Clergy of the Catholic Church? You know not how soon the wanton slanderer may attack our own clergy; then “Quid rides? mutato nomine, de te

Fabula narratur.” A CATHOLIC.”

BISHOP FREEMAN.—As we expected, the absurd story about this prelate and Gen. Belknap, which has been going the round of the newspapers, turns out to be all moonshine. A correspondent of The Calendar gives a true version of it, in a letter from the Bishop himself, in which he says, “I do not wish to be thought so litigious, or so wanting in common sense, as to mingle myself up with the affairs of Government, either civil or military.” The reason that he did not, as heretofore, visit the military post at Fort Gibson, was, partly because there were no members of the Church there; but chiefly, because Gen. B. had issued an order restricting the services in the Chapel, not the sermon merely, to one hour. “To the operation of such an order,” he very properly says, “respect for my office, and for the Church whose unworthy minister I am, forbade me to subject myself.”

BISHOP OF ILLINOIS.—A case involving several large tracts of land, including portions of Jubilee College grounds, wherein Mr. Moore, of Quincy, was plaintiff, and Bishop Chase defendant, was decided recently in the U. S. Circuit Court for the District of Illinois. The judgment of the Court was in favour of Bishop Chase.

The British House of Lords have rejected the bill for the removal of the Jewish disabilities, by a majority of twenty-five; and the House of Commons have confirmed the second reading of the bill to render valid marriages with the sisters of deceased wives, by a majority of thirty-four.

AN EDITOR NODDING.—The Banner of the Cross publishes at length, and conspicuously leaded, the article of "Rusticus" in the Gospel Messenger. The main point of that article was untrue.—We corrected it, and the Messenger published our correction. And now after two weeks had elapsed since the correction was published by the Messenger, the Banner comes out with the old mis-statement.

The above is from the Calendar of last week. It is quite in character with many of its late assertions. We were struck with the sensible article of "Rusticus," and upon its first appearance sent it to the printer; and in order to give it as much weight as possible, directed it to be "leaded," not "conspicuously" however. By a mischance, which often befalls articles, it was crowded out for two weeks, and then appeared, not while we were "nodding," but suffering from the painful wakefulness of sickness.

We subjoin "the correction" "published by the Messenger" of June 29th. We ask our readers to decide, if the one who would call this a "correction" is not the "Editor nodding."

From the Gospel Messenger of June 29th.

The Calendar comes to us very irregularly of late. We have not yet seen its numbers of 9th and 16th inst. In that paper however of the 23d, in reply to a remark of our correspondent "Rusticus," expressing the opinion that the late movement in regard to Romanizing, was made without the knowledge of the Bishop of Connecticut, the Editor says:

"Rusticus is thoroughly mistaken. The Bishop of Connecticut neither felt nor expressed either surprise or regret at the appearance of the first article on 'Romanizing,' and has cordially approved and sustains every subsequent step in the matter, as needful for the purity and well-being of the Church."

"Rusticus" says, "I will venture to assert, (and if I am mistaken it is due to them that the assertion be contradicted,) that their own diocesan, although living in the same city in which the Calendar is printed, had no knowledge whatever of the intended movement, until he saw the first article on that subject in that paper; and that no man in the Church was more surprised or troubled by the appearance of that article than the Bishop of Connecticut."

We have put in italics "the main point" in this sentence, and which is unnoticed by the Calendar in its "correction." The assertion that the Bishop had no previous "knowledge of the intended movement," is corrected by saying that he "neither felt nor expressed surprise or regret at the appearance," &c. Surely the editor who calls this a correction, must himself be very near the borders of "Dream-Land." Equally so must he be who calls this "the main point" in the article of "Rusticus." So subordinate did we esteem it, that we would have thought just as much of the article of "Rusticus" if it had been omitted.

It may amuse some of our readers to know that in the same week when the Calendar says we were "nodding," the "Protestant Churchman" has an article on the Banner, headed "WAKING-UP." As these opposing authorities are about of equal weight, we flatter ourselves they leave us just where they found us.

FOREIGN MISSIONARY BISHOPS.—The Board of Missions, at its late annual meeting, very properly referred the resignation of Bishop Southgate to the next General Convention, which meets at Cincinnati in October, 1850. The hope was expressed that measures might be taken which would induce the Bishop to withdraw his resignation; but we see not how that hope could be indulged by any one who heard read at the meeting of the Board his most affecting private letter to Bishop Henshaw, in which he exclaimed, "My missionary heart is broken!"

Bishop S., with his family, is probably now on his way to this country, and may be expected to arrive soon. It strikes us as a singular question, what position will he hereafter occupy in the Church at home? Canon VII. of 1844, entitled "Of Foreign Missionary Bishops," sec. 2, enacts that "Any bishop elected and consecrated under this canon to exercise episcopal functions in any place or country which may have been thus designated, shall have no jurisdiction except in the place or country for which he has been elected and consecrated. He shall not be entitled to a seat in the House of Bishops, nor shall he be eligible to the office of diocesan bishop in any organized diocese within the United States."

DEATH OF DAVID B. OGDEN, Esq. As we go to press, we receive the painful intelligence of the decease of this noble man. He expired on Monday of this week, at New York, after a long life of virtue, usefulness, and honour. He was one of the most distinguished members of the New York bar, and had, for forty years, held the highest rank among the jurists of our land. He was a consistent and devout communicant of the Church; for many years, a leading member of her councils general and diocesan: and an active and zealous participant in all schemes for her advancement. Few laymen have given more time to her interests, and labored more diligently for her, than David B. Ogden. He fell before the pestilence which has filled so many of our cities with mourning. We have no time or space to say more, at present.

(Rev. Dr. Drencher)

Died, at Burlington, New Jersey, on the 8th day of July, Mrs. JOHN B. WALLACE.

The ever busy hand of death has been, of late, fearfully active in removing from us the noble and gifted ladies of our country.

Among those who have ceased to adorn and bless with their noble examples the spheres in which they moved, none have shared more largely the respect and love of many hearts than her whose name and virtues are here placed, by the hand of grateful friendship, among the sad records of death.

A Christian lady, in the highest and noblest sense, sharing the lofty intellect of her family, she united in a remarkable degree strength and force of character, with the gentler attributes which refine and dignify her sex. The Church had few more intelligent and well informed advocates, none more consistent or devoted in the illustration of the glorious principles of her high profession. Sympathizing, in feeling and in action, with him whose honored name she bore, a name not to be forgotten in the Church, she sought to carry out those views in the practice of a holy and faithful life. That blessed faith, and those principles of undying energy, sustained her in life's severe afflictions, and gave her that "holy, reasonable, and religious hope," which is our only sure stay in the hour of death,—our only eternal hope in the day of judgment. God give us grace so to live, and so to die!—and life's ills shall never harm us, and fears of death shall have no power to disturb that serenity which is the blessed prelude of eternal Peace.

* * * The above is from the pen of the editor of the Banner. We have also in type a communicated article on the death of this estimable lady, which will appear in our next.

New Publications.

LADY ALICE; OR, THE NEW UNA. A Novel, 2 vols, pp. 418. New York, D. Appleton & Co.; Philadelphia, G. S. Appleton, 164 Chestnut st. 1849.

This anonymous work is said to be a debut "by an American clergyman;" and some of our literary contemporaries speak of it as "an extraordinary book," and one in which "talent of a high order teems in every page." Our own opinion must be reserved until we have read it through. From the cursory glance we have given it, we are satisfied that it contains some very objectionable points, and passages highly offensive to a true Churchman. We strongly suspect the author to be a Papist in disguise.*

(Rev. J. Huntington M.D. a convert to Rome, soon after.)
MANUAL OF ANCIENT GEOGRAPHY AND HISTORY. By Wilhelm Putz, Principal Tutor at the Gymnasium of Duren, Translated from the German. Edited by the Rev. Thos. K. Arnold, Rector of Lyndon, and late Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge. New York, D. Appleton, & Co.; Phila., G. S. Appleton; 12mo. pp. 396.

This is one of a series of valuable Text Books which Messrs. Appleton are offering to teachers and students. It contains a clear and definite outline of the history of the principal nations of antiquity, with a concise geography of each country; and will be found equally adapted to the practical purposes of the class room, and for the guidance of private students.

THE ELEMENTS OF READING AND ORATORY. By the Rev. Henry Mandeville, D. D., Professor of Moral Science and Belles-Lettres in Hamilton College. New York, D. Appleton, & Co.; Phila., G. S. Appleton; 12mo., pp. 350.

Why is it that so important a department of learning as that of reading and speaking, should be so much neglected in our schools, and especially in our Theological schools? In the work before us, the facts and principles of elocution seem to be ably systematized, and we consider it one of value. Prof. Mandeville states that it is "founded on long and patient investigation, and still more on having tested its utility, during the past two years in the institution with which he is professionally connected."

* Since the above was written, we have received a review of this book by the absent editor of the Banner himself, which confirms the truth of this suspicion.

SELECT COMEDIES; translated from the Italian of Goldoni, Giraud and Nola. New York, D. Appleton & Co.; Phila., G. S. Appleton; 12mo., pp. 306.

It is not to be supposed that we can be much interested in the scenes of gaiety and frivolity represented in these pages; but as specimens of Italian theatrical literature, they may not be unacceptable to those who are ignorant of the language in which they are composed.

A TREATISE ON ALGEBRA; for the use of Schools and Colleges. By S. Chase, Professor of Mathematics in Dartmouth College. New York, D. Appleton & Co.; Phila., G. S. Appleton; 12mo., pp. 335.

This treatise is intended to exhibit such a view of the principles of Algebra, as shall best prepare the student for the further pursuit of mathematical studies; and the attainments of Prof. Chase qualify him to do excellent service in the cause of science.

CLASS BOOK OF ZOOLOGY. By Prof. B. Jaeger. New York, D. Appleton & Co.; Phila., G. S. Appleton; 18mo., pp. 179.

The want of such an elementary book as this, has rendered the science of Zoology almost unknown. It is designed to afford to pupils in Common Schools and Academies a knowledge of the Animal Kingdom; and in its preparation, particular pains have been taken to adapt it to the comprehension of beginners. The substitution of English for Latin and Greek terms is an important feature of the work, which will commend it to the favour of all who are unacquainted with those languages.

The Origin and Uses of the Creeds: pp. 26.

How to Use our Bibles: pp. 14.

The Holy Trinity: a Meditation for the Festival: pp. 4.

To all good Churchmen it will be sufficient commendation of these admirable tracts, to say that they are issued under the imprimatur of the Protestant Episcopal Tract Society.

Protestant Quarterly Review. July, 1849. Edited by Rev. J. F. Berg, D. D.

We have no sympathy with this publication. We are as much opposed as it can be to Romanism; but we know, what it does not, how to distinguish between that and Catholicism.

For the Banner of the Cross.

CORNELIUS WAS ACCEPTED BEFORE BAPTISM. BUT HOW?

The question, having two meanings, is susceptible of two answers of corresponding significations. If it be asked, with reference to the consideration on which he was accepted, the tenth chapter of Acts will furnish the answer. "In every nation he that feareth him [God] and worketh righteousness, is accepted with him;" (v. 35.) "There was a certain man in Cesarea, called Cornelius, a centurion of the band called the Italian band, a devout man, and one that feared God with all his house, which gave much alms to the people, and prayed to God always," (vs. 1, 2.) An example of such a man, as Peter spoke of in the thirty-fifth verse, was the very man Cornelius, whom the historian describes in verses first and second. He was one who feared God, and worked righteousness. This was the consideration, on which he was accepted. But unless the inquiry be carried further, a serious error might here arise. If no reference be had to the nature of the acceptance, his duty might be considered as terminated in the condition of his acceptance; the fear of God, and working of righteousness alone, might be accounted his justification. Hence the importance of looking to what was Peter's meaning when, in reference to him he said, "he that feareth God and worketh righteousness is accepted with him." By attention to this, we learn the nature of the acceptance. The expression did not imply that the state, in which Cornelius was, as thus accepted, was a state of salvation—in other words a state, in which he was saved. It was but preparatory to it. And now, he being thus prepared, the apostle was sent to introduce him to that state. Which thing, as the narrative informs us, was done by baptism. The evasion of this is to say, that the baptism was only an open profession, and public admission into the Church. That it was as much as this, is true: that it was no more, is false. In proof of this, we look to the next chapter, and reading Peter's defence of his conduct in going to Cornelius, a Gentile, we find him resting altogether upon the two remarkable visions, his own, and that of Cornelius. Of the latter he thus speaks: "And he showed us how he had seen an angel in his house, which stood and said unto him, send men to Joppa, and call for Simon, whose surname is Peter; who shall tell thee words, whereby thou and all thy house shall be saved." (xi. 13, 14.) Now it is very certain, that Peter's going and speaking to Cornelius, was to be the means by which he and his house were to be saved. But his discourse followed his declaration that Cornelius was accepted; so that it was not by any thing, which the apostle had said, that the centurion was accepted: and yet it was by the discourse that he was to be instructed how he might be saved. This discourse is contained in the latter part of the tenth chapter, in which we are told, as the last thing in the narrative, that "he commanded them to be baptized in the name of the Lord," (v. 48.) Most unquestionably, then, this was that, which he was to tell Cornelius, whereby himself and his house might be saved. Obviously now, his previous devout life did not supersede baptism: and yet was the preparation for it, the preparation that becomes an adult. It was by this that he was fitted to be saved "by the washing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Ghost." It was the work, too, of God's Spirit. Yet only as the call, or admonition, to continue in obedience, until saved by the grace of baptism.

St. Mark's Classical School.

ORMES B. KEITH, } PRINCIPALS,
JOHN H. STORM, }

Will be opened on the 10th of September next, in the building immediately adjoining St. Mark's Church on the west.

The object of the School is to unite with thorough instruction, religious influence. To this end the Bible and Prayer Book will form part of the boys' studies.

Application for the admission of pupils can be made until July 10th, at No. 24 Chancellor Street, where further information respecting the School can be obtained.

It is earnestly hoped that no boy of vicious disposition will be presented for admission.

Attached to the School, and preparatory to it, is a JUNIOR DEPARTMENT, to which a limited number of boys between six and nine years of age will be received.

This department will be taught in separate rooms from the other school, and under the general direction of the Principals; the particular care of it to be committed to a lady well qualified for the task.

The Principals refer to the Bishop of the Diocese, who takes an interest in the undertaking.

A VINDICATION.

We take great pleasure in presenting to our readers the following excellent article, in regard to the Bishop of New Jersey; and are sure that it will be no less gratifying to them. It gives what we believe to be the true view of the case. We copy it from the Pennsylvania Inquirer of the 14th inst., where it is credited to the Newark Daily Advertiser; the editor of which says, "We give place to the following explanatory statement, which comes to us from a highly responsible quarter, without the knowledge of the Bishop, with pleasure." Rev. D. Odum

BISHOP DOANE.

Bishop Doane and his friends have in nothing commended themselves more effectually to the confidence of all right thinking persons, than in their conscious ability to "bide the time." The kennel has run full of dirty water, and has been left to run. Who cannot throw a dead cat or a rotten egg? Who will return it? To a calm observer, every stage and step in the whole course of things thus far, has sustained the reality of this consciousness of the strength which springs from right. Let us pursue them one by one.

As soon as the Bishop began to recover from his well nigh desperate illness, and when he yet clung to the hope that an assignment might be avoided, he called to his bedside several of his friends, to ask them to assume the trust which the case called for. The history of this proposal is read in the fact that the whole business affairs of St. Mary's Hall and Burlington College, are administered by five men, who enjoy the fullest confidence of every Jerseyman, viz.: Judge Ogden, Jeremiah C. Garthwaite, Richard S. Field, Joel W. Condit, and Robert B. Aertson, Esqrs.

Unwilling to act in the matter of Burlington College, which is incorporated, as he was free to act in the matter of St. Mary's Hall, which was his own, on his sole responsibility, the Bishop immediately after the assignment, which his friends advised, and which no one has disapproved, called together the Trustees. We read the issue in the circular drawn by one of their number, and signed by their whole body, (one excepted, who was in Georgia,) declaring in the fullest terms, their highest confidence.

On the first of May, St. Mary's Hall and Burlington College re-opened. Doubtfulness as to the Bishop's health, alarm as to the probable failure of one or both institutions, numerous forms of unfriendly interference, had had weeks to exercise their disastrous influences. We read the issue in the fact that at St. Mary's Hall there have been entered 142, and at Burlington College 124 pupils. A large number that were to have come from a distance, being known to have been kept back by anxiety as to the probable existence of disease in the country.

Another month passes. The fullest freedom of investigation and discussion by tongue, and pen, and press, has had its fullest and freest scope. The Convention of the Diocese assembles in Burlington. The members of it are two days in full communication with the whole community. A lay-deputy, moved by the desire of rescuing the Bishop from the attacks of evil tongues and evil pens, proposes an inquiry. The subject is discussed for hours. The boldest challenges are made to produce specific charges; and made, as the Convention sits with open doors, in the face of the whole community. The Bishop asks no favours, and takes no exceptions; and when the question is put to the vote, no single voice sustains it. The Convention will not entertain the question.

Finally, the schools are in full and successful operation, and payments, to a considerable extent in discharge of interest and principal of the indebtedness, have been made, besides providing for all current expenses. The Bishop is engaged with his accustomed diligence in the discharge of his various duties, and confidence in the entire relief of the whole burden by which he has been for a time borne down, is rapidly increasing. Is it not true, that at every step and stage in the whole course of things, the consciousness of that strength, which only springs from right has been increased?

One will naturally inquire, since this is so, why so much censure and reproach in some quarters; why so much anxiety and apprehension in others? To give all the answers to these questions would take long. It is not the present purpose of the writer.

One has occurred to him which he believes goes very far to meet the case. It is the large amount of the indebtedness, as stated. "A quarter of a million" flows roundly upon the tongue; and seems to settle every question. The man that owns it—what a saint! The man that owes it—what a sinner! Is it a fair statement of the case? Accept, for the present, the common report, $250,000. Is there not to be taken from it the amount of corrections and reductions, which a careful auditing will require? Is there not to be taken from it the amount of responsibilities incurred for the use of Burlington College; and laid out there in buildings, repairs, apparatus, Library, the Gas House, and the like? I leave out the $20,000 which have been invested at the two institutions in furniture and the like; and which in their present use are fully worth their cost. Ought not the amount of the mortgage debt, more than $100,000 which claims no more than the premises on which it is secured, to be deducted? And, when these allowances and deductions have been made, and $250,000 shall have been cut down one half, is there not to be set off against the other half, the creation, the existence, the successful and influential operation of two institutions, whose gross receipts last year were more than $60,000? Make a fair calculation of the reasonable profits of these institutions, freed from the payment of interest and discount, and administered on cash principles, with a strict economy; and say what the "good will" of such a business will be worth; and set that against the half of the "quarter of a million" which remains.

This is a true and real view. It has not been presented before. Bishop Doane has been dealt with, in many quarters, as if he had sunk $250,000. Is not the statement here made reasonable ground of conscious strength, to those who know the facts, and hold the trust? Will not their confidence extend where this is known? Should it not be known? Is it not wise to "bide the time?"

ON THE CHANGE OF DRESS BY MINISTERS WHILE OFFICIATING.—A PROPOSITION.

The use of a clerical garment for the ministers of God, while engaged in the performance of their functions in the sanctuary, is very ancient, very consonant to a natural sense of beauty and propriety, is found to be an aid to devotional and reverential feelings, and has received the explicit sanction of the divine approval.

But for the minister to change his dress during the performance of divine service, is a practice commended by no one of these reasons. Such a practice has been made obligatory in no Church, so far as I am informed, except the Roman; and in that Church, the change is connected with superstitious notions about the peculiar sanctity of the different styles of dress. Either the interruption of the public service, for the purpose of making this change, must be defended by some reason growing out of the especial and peculiar sanctity of the one or the other dress, or the custom is simply vain and trifling.

Protestants would be unwilling to affirm the former proposition, and, therefore, they must either abandon the practice, or acquiesce in the conclusion that a custom, vain and trifling in itself, must be perpetuated merely because it is a custom. But there are some additional reasons against the practice, which I respectfully suggest as sufficient to turn the scale. It is admitted that a custom, the continuance of which involved no inconvenience, might as well be continued upon the single ground of custom. But against this custom, these following inconveniences may be alleged:

1st. Where men have been unused to this practice, as is the case with the larger part of our population, and with nearly the whole population of the west, they instinctively revolt from it as a piece of stage trickery, and a vain attempt at dramatic effect; and thereby their prejudices against the Church are greatly strengthened. Certainly this practice, or any thing like it, would not be tolerated in real life in any other department of human action.

2d. It is an unseemly interruption of the order and solemnity of divine worship. This supposes the minister and people to be engaged together in the holy duties of the place and time. But when the minister forsakes the assembly for so trifling a purpose, many young people think it a good opportunity to follow the first part of his example.

3d. The jejune operation of the toilet by the minister at this period, tends to dissipate the devotional feelings, and the solemn sense of his position, excited by the holy work in which he has been engaged, and thereby takes away his best preparation for the responsible duty which is to follow.

4th. The silk gown is very expensive. For each minister in the U. States to own one, demands a continued investment in that article alone of $43,590. Allowing that a gown will last five years in credit, the renewal of those that are past use will require an additional annual expenditure of $8,718.

All this wasteful expenditure is incurred, not for the honor and glory of God, or for the benefit of man, but simply to keep up a custom which no one defends upon principle, and for which no sufficient reason can be given, but which tends very greatly to increase the prejudices of unsophisticated minds against the Church. If any honor to God or good to men could come from the practice which I am opposing, then the question of expense ought not to be mentioned. But when the question is in regard to the convenience or inconvenience of abolishing a custom simply vain and idle, then the amount of expense incurred by the retention of the custom becomes a legitimate and an important subject of consideration. The Romanists find it profitable, as a part of their system, to keep up an exceedingly costly wardrobe, in which a rich and peculiar dress is appropriated to each great festival. This arrangement helps to feed the superstitious folly on which their whole system is built, and therefore they find their account in it. But true religion opposes the very superstition upon which Romanism is constructed, and any attempt to imitate the trickery of Romanism in this particular, comes just athwart our teaching. Its effect, as a means of superstition, is utterly lost; and the practice stands forth in its own nakedness of meaning and purpose—a vain and idle thing. That this vanity is expensive, is therefore a valid argument against it. That this practice appears decent and appropriate to those who have been accustomed to it from their childhood, is very true; but such persons must recollect that it does not so appear to nine-tenths of the people of this country. To them, the Church must go with a sufficient reason for every thing that she proposes. For the use of an official clerical dress, we can give reasons which cannot be gainsaid; but for the interruption of the solemnity of public worship by a change of dress, no such reason can be given, and therefore it provokes unnecessarily scorn and opposition.

5th. The silk gown, as originally used by the preacher, was then worn by him because it was his own customary academical dress, and because he intended at the time to take no other official part in the performance of divine service than to preach. But the present custom, which provides the same gown, composed of material that cannot be washed, to be worn by all the preachers who may successively officiate in a parish church, as rectors or visitors, for five years, is hardly consistent with ordinary decency and cleanliness. Few gentlemen would entertain the proposition thus miscellaneously to interchange their ordinary garments, composed of like material, and used for so long a time.

These, or other reasons, have induced many parish ministers, and the entire clergy of some of the dioceses, as I have heard, to discontinue, or never to begin the custom of changing the clerical vestments during service. Good taste and wise policy seem to me alike to require that their example should be generally followed.

To all this, but one answer can be given. That answer is, that in the heat and excitement occasioned by the Oxford movement in England, the use or disuse of the gown has come to be regarded as a party symbol there. But, surely, the policy, the interests, and the advancement of the American church should not be made to depend now, and in all future time, upon every passing folly of the people of a foreign land, placed in circumstances so different from ours, and exposed, by reason of the connection there between church and state, to influences so hostile to the peace and purity of the Church. Such a badge of party is stupid enough in England. To import it into this country, and to use it to the injury of our growing Church, will be much more foolish and unworthy of our position.

But leaving out of view a couple of very insignificant cliques in the eastern cities, who make a good deal of noise, we have no such parties in this country as are to be found in England. In the west, especially, such parties are unknown. Even those rare specimens who may unhappily come out here with Romanizing or Puritanizing affinities, will find themselves so completely hemmed in by Romanists and Puritans, that they must abandon the Church for one or the other; or they will be so sharply repelled on either side, as to be driven into true allegiance to their spiritual mother.

Therefore, disregarding a state of things foreign to our position, we should act according to our own wisdom and discretion, for the best interests of the Church in this country, adapting her to the actual circumstances in which she is placed. The Church's prescription all her children should faithfully obey. But beyond her prescription, our only rule should be the dictates of right reason, good taste, and a single eye to the promotion of true religion. I accordingly propose, that the existing stock of silk gowns be kept for the use of those preachers who have a special fancy for them, and who do not intend to take any other official part in the service for that occasion than to preach; so that the useless and unseemly practice of changing the dress during service, may be given up.

This is a subject upon which there should be no party action thought of. I can hardly suppose that there can be a party in the Church so void of reason and common sense as to attach a superstitious reverence to any clerical dress. It is simply a question of expediency, propriety and decency. Let each minister and congregation so consider it, and act in the premises,

(there being no law,) as judgment or fancy may dictate. Let no one esteem himself as having a right to interfere with his brother's liberty in this respect. Entire uniformity is impracticable, at all events in the varied circumstances of the Church in this country; and uniformity in immaterial things should not be too anxiously cared for. If the old congregations of the east are too much wedded to their customs to permit any deviation from the usual routine, let them at least tolerate in their brethren in the west a freedom adapted to our circumstances, and conducive to our prosperity.

P. S. I entirely concur with the views of the excellent Bishop of Alabama, in his recent pastoral. I do not attach sufficient importance to the views above set forth to make them an occasion of offence to any respectable portion of the Church. If there is not common sense enough in our communion to receive these views without angry controversy and painful scandal, then I do not wish to press them. There is, to be sure, an extreme section of impracticables, towards whom it would be idle to extend this consideration: for these men are waging a perpetual war against the most sacred principles of the Church, and the attempt to propitiate them would be vain and useless. They are, however, happily so few, that they may be safely left out of any calculation. These noisy personages remain in the Church to plague us for our sins, or they would doubtless go in a body to their beloved brethren, the Dissenters, Papal and Protestant.

A WESTERN RECTOR.

Selections.

PERPETUA.

BY THE REV. J. M. NEALE.

It was a holiday in the ancient city of Carthage.—Wherever you went, you might see knots of people collected together, eagerly discussing some subject in which they were interested. The white togas which the men wore were clean and bright in honour of the day: here and there you might tell a magistrate by the purple border of his dress, and his retinue. Boys too, with the little golden ball hanging on their breasts were at play in the streets; ladies were borne along by four stout slaves, clad in dark red; they themselves reclined listlessly on their cushions stuffed with roses and gazed carelessly around them. The temples were open; here and there an ox or ram, crowned with flowers, was led by for sacrifice; and in the great court of the temple of Juno, that stands at the Numidian street, in the market-place, the soothsayer was tearing out the heart of a sacrificed sow. But, if you watch, you will see that the crowds, though sometimes stopping to inquire the news of the day, or to greet a friend, are in reality pouring on the same way. Let us listen to what those two young patricians, or noblemen, are saying: their conversation may explain the cause of the general motion.

"Ah! well met, Caius Cælius! it is long since I have seen you! Where hasten you?"

"The same way as yourself, I think, excellent Apicius: to the amphitheatre."

"The Christians will not sacrifice then?"

"Not if it were to save the empire. As to Revocatus and Felicitas, they are but slaves, and one wonders at nothing in them: but that Vivia Perpetua, so young, and so beautiful, and so rich, and, by the Twin Brothers, except in this matter, held to be so wise, that she can leave her husband and infant to follow this execrable superstition, and to die for it, passes wonder."

Cælius.—"They say that magic is used, and I think it must be. But one of our magistrates told me that five were to suffer: who are the others?"

Apicius.—"Saturninus and Satur. I spoke to Murena the gaoler last night, and he told me that they seemed rather as if they were preparing for a wedding than for execution. They were praying to their God, and singing hymns to the crucified One from morning till evening; and as if the day were too short, they would rise at night to their prayers."

C.—"Methinks these executions spread these Jewish opinions further and further. I hear that the Nazarinians take as much care of the ashes and bones of those who are punished, as if they were gems and gold."

A.—"Aye, and talk of a resurrection of the body. Well! the immortality of the soul was always a pitch above what my belief could reach; but the immortality of the body! By my word, it is pitiful to see men so blinded!"

C.—"Well, they were happy days under the god Augustus," (it was so that the Romans spoke of their deceased emperors) before the world was turned upside-down with these fancies. But come! the games begin at midday, and it is now the fifth hour and more: let us hasten on."

If we could look into the court of that gloomy prison, we should see a different scene. The gaoler has just come to inform the prisoners that their time is almost come.

"It is our custom," said he, "to give such as you whatever you choose to eat and drink; for it will be your last meal till you sup with Pluto. And by Hercules, Christians though you be, you shall be indulged in this matter."

"I thank you," said Vivia Perpetua, a Roman lady of two-and-twenty; "for myself I crave nothing; but if it would please you to bring a cup of Falernian or Setine, or some other light wine for my dear sister Felicitas here, I should be beholden to you."

A twelvemonth past, and Perpetua, the high born patrician, would have shrunk from classing herself with the despised slave, Felicitas; but she had learnt to be a true follower of him Who took upon Him the form of servant.

"You shall have it, lady," returned the gaoler, and left the prison.

"Courage, Felicitas!" said Perpetua; courage now but for one short hour, and we shall have need of nothing but love. We can both leave our sweet little infants in our Father's hands; and I am sure that our earthly father, the good Bishop, will cherish them for our sakes."

"It is that thought, lady, which keeps me firm," replied Felicitas, who had become a mother only a few days before. "He Who has so marvellously given me strength to go with you to the amphitheatre, will not permit me to disgrace you there."

"It is His wont," said Satur, "to make His strength perfect in weakness, else my heart would fail me now. I trust it may be His will that I am not exposed to a bear; of all evil beasts, I have ever dreaded that most."

"For my part," said Saturninus, "I feel no fear: my only wish is, that if it might be so, I might be exposed to more than one animal, that I might show my love to Him who showed so great love to me."

"I was much discouraged at first," remarked Perpetua; "till I had a pleasant dream, which, I verily believe must have come from God."

"What was it?" inquired Satur. "We have need of all encouragement now."

"Methought," answered Perpetua, "that I saw a golden ladder, which stood upon the earth and reached to heaven. It was so narrow that not more than one could ascend at once: and at its sides were all kinds of instruments of torture—hooks, lances, swords and crosses. At the bottom of that ladder lay a dragon of huge size, who endeavoured to seize those who pressed up the steps. The first who mounted was Satur; and when he had ascended some way he said, 'Perpetua, I wait for you; but take care that the dragon does you no harm.' I answered, 'In the name of Our Lord Jesus Christ he will do me no harm.' I began to ascend, and set my foot on the monster's head. When we reached the top there was a delightful garden around us on all sides: in it I beheld one, dressed like a Shepherd, who was tending His flock; and around Him were thousands of happy beings, dressed in white. He looked at me steadily and then said, 'Thou art welcome, my daughter,' and at the same time gave me of the milk of his flocks. By this dream I judge that Satur will be the first to be taken hence."

"God grant it be so," said Satur. "But see, here are the deacons, Tertius and Pomponius; and Tertius has an infant in his arms."

"It is mine, my own treasure," said Perpetua; and thanking the deacons for their kindness, she stretched out her hands for the baby. At the same time the gaoler, followed by the Tribune, brought a cup of Falernian, which Felicitas drank.

If you can for a moment picture to yourself the amphitheatre, as it was when the Martyrs were led into it, you will have some idea of the terror even of the preparations for their victory. It was an immense oval building, with tiers of seats rising from the ground to the height of thirty or forty feet, tier behind tier. The lowest were of course the best, and were called podium. In the middle of one of the long sides of the podium was the Prefect of Africa's place under a lofty canopy; at his side, right and left, the magistrates, and other chief personages of the city and province. As it was a grey though fine day, there were no awnings up: but several, especially ladies, had umbrellas with them in case the sun should grow hot. The designators were marshalling people to their places. "Room, there, for Marcus Cælius!" "You, there, Thraso, give place to the excellent Albinus Felix!" "Welcome, Caius Cælius! There is a reserved seat for you in the podium, and for Apicius next the magistrates."

"What sport is there to-day, worthy Volero?" demanded Cælius, the same whose conversation we have just been relating.

"By Hercules, sir, excellent. Five Christians and no chance of their giving in."

"What beasts have you?" inquired Apicius.

"A bear, a leopard, a wild bull, and a boar," said the designator. "They are better than lions, for they show more sport."

In came the people, pouring up the different passages, and quarrelling with each other for the best seats. The knights took their places in the seats behind the podium, which were covered with cushions; the rest of the people were content with seats on the bare stone. At length a flourish of trumpets gave warning of the approach of the Prefect; and as he took his place and bowed to the people the air was rent with shouts of "The gods preserve Lucius Emilius! Almost at the same moment the martyrs were introduced at the door opposite to him, which led under the podium immediately on to the arena. They came forward firmly and cheerfully: though Perpetua and Felicitas had just taken leave of their two dear babies.

Immediately beneath the Prefect's seat were the dens of the wild beasts; and opposite to each of them a post was erected; to these posts the sufferers were tied.

"You have seen them before, Apicius, have you not?" asked Cælius.

"I have," replied the other; "I was in the prison when the Tribune would have led them to sacrifice."

"Who is that to the left, nearly opposite to us?"

"That is Vivia Perpetua," answered Apicius; "I thought you knew her."

"That Perpetua!" cried Cælius. "How she is altered! The last time I saw her was at the banquet Valerius Accius gave at the Augustalia, and that is not six months ago. Ah! I remember it well; but how little could one then have guessed that she was a Christian! Well,—and that is Felicitas next to her I suppose."

"Aye, by Bacchus; then Revocatus, next to him Satur, last of all Saturninus."

"That Satur seems as if he would fain be elsewhere, look how eagerly he is speaking to the soldier who is fastening him."

It was true that Satur, though not weak in faith, had, naturally, a much greater dread of suffering than his friends. This want of natural courage was no disgrace: the Faith of Christ did not remove it, but it did something far more glorious, it triumphed over it.

"I pray you, good Pudens," he said to the soldier, "what beast is that in the den opposite to me?"

"It is a bear, as I believe, answered Pudens.

"Be of good cheer, nevertheless," said Perpetua; "that bear shall either not touch you, or his embrace though it be somewhat rough, shall be in the end the most friendly you ever received, removing you from a death of pain to a life of glory."

"Do you fear the bear?" asked Pudens kindly.

"Not fear him good Pudens, but I should have preferred any other beast for mine enemy."

"I myself am a Christian," returned Pudens in a low voice, "not as yet baptized, but hoping and desiring to be so. If I can I will give you my help in this matter."

So saying he hastened to the spoliarium, where the dead bodies of men and beasts were thrown out of the theatre. In the mean time, among the spectators, there was many a civil inquiry after health, many a polite interchange of compliments, and many a congratulation on the fineness of the day.

"Five sesteria to two," cried Apicius, "that Vivia Perpetua is the first to be torn."

"I will take it," Cælius. "I wish, though for the sake of patrician honour, that it might be so; for to see her stand, side by side, with that contemptible Libyan slave is too much."

"Hush!" cried his companion, "they are going to fling open the dens."

At that moment two gigantic Numidian slaves appeared, who drew back the exterior bolts of the dens and then stood aside, covered by a kind of projection from the wall, with so narrow an entrance as to secure them from danger. Perpetua and Felicitas exchanged one or two short words of encouragement; Satur was pale, but very firm; Revocatus leant as far forwards as his hands allowed, eager to catch the first sight of the animal by which he would be attacked; and Saturninus, an old officer, seemed perfectly composed.

And now they heard the shouts and threats of the den-keepers, on the opposite side, as they incited the animals to come out. And, first of all, champing his tusks, a boar rushed out, and taking an oblique direction, made at Satur; then, as if changing its mind, dashed at one of the Numidians, who was imprudently standing without-side of his place of safety, and mortally wounded him. At the next moment, a leopard, with a wild howl leapt out, and striking down Revocatus and Saturninus, fled round the arena without doing them further harm. By the management of Pudens, the bear did not leave his den, the soldier having thrown some food to him. Last of all, the bull, rushing out of his cage, threw down Perpetua and Felicitas, stamped upon them, and then passing on into the midst of the arena, stood pawing up the ground with his fore feet, swaying his head slowly to and fro, while keeping his nostrils close to the sand, slowly pacing backward, and every now and then bellowing terrifically.

Thus, in the first encounter, none of the martyrs were mortally wounded. The beasts were driven back and the sufferers led to the gate of the amphitheatre, called Sana Vivaria. There Perpetua, finding a catechumen, named Rusticus, said to him, "Take my last farewell to the Church: live in unity and love; and be not frightened with what you see of our sufferings." She and her companion were now covered over with a net, and carried back: Satur and his friends were already re-tied to the posts. The signal being given, a leopard sprung out at the former, and mortally wounded him: in a faint voice he called to Pudens to take encouragement by his death, and to receive a ring which he dyed in his blood.

Thus, according to S. Perpetua's dream, he was the first to receive his reward. Saturninus was attacked by the bear, and after the terrible embrace of a few moments, was set free.

The people began to give signs of impatience that three of their victims had escaped the beasts, and the gladiators appeared on the other side of the amphitheatre. Perpetua and Felicitas, being set at liberty, gave each other the kiss of peace, and were followed by Revocatus into the midst of the arena; and there by the swords of the gladiators, they too, entered on their rest. Their bodies were drawn out by the hooks into the spoliarium, and there given to their friends; their souls went home to that reward for which they had struggled so nobly.

NINE WONDERS.

In the following paragraph, Baxter, whose talents, and piety, and devotion to the good of souls no one can justly question, nine times repeats his wonder at man's unconcern about his immortal interests. He says:

"O sirs, they are no trifles or jesting matters that the gospel speaks of. I must needs profess to you that when I have the most serious thoughts of these things, I am ready to wonder that such amazing matters do not overwhelm the souls of men; that the greatness of the subject doth not so overmatch our understandings and affections, as even to drive men beside themselves, but that God hath always somewhat allayed it by distance; much more do I wonder that men should be so blockish as to make light of such things. O Lord, that men did but know what everlasting glory and everlasting torments are! Would they then hear us as they do? Would they read and think of these things as they do? I profess I have been ready to wonder when I have heard such weighty things delivered, how people can forbear crying out in the congregation; and much more do I wonder how they can rest till they have gone to their ministers, and learned what they shall do to be saved, that this great business should be put out of doubt. O that heaven and hell should work no more upon men? O that eternity should work no more! O how can you forbear when you are alone, to think with yourselves what it is to be everlastingly in joy or torment! I wonder that such thoughts do not break your sleep, and that they do not crowd into your minds, when you are about your labor! I wonder how you can almost do anything else! How can you have any quietness in your minds? How can you eat, or drink, or rest, till you have got some ground of everlasting consolations? Is that a man or a corpse, that is not affected with matters of this moment—that can be readier to sleep than to tremble, when he hears how he must stand at the bar of God? Is that a man or a clod of clay, that can rise up and lie down without being deeply affected with his everlasting state—that can follow his worldly business, and make nothing of the great business of salvation or damnation, and that when he knows it is so hard at hand? Truly, sirs, when I think of the weight of the matter, I wonder at the best saints upon earth, that they are no better, and do no more, in so weighty a case. I wonder at those whom the world accounts more holy than needs, and scorns for making so much ado, that they can put off Christ and their souls with so little; that they do not pour out their souls in every prayer; that they are not more taken up with God; that their thoughts are not more serious in preparation for their last account. I wonder that they are not a thousand times more strict in their lives, and more laborious and unwearied for the crown than they are. And for myself, as I am ashamed of my dull and careless heart, and of my slow and unprofitable course of life, so the Lord knows I am ashamed of every sermon that I preach; when I think what I am, and who sent me, and how much the salvation and damnation of men is concerned in it, I am ready to tremble, lest God should judge me a slinger of His truth, and the souls of men, and lest in my sermon I should be guilty of their blood. Methinks we should not speak a word to men in matters of such consequence without tears, or the greatest earnestness that possibly we can. Were we not too much guilty of the sin which we reprove, it would be so. Whether we are alone, or in company, methinks our end, and such an end, should still be in our mind, and as before our eyes, and we should sooner forget anything, or set light by anything, or by all things, than by this."

IMPRISONMENT OF KING CHARLES THE FIRST IN CARISBROOKE CASTLE.

So solitary was his confinement during a great portion of his time, "that as he was standing one day near the gate of the castle, with Sir Philip Warwick, he pointed to a decrepit old man, and said—"That man is sent every morning to light my fire, and is the best companion I have had for many months." The king, however, submitted to all this severity with Christian patience and equanimity, and endeavored as much as possible to keep his mind employed. He had always had serious impressions of religion, and these were neither shaken nor diminished, but strengthened and confirmed, by the harassing restraint under which he was now placed. Devotion, meditation, and reading the scriptures, were his greatest consolations. The few books which he had brought into the castle with him, were chiefly on religious subjects, or of a serious cast. Among these was Hooker's Ecclesiastical Polity—a book which it is probable he had studied with great attention, as it related much to the national question so much agitated at that time, and in which no man was better versed. In his catalogue we find also two books of amusement, Tasso's "Jerusalem," and Spencer's "Faery Queen." His freedom, however, was more and more abridged. He was an excellent horseman, and fond of that exercise; but as this indulgence was denied, he spent two or three hours every morning on the castle ramparts. There he enjoyed at least fresh air and an extensive prospect; although every object he beheld—the "flocks straying carelessly on one side, and the ships sailing freely on the other"—brought painfully to remembrance that liberty and enjoyment of life of which he was so cruelly deprived. Thus circumstanced, he became regardless of his dress; he allowed his beard to grow, lost much of his cheerfulness; and in the expression of his countenance, betrayed the inward feelings of a patient but unhappy captive.

During his imprisonment in this castle, three several attempts appear to have been made, and chiefly by the gentlemen of the neighborhood, for his enlargement. These are severally mentioned by Clarendon, Gilpin, and the writers of the Worsley Papers, from which it appears, that by a correspondence privately settled with some gentlemen of the Island, it was agreed that the king should let himself down from a window of his apartment; a swift horse and a guide was to wait for him at the bottom of the ramparts, while a vessel in the offing was to be ready to carry him wherever he pleased. The chief difficulty was, how the king should get through the iron bars of his window; but Charles assured them that he had already made experiment of the passage, and had every reason to believe that it was sufficiently large to admit his person. All being ready—the night dark, the fortress quiet, and not a whisper of suspicion of what was going on—everything promised a successful issue. The signal was then made. Charles appeared at the window, and seeing his friends in attendance, signified his readiness to make the attempt at once. But what was his disappointment and the mortification of his friends, who stood watching him with unspeakable anxiety—when he found that, in his eagerness to lay hold of any rational means of escape, he had miscalculated the width of the aperture! Having protruded his head and shoulders, he could get no further, and what was worse, he could not draw himself back. His friends at the bottom of the wall heard him groan in distress, but durst neither relieve him by word or act, without alarming the sentinels, and thus sacrificing their own lives. It was a moment of agonizing suspense. At length, after repeated exertions, the king succeeded in extricating himself from his perilous situation, and waving his hand before the light as a signal, retired mournfully to his couch, there to brood over this fresh blow to his hopes and the defeated loyalty of his friends.

In the next plan laid for his escape, from the same window, implements having been secretly conveyed to him for that purpose, Charles contrived, by night-work and with "wonderful trouble," to saw the massive iron bar asunder, which had proved the great obstacle in his last attempt. But all these schemes were alike unsuccessful; and until the treaty of Newport, of which some interesting particulars are related by Sir Richard Worsley—the king remained a close prisoner in the Castle of Carisbrooke. He was then seized by the army, and carried a prisoner to Hurst Castle. "Just at the break of day," says Worsley,—"in an extract from Colonel Cooke's Narrative,"—"the king, hearing a loud knocking at his outer door, sent the Duke of Richmond to learn the cause, who found there a person who said his name was Mildmay—a brother of Sir Henry Mildmay, and one of the servants placed by the Parliament about the king's person. On the duke's inquiring his business, he answered that there were several gentlemen from the army, who were very desirous to speak with the king. The duke carried in this message, but the knocking still increasing, the king gave orders for their admission. The doors were no sooner opened, than those officers rushed into the bed-chamber before the king could rise from his bed, and abruptly told him that they had orders for his removal. 'From whom?' inquired the king. 'From the army,' they replied. 'And to what place?'

inquired the king. 'To the castle,' said they. 'To what castle?' demanded the king. They again answered, 'To the castle.'—"The castle," said the king, 'is no castle;' but added, that he was well enough prepared for any castle, and therefore required them to name it, when, after a short whisper together, they said, 'Hurst Castle.'—"Indeed!" replied the king, 'you could hardly have named a worse.' . . . The Duke of Richmond then ordered the king's breakfast to be hastened, presuming that there was little provision made for him in that desolate fortress, but before his majesty was well ready, the horses being come, they hurried him away, only permitting the duke to attend him for about two miles, and then telling him he must go no further. He therefore took a sad farewell of the king, being scarcely permitted to kiss his hand. The king's last words to the duke were, 'Remember me to my Lord Lindsay and Colonel Cooke, and command Cooke from me never to forget the passage of this night!' He then proceeded a prisoner to Hurst Castle, "which at that time," says Warwick, "contained only a few dog-lodgings for soldiers." In his way to that dismal receptacle, he accidentally met Mr. Worsley, one of the gentlemen who had so generously risked their lives for him in the above-mentioned attempts to escape. Charles wrung his hand with affection, and pulling the watch out of his pocket, gave it to him, with these words—"Keep this in remembrance of me: it is all my gratitude has to give." This watch is still preserved in the Worsley family; it is of "silver, large and clumsy in its form; neatly ornamented in the case with filagree work, but the movements are of very ordinary workmanship, and are wound up with catgut." On his arrival within its walls, the "solitude and dreariness of the castle struck like a death-damp to the heart of Charles!" Never till this moment had he thought himself in danger, but now suspicions of secret assassination haunted his mind, and as he looked around him, and compared Hurst Castle with that which he had left, "Here," said he to himself, "were the place for such a deed!"

Interesting sketch from Taylor's 'Facts in a Clergyman's Life.'

A MEMORIAL OF GOD'S MERCIFUL PROVIDENCE.

The evening of the Lord's day is peculiarly a time of rest to His ministers; for the day itself, though a day of rest to others, is a serving-day to us. Joyful and blessed our serving is, but it is often laborious and fatiguing. At no time does the cheerful quietness of my family circle seem so delightful to me as on the evening of the Lord's day.

The evening prayers were over, and our family party had separated for the night. I remained alone after every one had retired to rest, that I might see if the doors and shutters were closed, and the house in safety. As I stood in one of the passages I heard the deep stillness of the night was broken in upon, by the sudden rising of the wind. A door in the courtyard was slamming so violently, that I went out to close it, and I found that the wind had begun to blow a gale; but as our residence stood high, and open to the southwest, there seemed to me nothing unusual in the loud and sweeping wind which blew warmly and strongly over my face.

Before I retired to my own chamber I went, as I usually do, to give a passing look to the children of the household.

By the side of one of the youthful slumberers I lingered for some minutes. He was then the youngest of the family, and a younger brother's child. My mother stood beside me—for he slept in the dressing-room adjoining her chamber—and shading the light I carried with my hand, we looked down on the calm sweet countenance of the sleeping boy. There is something very lovely to me in the innocent security of a child's repose, the cheek so delicately flushed on the side pressing the pillow, the eyelids so lightly closed, and the soft, regular breathing just parting the rosy lips. I rather touched than clasped the little hand, carelessly resting on the pillow, and more than once I stooped down to kiss the soft cheek of the unconscious child, so tenderly loved by us all. As I turned away I heard the roar of the tempest from without; but all was peaceful in the hushed stillness and the soft gloom within.

It was impossible to sleep, nor could I wish to sleep during that awful night; and yet I was too fatigued not to feel at times almost overcome with drowsiness. The wind became louder and mightier in its force; never had I heard such long terrific blasts. At times there came a long, long pause of deep and awful stillness, as if the tempest were collecting its strength—like the string of a bow strained back, or the mountain-billow drawn down to its lowest depths, and thus gathering force to rise to a towering height, and to burst with overwhelming power—and then the blast came rushing on, and the house seemed to rock to its very foundations. Hour after hour passed, but there was no cessation of the hurricane. I thought of those who were out upon the sea, exposed to its wildest fury; and who could do otherwise than pray for all such? But as my spirit turned to Him, "who walketh upon the wings of the winds," I remembered that He is as gracious as He is glorious—as merciful as He is mighty. I felt how great a privilege it is that we are permitted, and indeed invited, to commend all for whom we ought to pray to His good providence, and to His all-sufficient grace; and it was then a high and holy delight to call upon Him, who, while "He thought it not robbery to be equal with God," came in the likeness of man, and lived and died among men, sharing our griefs and carrying our sorrows.

I thought of Him asleep in the midst of the storm, and I could not help, like the fearful disciples, entreating Him to rebuke the tempest, and say, as He said in answer to their prayer, "Peace, be still." Oh, the blessed privilege to have such a refuge, such a Saviour!—so gentle, so sympathizing, so humane a friend! Still the storm continued, when suddenly there came one heavy thundering crash, which seemed to fall upon the house. What it was, and where it was, I knew not—but I did not stop to think of what or where, for I found myself rushing forward to the chamber of the child I had left some hours before sleeping so softly. As I sprang up the stairs, a bell rang violently, and then I heard the sound of feet rushing backwards and forwards, and loud frantic shrieks. I was in time, and perhaps only just in time. I found my mother struggling with all her strength to force her way into the dressing-room where the child slept. When the crash came, the partly-closed door had suddenly shut. She could just open it, and was able to see the situation of the child, and hear his cries of terror; but all her efforts to enter the room were in vain. My sister had also sought the room, and had rushed round to the other door, which opened into the passage, and she was using all her strength to burst it open, but in vain; the door had been locked from within, and resisted all her efforts. Never shall I forget the whole scene as it then appeared—never shall I cease to shudder when I think of the situation in which I found the child—the roof rent wide open to the sky, and the heavy masses of brick and timber tumbling about me, and the wind, sweeping in, and bellowing with its mighty voice; and the troubled moonlight showing to me in the further corner the couch of the child almost buried in the ruins. I heard his piteous cries, and they brought joy to my heart, for I thought at first that all was over, that he had been crushed beneath the frightful ruins. He also heard my voice, and called upon me by my name; and with a desperate effort, which seemed easy to me at the time, I forced back the door, which the falling mass had almost closed, I sprang forward, and was permitted to reach the child. Just sufficient space was left me to draw him forth, for the rubbish was as high as his chest. In a moment I had drawn him from the room, and placed him in my mother's arms unhurt. I had no sooner reached the adjoining room, than there came another dreadful crash—the whole of the roof, and chimneys, and ceiling, as I afterwards found, had fallen in. But the child was safe, and we were blessing God with him in our arms, as we hastened with him to a place of greater safety.

Blessed be God's holy name! this was but one instance among many more, of the mercies of His providence on that eventful night, that night to be much observed in our recollections of His goodness, and our thanksgivings for His deliverances!

When I afterwards visited that chamber, I found it in a ruinous heap of brickwork and timber, bared to the open sky. The beam which had been snapped in the middle, hung slanting just above the bed of the child, and a few large heavy slates were still suspended over the spot where his fair head had been lying—a broad mass of the ceiling had fallen, like a smooth canopy, upon the wooden parapet which surrounded his Indian crib, and under it his tender limbs had been so gently shielded that the bed clothes had not even been pressed down. But on the pillow, just where his head had rested, a joist had since fallen, and would probably have struck his temple with a fatal blow.

From that same room a large and heavy wardrobe had been removed only the night before, which otherwise must have been forced through the ceiling, and have inevitably fallen on another youthful sleeper in the room beneath. It had been also proposed not long before, to move the crib of the child to another side of the room, to the very spot where the whole weight of the chimneys had fallen, and where he must have been crushed to death. But it was His will who hath said "There shall not an hair of your head perish," to preserve us in safety during those hours of danger. One of our family circle assured me that at the awful crisis of the tempest, she heard those very words: "There shall not a hair of your head perish!" spoken distinctly as by a human voice, in her ears. I know few persons less superstitious than she is—but she declared she never heard any words more distinctly spoken. How fervently do I pray, that all we who were spared may live to show forth His praise, not only as we did then, with our lips, but in our lives.

THE HARDENED CRIMINAL SOFTENED.

The following anecdote was related by Dr. Barth, of Wurttemberg, at the annual meeting of the United Brethren, held in London, for the special object of imploring the Divine blessing on their missions in Labrador, and a prosperous voyage to the vessel which carries out to their settlements yearly supplies of such necessities as the inhospitable climate of that northern latitude cannot afford.

"In a town in the north of Germany a man was convicted of murder, and from the time of his condemnation several ministers, with much zeal and Christian love, endeavored to render him sensible of the heinousness of his sin, hoping to lead him to employ his short remaining time in seeking peace with God, through the merits of our gracious Redeemer. But their efforts seemed all unavailing; his disposition remained savage, his heart obdurate, his mind unconvinced, and the time of his execution drew nigh, almost unregarded by him, to the deep pain and anxiety of his spiritual advisers. The day before that appointed for his paying the penalty due to the outraged law of his country and his God, he was standing before the window of his cell, looking upon the scene without, and watching a little child of three years old playing by the side of a river, which ran by the walks of the prison. Suddenly the child fell into the water. The prisoner, alarmed and horrified at the imminent danger, immediately raised his voice and shouted; the mother was within hearing, and instantly saw her child struggling in the river. She plunged into the stream, and succeeded in rescuing her child from a watery grave. In the gratitude of her heart she hastened to the prison, to thank the person who had been the means of saving the life of her child. The poor criminal took the child into his arms, and his feelings so overpowered him that the hardened man shed tears.

"Sympathy with another's danger, and joy over his rescue, had softened the heart which before was closed to every entreaty of his minister, and he was now led to feel that he was a sinner, and to seek for pardon."

This anecdote told powerfully in illustration of the blessing which attends the endeavours of Christians for the salvation of the heathen. Hearts which had remained shut up in selfishness, and had enjoyed no happiness in themselves neither, in the midst of their unconcern about their fellow-creatures' good, have been melted into tenderness at the discovery of suffering abroad, and have become solicitous about their own wants while learning to feel for the destitution of others. The hardened criminal, unconcerned about the destruction of his own body and soul, is roused with a concern for the loss of a mother's best treasure; he sounds the alarm, the child is rescued, and a thankful mother hastens to carry to the outcast her thanks for a service rendered to her even by him. He sees himself in a new light—he has even been the instrument of conferring a benefit! And if the over-joyed parent cannot be satisfied without expressing her gratitude to the criminal who has done her good, will the criminal stand back and not yield thanks to the perfect Being who left the throne of glory to rescue the hopeless sinner from the wrath to come?

Ah, Saviour! make the tidings which come to us, by the triumphs achieved by the Gospel in distant lands, melt the hearts of careless sinners! Let them become conscious of their own want of a Saviour, and may they throw themselves into the arms of Him who will draw them out of the perilous waters of alienation from God, and bring them to a safe landing of a firm trust in the blest Deliverer, and a consistent walk in imitation of his bright example.

SATURDAY, JULY 28, 1849.

THE PURITANS.

The silly fashion of lauding these men to the skies, as martyrs to civil and religious liberty, has had its day, and is now nearly run out. Impartial history will yet paint their real character in its true colours. We are glad to observe that it is beginning to be understood, even in New England itself, and that the secular press there is not afraid to speak out. Thus the Providence (R. I.) Journal lately said, "For ourselves, we should as soon assert of Pope Leo X. that he was the author of the Reformation, or of Archbishop Laud, that he was the founder of Congregationalism, as of the Puritans of Massachusetts that they were the discoverers, or even the most distant promoters of religious freedom."

On this the Boston Times remarked:—

The Journal is right. The Puritans of Massachusetts have not the slightest claim to be considered as friendly to religious freedom. They made no pretensions to such liberality, which they were wholly unable to comprehend, and which they regarded as a sinful thing in others. The religious freedom to which they were friendly was of that kind which makes free with the opinions of other people. There is a great deal of humbug extant about our ancestors, and we expect soon to hear that they knew all about steamboats, the electric telegraph, and Paixhan guns. Assertions of the kind wouldn't be a particle more absurd than those which are made in support of their toleration of freedom of opinion in matters of religion.

The Boston Republican says:—

There is a distinction to be taken in reference to the history of New England, which deserves more consideration than it has received. The general term "puritan" covered several classes, having very different views and purposes, but who agreed in their principal religious doctrines, and in dissatisfaction with the Church of England "as by law established." Of these, some became separatists, and under various names, such as Independents, Brownists, &c., established ecclesiastical organizations out of the national church, while others remained in the church with a view to a reform in its usages. The latter continued members of the establishment till the passage of the act of uniformity, in 1661, and hence are termed nonconformists.

The same paper states that the colony of Massachusetts Bay was founded by Puritans, but not by separatists, and adds—

The settlers belonged to that class who set up Presbyterianism as an established religion in England, merely diverting the tithes from Episcopal rectors and settling them upon Presbyterian parsons. They never in the early period of their history, disavowed their connection with the Church of England: and one of the first disputes between Roger Williams and the authorities of Salem was upon this very question. They never professed a belief in the liberty of conscience, never promised it to others, and never granted it till circumstances compelled a relaxation of their "act of uniformity." They would be astonished and chagrined, could they come among us and hear some of the explanations by which their conduct is now-a-days defended.

Of these martyrs to conscience, these victims of ecclesiastical tyranny—the Providence Journal, again, draws this complimentary sketch:—

It was they who voted themselves the saints of the earth, and proceeded to exterminate all who were not of their own way of thinking, with a vehemence that shocked their brethren in England and called forth the remonstrances of such men as Sir Richard Saltonstall and Sir Henry Vane, and even of Oliver Cromwell himself. They aimed to enforce Puritanism by law and to annihilate every thing that looked like dissent. They drove away from their Commonwealth all who presumed to question their spiritual tyranny, and when the refugees found an asylum in the settlements at Providence, Warwick and Newport, they aimed to extinguish the settlements themselves. For this purpose they forbade the Rhode Island colonists to come into their jurisdiction, and permitted no kind of traffic with them; they excluded them from the New England confederacy, and left them alone to the mercy of the Indians; they misrepresented them to the government in England, and endeavoured to prevent their obtaining a charter; in short, their whole policy was one of subjugation and extermination to all who dissented from their civil or ecclesiastical creed. They dictated the law both to the Plymouth and the Connecticut colonies, and the greatest fault of these colonies, especially of the former, was that they were timidly subservient to the rulers and elders of Massachusetts, and became too often the servile executors of their persecuting policy. Of religious freedom these Puritans had not the faintest conception; toleration they regarded as a ruinous evil; and the principles which exonerate them from blame in these respects and entitle them to the indiscriminate praise they sometimes receive, would also justify all the acts of religious intolerance recorded in modern history.

THE LATE DAVID B. OGDEN.

The Church in New York has sustained a great loss by the death of this distinguished layman. Amid the cares and toils of most successful professional life, Mr. Ogden always found time to bestow upon the service of the Church. To her councils he brought the same extensive knowledge, profound wisdom, and calm deliberation, which rendered him so justly eminent at the bar. We last saw him at the late meeting of the trustees of the General Theological Seminary. How much will we miss that thoughtful face, that mild, earnest voice, that gentle unassuming manner, which showed how the power of mighty intellect may be softened by the blessed influence of Christian faith!

We have never known a man, of such eminence, who bore his high honor with so much meekness, and so little pretension. He left it for others to find out what he was; he never told it himself. And they could have little penetration, who were long in Mr. Ogden's society, without discovering in him all the noble qualities which grace the Christian gentleman. He has bequeathed to his family a rich heritage in a name associated with all that is high, noble, and honorable. There is but one feeling, one expression in relation to Mr. Ogden among those who knew him best; and this is alike honorable to his late associates and to him whose unobtrusive virtues are so justly appreciated. This is declared by the following resolutions, adopted at a meeting of the New York Bar. The following were the officers of this meeting:

President—Hon. Samuel Jones.

Vice-Presidents—Hon. Ogden Edwards, Hon. F. J. Oakley, Hon. J. W. Edmonds, Geo. W. Strong, Esq., Hon. Wm. T. McCoun.

Secretaries—John L. Lawrence, Wm. Kent, Thos. L. Wells, Wm. H. Harrison, Esqrs.

After appropriate remarks by the President and by Mr. Ketchum, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted: ED. BAN.

Resolved, That the New York Bar has heard with deep sensibility of the decease of its distinguished ornament, DAVID B. OGDEN, the venerable citizen, the profound lawyer, the warm-hearted friend, and the devout Christian.

Resolved, That, throughout a long professional career, our lamented friend has set a bright example to his professional brethren, of all those virtues which give dignity to their calling and respectability to its members.

Resolved, That in this afflictive dispensation of Providence, our city, state and country are called upon to mourn the loss of one whose fame was co-extensive with our Union, and whose departure from among us will leave a melancholy void, not only in the domestic circle, but in all those relations which identify a good man, an able jurist, a disinterested patriot, with the age in which he lives.

Resolved, That the bar of New York most cordially sympathize with the family of the deceased in their afflictive bereavement, and that as a tribute of respect to the memory of our venerated friend, we will wear the usual badge of mourning for thirty days.

ST. LOUIS.

We have felt the deepest anxiety in relation to the Bishop and Clergy of our Church in this desolated city. We are sure that their devotion will not be found wanting in this hour of trial.

A letter from a Clergyman of St. Louis has been delayed in reaching us, by our absence. After picturing "the awful scenes of distress" to be witnessed there, he says—"the Bishop whose Parish is large, is busy day and night, but retains his health remarkably." We trust the mercy of God will preserve him amid his dangerous but blessed labors—and that the same gracious Being will stay the pestilence which has nearly decimated this flourishing city.—ED. BAN.

We observe that, in addition to those previously set forth by the Bishops of New Jersey and Pennsylvania, the Bishops of Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Delaware, Ohio, and Tennessee, have appointed appropriate services to be used in their respective dioceses on the approaching national Fast. The Bishop of Vermont, in a letter to his clergy, authorizes them to select any one which they may prefer amongst the forms of prayer which the other Bishops have published.

Our favourite Inquirer, of this city, says, "Every where throughout the country, the recommendation of President Taylor with reference to a Day of Fasting, Thanksgiving, and Prayer, is responded to in a truly Christian spirit. We notice these indications with sincere pleasure. They are suited to the times in which we live, and to our character as a moral, Christian and enlightened people."

SON OF BISHOP DOANE.—We are gratified in meeting with the following handsome notice of our esteemed young friend, Wm. C. Doane, in the Home Journal, edited by two of our country's distinguished literati, Geo. P. Morris and N. P. Willis. Master Doane has not yet numbered as many summers as these gentlemen suppose, but we trust is destined for many years of usefulness in the holy ministry of the Church, to which he has already consecrated his youthful heart and future life.

We copied recently, from the Burlington "Missionary," (under the head of "Two Gems," and in company with a poem by Tennyson,) a beautiful piece of poetry which was signed "D." and which, we thought, bore sufficient intrinsic evidence of being the production of Bishop Doane. We have learned since, that it was written by the son of the Bishop, a young man of twenty, who is conducting the periodical in which we chanced to find it. Having treasured in our memory, for many years, one or two of the most beautiful poems in the language written by Bishop Doane in his early professional career, we thought we recognized the peculiar rhythm of his genius in the thoughts which these lines embodied. They certainly indicate the finest poetic perception.

The Rev. Dr. Morton, Chairman of the Library Committee of the Society for the Advancement of Christianity in Pennsylvania, desires us to say that the notice of missing books lately published in our paper has caused many of them to be returned; but that the following are still unaccounted for; viz.: Seabury's Sermons, 2 vols.; Dr. Bull's Sermons, 3 vols.; Evangelical Tracts, 1st vol.; Religious Tracts, 6, 7, 9 and 11th vols.; Josephus, 2d vol.; Rollin's Ancient History, 1st vol.; Rosenmuller, 3d vol.; Griesbach's New Testament, 1st vol.; and Mosheim's Ecclesiastical History, 1st and 2d vols.

Contributions to the Library, either in books or money, will be thankfully received by Dr. M., 9 Clinton street.

ORDINATIONS.—In St. John's Church, Portsmouth, N. H., on the 11th inst., Mr. Wentworth L. Childs was admitted to the holy order of Deacons, by Bishop Chase.

In Christ Church, Macon, Geo., on the 13th May, Messrs. Wm. J. Perdue, George Macauley, and James D. Gibson were admitted to the holy order of Deacons, by Bishop Elliott.

In St. Paul's Church, Alexandria, on the 13th inst., the following gentlemen, members of the graduating class of the Theological Seminary of Virginia, were admitted to the holy order of Deacons, by Bishop Meade; viz.: Messrs. Robert D. Brooke, Wm. D. Hanson, Wm. L. Hyland, Wm. N. Irish, Edmond Richards, W. H. C. Robertson, Theodore S. Rumney, and C. H. Shield, Jun.

In St. Paul's Church, Albemarle, Va., on the 30th ult., the Rev. Samuel R. Slack, Deacon, and minister of the parish, was admitted to the holy order of Priests, by Bishop Meade.

In St. Stephen's Church, Portland, Me., on the 8th inst., Mr. George Slatery was admitted to the holy order of Deacons, by Bishop Burgess.

CONVENTIONS.—We have received the Journal of the late Pennsylvania Convention, printed in the usual handsome style of Messrs. King & Baird; and also the Journals of North Carolina, Georgia, and Michigan.

AFRICAN MISSION.—The Rev. Eli W. Stokes, (coloured) Rector of Christ Church, Providence, R. I., has been appointed by the Foreign Committee a missionary and schoolmaster at Cape Palmas; and expects to sail from Baltimore in the Liberia packet of the 1st of August.

"Who wrote Alice, or the New Una?" This, says the Home Journal, of New York, is the question which everybody is asking; and it adds, "We know, and perhaps when people are weary of guessing, we shall tell." The authorship is no such great mystery, nor do we think it worth the trouble of "guessing;" we also "know," and at once "tell," that it is by the Rev. G. Huntington, M. D., late assistant minister of the Church of the Holy Apostles, New York.

A Pervert to the Church of Rome

We have been favoured with a copy of an Address before the Trustees, Teachers, and Students of Burlington College, on the late anniversary of American Independence, by the Right Rev. G. W. Doane, D.D. LL.D. It is entitled, "The Men to make a State; their Making, and their Marks;" and the dedication is "to Major General Winfield Scott, General in Chief: a Model of the Men to make a State." This eloquent production abounds with "thoughts that breathe, and words that burn;" and it is enough to say that it is worthy of the Bishop of New Jersey.

PENNSYLVANIA.—On the 17th inst., Bishop Potter laid the corner stone of a new church, at Milton; and next day consecrated St. Mark's church, Northumberland; in this diocese.

We copy from the English Churchman the following interesting reports of proceedings in the House of Lords and House of Commons on the 19th and 22d June. It will be observed that the majority against the Jew Bill was 25 out of 165, being larger than it was last year, when it was only 35 out of 221. Yet notwithstanding this second defeat, a new writ has been moved for the city of London, that Baron Rothschild may be elected again. The electors may return him a hundred times; but we have confidence in the House of Lords that they will deal in the same manner, or even more decisively, with that modern spurious liberalism which deliberately prefers one who, if he be true to his creed, denies and blasphemes, to one who confesses and worships, our blessed Lord and Saviour.

The Earl of Carlisle moved the second reading of the Parliamentary Oaths Bill, and after remarking that it was not identical with the measure rejected by the House last session, proceeded to state the grounds on which he thought it entitled to the favourable consideration of their lordships. The substance of his argument was, that unless there were some grounds of overpowering necessity to the contrary, in no case ought civil disqualification to be attached to religious opinions, and in such a spirit all recent legislative enactments on religious subjects had been framed, for the political disabilities of the Roman Catholics and various classes of Dissenters had been successively abolished. The Jews, though admitted to municipal privileges were the only religious community debarred of political rights; but there was not, as far as he could see, a single valid reason upon which they could be refused a seat in the House of Commons. The noble lord then combated in detail the various objections against the measure, and concluded an eloquent speech by moving that the Bill be read a second time.

The Earl of Eglinton admitted that the lapse of years and the extinction of families might have rendered necessary some alteration in the Parliamentary oaths, but the real object of this Bill was to remove Jewish disabilities, and enable Baron Rothschild to sit for London. That constituency must have known that the person they elected as their representative, however worthy in his private character and distinguished by worldly position, was really ineligible, because he could not take the oaths prescribed by Parliament. This was therefore, a retrospective measure. But he objected to it chiefly on religious grounds. The Jews suffered no persecution in this country; but the solemn duty of their lordships was not to permit those who did not believe in Christ to legislate for a Christian Church and nation. He moved that the Bill be read a second time that day three months.

The Duke of Cleveland thought after Quakers, Moravians, and every class of Dissenters, had been admitted to seats in Parliament, it would be a great hardship and injustice to exclude Jews, being British-born subjects of Her Majesty.

The Archbishop of Canterbury believed the effect of the Bill would be to lower the character and obligations of members of Parliament, by making it matter of indifference whether they belonged to the Christian communion. The events which had occurred within the last year made it imperative on their lordships to reject this Bill. England stood in a peculiar position—a monument of freedom and social order; he did not hesitate to attribute her pre-eminence among the nations to her national Christianity, which would be grievously affronted by the admission of Jews to seats in the Legislature.

The Archbishop of Dublin had always been a firm and unflinching advocate for the removal of all religious disabilities. It was inconsistent with the principles, and repugnant to the genius of Christianity, that civil disqualifications and penalties should be imposed on those who did not conform to it. Parliamentary electors should be left to decide for themselves the eligibility of Jews to seats in Parliament; their hands should be tied by no restriction which nothing but a strong public necessity could justify, and no such justification existed for the exclusion of the Jews. Their lordships must either retrace their steps, and exclude from office all who did not belong to the Established Church, or they must in consistency consent to the abrogation of this last restriction.

The Bishop of Exeter opposed the Bill. In a republic every citizen had an equal right to all franchises, distinctions, and offices, but in a monarchy like ours, which rested on a distinct contract with the nation that the Sovereign should "maintain to the utmost the laws of God and the true profession of the Gospel," no one had a constitutional right to any franchise or honour unless he could serve the Crown in those particulars to which the monarch had pledged himself. A Jew could not be a faithful counsellor to the Crown in maintaining the laws of God and the true profession of the Gospel, and therefore had no claim to the distinction now sought for. He had no wish to quote Scripture in the heat of debate; but yet he must not scruple to tell noble lords that Parliament was bound, as every individual was bound, to remember that "whatever we do, whether in word or in deed," we are to do all "in the name of the Lord Jesus." (Hear, hear.)

The Earl of Shrewsbury supported the Bill so far as it contemplated the emancipation of the Jew, but regretted that one of its provisions most unnecessarily and unjustly restricted the Catholic. He should endeavour in committee to modify that part of the Bill, so that there should be one form of oath for all.

The Earl of Winchelsea solemnly adjured their lordships not to pass the Bill, which was dictated only by a spirit of infidelity too characteristic of their legislation for the last twenty years, lest they should incur the awful condemnation of those who openly rejected the Messiah.

The Duke of Argyll contended that the admission of the Jews would not affect the Christian character of the country or the legislature. They could not secure the Christianity of any assembly by the oaths imposed. The other House of Parliament was not Christian in the high sense of the word. Even among their lordships they had no means of guaranteeing the realities of the Christian faith and character. They might inherit the graces and piety of a Wilberforce or the scepticism of a Boilingbrooke. Having admitted to Parliament every sect of religious faith, and every school of philosophical opinion, some of which were essentially un-Christian, such as the Unitarian, they could not maintain the disabilities affecting the Jews.

Earl Nelson and the Earl of Desart opposed the Bill, which was supported by the Earl of Wicklow.

The Bishop of Oxford drew a wide distinction between admitting the Jews to social position and civil power by permitting them to administer the law as magistrates, and giving them seats in the Legislature to make laws for a Christian Church and people, which, if true to their own profession, they could not do. Their being no Jewish constituencies in this country, there was great danger in opening the doors of Parliament to a mere money power, apart from all other considerations. They could neither measure the interest which Jews had in seeking admission to the Legislature, or the means they had at command to obtain seats in Parliament. If they destroyed the groundwork of Christianity upon which their legislation was based in order to gratify for a time a handful of ambitious men, they would destroy Christian England, and ruin the asylum of the scattered Jews.

Lord Brougham ridiculed the alarms of the Bishop of Oxford as the most extravagant of all chimeras. Having accorded to members of the Hebrew persuasion judicial functions, official station, and the elective franchise, with power to canvass and spend money at elections, it was absurd attempting to draw an impassable line between those concessions and their admission to seats in the Legislature.

The Earl of Carlisle having replied, their lordships divided—

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THE AFFAIRS OF ROME.—Mr. Anstey stated that in the correspondence with Her Majesty's representative in Paris as to the affairs of Rome, which the noble lord had laid on the table a few days ago, he found a letter from Cardinal Antonelli stating that—"the Holy Father, who has been much affected by the interest and sympathy which Her Majesty the Queen of England, your august Sovereign, has been pleased to show for him in the letter which she addressed to him in the month of January last, is encouraged by the hope that Her Majesty's Government, who takes a lively interest in the order and peace of Europe, will be pleased under the present circumstances to co-operate in the best manner in order to put a stop to a state of things so detrimental to the general peace and to the happiness of nations, and to support with their powerful influence the co-operation claimed for the re-establishment of the legitimate power of the Holy Father, whose independence is more than ever necessary for the exercise of his authority in the Catholic world." This letter of Her Majesty was not included among the documents; and what he wished to ask the noble lord was, whether the letter was such as would lead to the inference drawn from it by Cardinal Antonelli; and whether there was any objection to lay the letter on the table of the House?

Lord Palmerston.—The letter to which the hon. and learned gentleman refers was a letter addressed to the Pope by Her Majesty. The Pope, as is usual under such circumstances, addressed letters to the Courts of Europe, and amongst others to Her Majesty, announcing that he was obliged to retire from the Roman States, and soliciting generally the goodwill and confidence of the Courts to which the letters were addressed. The answer returned was also such as it is usual to return to letters of that kind, expressing regret at the events that had occurred, and the great satisfaction it would afford Her Majesty to learn that the difference between the Pope and his subjects had been put an end to, and stating, of course, that she would be glad if she could assist in a reconciliation. It is not usual to lay letters of that kind, which are of a formal character, on the table of the House. The correspondence as bearing on the acts of the British Government had been laid before Parliament, and the House was therefore in perfect possession of the views and intentions of Her Majesty's Government with respect to the matter in question. The letter was one for which Ministers were responsible.

Mr. Roebuck, stigmatizing in severe terms the conduct of France in relation to Rome, called upon Lord Palmerston to express his marked, unequivocal, and strong disapprobation of the interference of that nation in the civil affairs of other people, and inquired whether he had expressed distinctly to the French Government that the transactions passing before the walls of Rome had not only found no favour with the people of England, but were worthy of severe reprobation.

Lord Palmerston replied, that a minister of the Crown was placed in a delicate position when called upon to pronounce a judgment upon the conduct of a foreign Power in respect to matters in which the British Government had declined to be a party; but Her Majesty's Ministers had witnessed the circumstance to which Mr. Roebuck had alluded with deep regret, and more, in the present state of things, he could not be expected to say. They had from the outset deprecated the intervention of any foreign Power in the affairs of Rome, and they thought the course pursued by France an unfortunate one.

The Rev. Theo. Philip Barber, having resigned the charge of St. Philip's Parish, Laurel, and accepted an invitation to the rectorship of the "Great Choptank Parish," Cambridge, Md., requests that his letters and papers may be directed accordingly.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—Several necessarily deferred communications will appear next week. The acting editor has only felt at liberty to open such letters as are addressed to the Rev. Mr. Ogilby in his editorial capacity. A number, not so addressed, have been received; and this will account for the delay which may be experienced in their acknowledgment.

Clerical Changes.

The Rev. J. P. T. Ingraham, having resigned the charge of Trinity Church, Milwaukee, Wisconsin, and become a missionary in Nashville, Tenn., desires letters and papers directed accordingly.

The Rev. D. Caldwell, from continued ill health, has resigned the rectorship of St. Paul's Church, Norfolk, Va.

The Rev. Chas. F. Lewis, late of the Diocese of Ohio, has accepted a call to the rectorship of Trinity Church, Monroe, Michigan.

The Rev. W. R. Nicholson, late of New Orleans, has accepted a call to the rectorship of St. John's Church, Cincinnati, a parish lately organized.

New Publications.

LECTURES ON THE PASTORAL OFFICE; delivered to the Students of the Theological Seminary of Alexandria, Va. By the Right Rev. Wm. Meade, D. D.—New York, 1849; Stanford and Swords; 8vo. pp. 241.

We learn from the preface, that these Lectures have been delivered for a number of years past to the graduating class of the Theological Seminary of Virginia, during which the wish for their publication has often been expressed; though, as the Right Rev. author modestly observes, "nothing was further from his thoughts when they were first prepared."—They number nineteen in all, on the following important subjects;—the Power, Responsibility, and Holiness of the Ministry;—a zealous affection for the office, and diligent performance of its duties;—Preaching;—the Law of Proportion;—rightly dividing the Word of truth;—Experimental and Practical Teaching;—Faithfulness in Preaching;—an affectionate earnestness and particularly in preaching;—plainness of style; reading sermons, or extemporising; the delivery and length of sermons;—the Application of sermons;—the Reading of the Service in a right spirit;—the administration of the Sacraments;—religious education of the young, and exercise of discipline;—Pastoral Duties;—certain weaknesses and improprieties which hinder a minister's usefulness;—the Ordination vows, and previous subscription.

THE OBEDIENCE OF FAITH; Seven Sermons, delivered on his Visitations to the Churches in his Diocese, during 1848-9; by the Right Rev. L. Silliman Ives, D. D., LL.D., Bishop of North Carolina. New York, Stanford and Swords; 12mo. pp. 161.

This beautifully printed volume is inscribed by their Bishop "to the Faithful and the Penitent in the Diocese of North Carolina; with his blessing upon them, and his earnest request for their prayers, that he may be found among them, 'perfecting holiness in the fear of God' in this life, and participating in the rewards of humble and obedient devotion to the Cross of Christ in the life to come."—The titles of the seven sermons are—The Kingdom of Heaven discerned only by Faith—How to insure the fruits of Regeneration—How to be Christ's Disciples—The case of the Baptized without Self-Discipline—Self-Examination—The case of those who resist Christ's Reign—Obedience the way to Knowledge.

THE WITNESS WITHIN.—REPLY.

MR. EDITOR:

For the friendly remarks of your correspondent, J. W. M., he has my cordial thanks. I admire the acuteness of his article. I am gratified that he so largely agrees with me, nor do I regret his leaving hardly enough difference for a debate. And I (of course) freely allow him to "show his opinion," and to controvert mine. But in preparing my paper on "The Witness Within," I rather deprecated controversy, having an eye chiefly to practical results, and believing that a closely defined discussion, on a matter above both physics and metaphysics, would produce more arguments than conclusions. Out of those sciences, and indeed all through the dictionary, words have their general sense nine times, or ninety-nine times, for once that they are confined to their strict meaning. In the Bible, this rule is perhaps universal. Definitions are wanted where the thing meant cannot be reached without them; but in many cases they rather tend to the captivation of the commons, or the comfort of the self-captive, and particularly well do they often serve as ambush for skirmishers. Where common sense apprehends the idea at once, or can "take it by violence," only common words are required.

By the testimony of "our spirit," I mean the attestation of conscience, the "consciousness" of a good conscience, of a "pious spirit," of renewed principles and affections; conscience being the fundamental moral endowment of the Holy Ghost. The conscience is the witness; goodness in the conscience is the thing witnessed; and consciousness is the perception of the testimony, the ear by which we hear the voice of the witness. And the testimony is borne to ourselves, i. e., to our souls—to our judgment, I would say, to be technical; but it may be questioned whether judgment ever acts alone in moral determinations; the testimony is borne to our mixed judgment. On the contact or rather coalescence of the words "conscience" and "consciousness," see Johnson, (3) on the former, from Bacon, Hooker, Denham, Pope; and do. (2) on the latter. That "in the New Testament the same word is used for both," is amiably granted by my opponent.

The other testimony is that of "the Spirit Itself," of the Spirit Himself, i. e. of the Spirit directly (not "indirectly") to the soul. Nothing less, I apprehend, will satisfy the apostle's language: very many things are attested by the Holy Ghost; but, besides revelation proper, with its contents and reflective proofs, only this one matter, with its minor cognates, by the Holy Ghost Himself. Hence I excluded the testimony of miracles, which are the indirect voice of the Spirit to our souls. And hence likewise, though J. W. M. be disappointed, must the testimony of scripture be excluded from this function; though its remoter witness is ample enough to fulfil all such passages as Heb. x. 15, &c., "whereof (perfecting for ever the sanctified) the Holy Ghost is a witness to us:" the convictions produced by scripture are, in themselves, an indirect operation of the Spirit on our souls. Miracles and the "written word" impress the soul through the medium of outward senses; while the Spirit Himself comes within these to the very human spirit; the "Spirit Itself" impresses the soul itself; and the impression is (humbly and modestly) known by us through our consciousness. Such was my meaning; and such, I think, is the unavoidable meaning of the inspired declaration on which I discoursed,—and well-informed minds, not preoccupied, will largely sustain me. Such an action of the Holy Ghost produced extraordinary inspiration; and such is the ordinary "inspiration of the Holy Spirit" by which "Almighty God cleanses the thoughts of our hearts," and which is named in Art. xiii. Against the abuse of this lofty truth, I hope I have sufficiently protested and guarded; and therefore I disallow any objection from that source,—though such objections have a natural immortality. Yet I will add, that abuses of theology, whether they be fanatical or cold, are more likely to result from shortsighted timorousness and shortcoming explanations, than from a frank and unstinted opening of "the whole counsel of God:" for, without this, we give a perpetual advantage to the mistaken persons, who, as in the present case, rising a step above us in sound exposition, have the whole upper flight to themselves. My friend J. W. M. must mount as high as truth ascends, if he would have an expanded view of what is cogitated, and of what may justly be cogitated, at such altitudes.

Holy affections, in their practical efficacy, are the witness of "our spirit,"—while, as sound and chastened emotions, they are "akin" to the voice of the Assuring Witness. There is "generic" affinity, proved by their common qualities and by their one origin.* Still, the latter (the assuring emotion) is distinguishable from the former,—just as college learning is from the learning of primary and common schools.

If Scripture were the Witness with "our spirit," it would, in this pre-eminent degree, testify to the soul many things besides the divine "sonship." St. Paul had "great heaviness and continual sorrow for his kinsmen, according to the flesh;" (Rom. ix.) that was his own testimony; and he placed it in scripture; and then "the Spirit Itself bore witness with his spirit," that he had sympathy for the unbelieving Jews! The Psalmist (lxxiii.) was "envious at the prosperity of the wicked;" this consciousness of "envy" he recorded in God's word; and then there was the "joint-witness," from above and from within, that he had yielded to this infirmity, though he overcame it without delay! David wrote, (xxxvi.) "The transgression of the wicked saith within my heart, that there is no fear of God before his eyes:" the holy man acknowledged the tendencies, felt and explored in his own heart, which certified him of this radical unsoundness of the ungodly; he spreads his conviction on the hallowed page; and, lo, he has the same inward, personal, heart-sustaining proof that these are "unfearing" rebels, that he has of being himself a "child of God!" and so has every good man, similarly conscious of the strivings of depravity, and with faith in this revealed declaration! Allowing Moses (not another prophet) to have penned the assertion, "the man Moses was very meek," &c., he had the twofold certifying (while another good man had the same of "hating with perfect hatred") of his surpassing "all the men upon the face of the earth" in government of the temper! Aged Solomon, in like manner, had the inestimable "joint-witness" for the very common estimate of the world by old and by disappointed persons, that "all is vanity and vexation of spirit;" and so in due proportion have I, and many a better man, including possibly J. W. M. himself: in each and all, under this construction of the words, as in Solomon, "the Spirit Itself beareth witness with our spirit," that the worldly lot is unsatisfying,—the highest devout assurance of one of the most general and least controverted opinions! and yet we may well believe, that Cain, and Judas, and Beau Brummell, and Benedict Arnold, and Aaron Burr were profoundly convinced of this doleful truth!—So much for forcing holy writ from its authentic position, and making it the Witness Within, when from its very nature it is the witness without, having the impregnable divine monument of miracles, but not claiming to be the intimate and very communion of Spirit with spirit.

On descending on his chief proof from scripture, (1 John v. 6-14,) J. W. M. is unaccountably wasteful of ingenuity. That passage declares that God gave a "record" of His Son, and that "the Spirit beareth witness," also, that "he that believeth on the Son of God hath the witness in himself:" and my critic pleasantly interweaves these propositions so as to make the Bible, the written "record," to be the "Spirit itself, bearing witness with our spirit." But his acuteness outstrikes his facts. 1. The Greek word for "record" is "witness or attestation,"—meaning eminently the testimony of miracles, to which the written "record" is subservient, as a document is attendant upon its seal: scripture is a subordinate point in that quotation. 2. The English word "record" does not always infer a writing: Moses calls "heaven and earth to record" concerning his fidelity, i. e. to bear it in remembrance, in whatever way; and Milton says that "eve and morn recorded the third day," and that "the

* J. W. M. objects to identity of origin (the Spirit) proving generic sameness: yet he insists that identity of the channel (consciousness) makes the witness of the Spirit (as I define it) one and confounded with the witness of "our spirit!"

lark records her hymns" (Johnson): to which I add, from a Concordance, "my record is on high"—"record of John," who wrote no scriptures—"John bare record"—"thou bearest record of thyself"—"tho' I bear record of Myself," yet He also Himself wrote no scriptures—"the people bare record," and the people wrote no scriptures—"I call God for a record"—"God is my record"—"record my Name,"—"I take you to record,"—and many more,—signifying mere attesting or memorating. 3. The phrase, "the Spirit beareth witness," is not the more significant declaration, "the Spirit Itself beareth witness," and the two must not be confounded. 4. So far as "the Spirit beareth witness" to the written "record" of God, which is not here excluded, He obviously does so (when not in the heart) by miracles,—the writing, and the attestation of the writing, are different; and miracles, including prophecy, are the only external attestation. 5. The "witness in himself," specified by the apostle, is evidently superadded to all the other testimony (or "record") mentioned; it is another thing,—a confirming divine testimony within of the whole divine testimony without, a confirmation superadded to the oral and written teaching of St. John, superadded to scripture at large, superadded even to miracles. Truth so exalted may startle half-thinkers. Yet I reaffirm, that exegesis and theology are but cripples, when they refuse the dutiful attendance—"whithersoever the Spirit was to go, they went, thither was their spirit to go."

Having decomposed J. W. M.'s appeal to the holy volume, (yet none the less grateful for his kindness,) I hope I need not trouble myself or my readers with his unremarkable speculative argumentation. Nor can I foresee a probability of my again handling steel [pens] in this debate.

THE FOUNT OF LIFE.

I saw a young and lovely female standing by the side of a deep cistern, gazing intently upon the glittering circles, made by the occasional falling of the perfume laden flowers which overhung its brink. There was an air of restlessness about her, which told of a mind at war with itself. Her cheek was very pale, and wet with the tears which fell from her dark, beautiful eyes. Suddenly she dashed them away, and said in a determined voice—"Yes, I will taste of the well of pleasure; what can be more inviting than these cool waters? surely they will satisfy my longings." She bent her head, and drank; and while so engaged, thought only of the present gratification, and perceived not the dark troubled pool made by the water which flowed from one side of the cistern, which was broken. She saw not the shape of Darkness, that was concealed among the tall, noxious weeds which grew around; nor heard his laugh of fiendish triumph at the success of his temptation. For a little while she seemed refreshed. Her eyes sparkled with unnatural brilliancy, and the golden sunshine cast a bright radiance around her; and she remained as if fascinated by the unholy spells of the place. But the sun went down; the darkness gathered round her in thick mists; the shades of sorrow and affliction again visited her fair countenance. The clouds grew darker; she covered her face, and wept in anguish; and as she did so, I heard a low clear voice say, "Call upon me in time of trouble, so will I hear thee, and thou shalt praise me." She sighed sadly, and said, "O that I could do so! O that I might reach the fountain of living waters! but I cannot." But the clouds became lighter—time healed her grief—again the sun shone, though with a dimmer ray, and again she drank from the broken cistern. But it was a forced gaiety that illumined her lovely countenance; and I could see that ever and anon her eye glanced with an expression of painful interest at a bright fountain, the same toward which her desires turned in the night of sorrow. I looked in the same direction, and beheld its bright waters surrounded by a halo of glory. The sound of their murmurs was peaceful and soul cheering, and they seemed to utter words like these—

"Come, weary pilgrim, taste the stream of life;

Earth's broken cisterns are with sorrow rife;

Their waters cannot quench the soul's desire;

Come to the fount which for all sin is open,

Receive the gift of Jesus' love the token,

And taste of joys which ne'er the spirit tire.

Eternal life is thine, a place in pastures green

Beside still waters, glories no eye hath seen,

Nor ear hath heard, nor heart of man conceived;

If to the stream of life thou find'st the road,

Which ever maketh glad the City of our God,

Thou shalt be blest, when to that Paradise received."

Here, thought I, she can quench her thirst—surely she will go. But I looked at the road; it was through the deep valleys of self-abasement—the streams of penitence and thorns of self-denial; and she shrunk back appalled at the prospect. Her own pride and self-will, and confidence, she could not cast away; and the fear of the world's contempt kept her back. My heart yearned towards her, and I longed to point to the bright figure of Hope, the holy forms of Faith and Love, hovering over those lowly paths;—but my lips were sealed. She seemed very sorrowful, and said, "but there is none to help, nor to hear my supplications for aid, and I cannot go alone." The voice again sounded, "Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling; and as thy day is, so shall thy strength be." She resolved to try: with downcast eyes, and arms folded over her bosom, as if to still its flutterings, she advanced; at first with slow and uncertain steps; but she found that the effort once made, she was supported by an unseen Power. Onward she went, and encouraged by Hope, she passed through the deep vales of Humiliation; and though the waters of Penitence threatened to overwhelm her, she clasped the hand of Faith, and smiled through her tears, her eyes lighted with a beam of Love divine. She came to the fountain, and there sounded the gracious invitation, "Let him that is athirst come; and whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely."

She heard, and accepted, and was satisfied; for she felt that within her "was a well of peace, springing up into everlasting life."

CHURCH OF THE MEDIATOR.

Friends who have contributed so freely to this mission church, in the southwest part of the city, will be encouraged by the progress already made. The lot (Schuylkill 4th and Lombard streets) has been purchased, and the money paid. A neat building has been erected upon the rear for the Sunday school, and 200 are now receiving regular religious instruction in the three departments. The cost of this also has been paid. In the lower story, service is held every Sunday morning, and the room is filled with an attentive congregation. On Sunday last, the first Communion was administered to about twenty resident communicants, several others partaking also.

It now remains to erect the church, which being of stone, and without a basement, and with careful regard to economy will cost $5000. A portion of this sum is not yet subscribed, but the vestry have determined, with the money in hand, to put up the walls and roof them in, and have adopted a plan, and made their contracts for that purpose. The foundation is in progress, and it is expected that the corner-stone will be laid by the Bishop of the diocese on the 31st July, of which further notice will be given. To complete the edifice when once covered in, the vestry look with confidence to those who appreciate the nature of such an undertaking, and the wants of the community.

Few can go through that part of the city and know something of the good already apparent, without a feeling of gratitude to God for his blessing already vouchsafed, and the strong conviction that this church is to be, in His hands, an instrument of unspeakable good.

About $7000 have been already freely subscribed, and as the vestry have resolved to avoid debts, and pay as the work advances, they will be able, with $2000 more, to furnish that portion of the city with a neat Episcopal church, seating six hundred persons, having its Sunday school attached, without debt or ground-rent, and calling for no purchase of pews or pew tax other than a moderate contribution from the congregation, for the support of the ministry, &c. Any further contributions will be thankfully received by the Rector, by Mr. J. H. Hildeburn, accounting warden, 72 Market street, or by any member of the vestry.

SOUTH TRENTON, JULY 14, 1849.

MR. EDITOR:—

Will you allow me to acknowledge, through your valuable paper, the receipt of ten dollars from some anonymous friend in Philadelphia, for the parish of St. Paul, South Trenton? It may be gratifying to those who have contributed to building our new church, to know that the most sanguine hopes of its friends seem likely to be realized, notwithstanding the depression in manufactures, which has thrown the greater part of our population out of employment for several months, and prevented many worthy persons from attending service; because they will not be persuaded to attend in common clothes, with nothing to contribute at the Sunday offerings. The congregations are unexpectedly large and attentive, and the collections respectable.

At present we are making an effort to clear off the weight of our debt, which, if we succeed, will leave us with an amount which we can easily bear, without checking the prosperity of the parish. The anonymous ten dollars will be devoted to that object, and leave us within two hundred dollars of the attainment of our end. If we succeed, we are secured against all ordinary contingencies, and a church will be firmly established in a position where many of the children of our mother Church are already collected, and where many more must come. In securing for them the means of attending the services of their own church, and in providing for them the benefits of the pastoral care they have been accustomed to, we repay in some measure the debt we owe to the English Church.

Such a congregation has claims not only upon the diocese in which it is located, but upon the Church at large. All who feel our indebtedness to the Church which fostered our infancy, may be supposed thankful for an opportunity to express their sense of indebtedness. And, sir, if you will allow me, I will offer such an opportunity to your readers, assuring them that there are many here who need and are willing to receive the fostering care of the Church, and that a little given now will secure our firm establishment.

Your obedient servant,

Rev. B. FRANKLIN.

Obituary.

For the Banner of the Cross.

Departed, in the communion of the Holy Church, on the morning of June 30th, near Spring Hill, Somerset co., Md., MARY ELLEN WALLER, in the 22d year of her mortal life, after a brief illness of four days.

The pious and exemplary youth, whose sudden call to "the long home of man" has filled the hearts of many with the deepest grief, only the Sunday before she "fell asleep in Jesus," was among the number who received the holy communion at the altar of St. Paul's church, Spring Hill. She joined with fervour and devotion in the services at the Festival of St. John the Baptist. Among those who sung "Glory be to Thee, O Lord," before the Gospel, her voice was heard; and she bowed with reverence to receive the emblems of the body and blood of the Redeemer.

It was her last festival on earth—her last hymn of praise—her last communion with the Church militant. The next Sunday came, and at sunset hour we consigned her remains to the silent grave, there to await the resurrection of the just. Deprived by the extremity of her sickness, and the nature of her disease, from partaking, at the bed of death, of the Supper of the Lord, she was reminded by her Pastor of the services of the previous Sunday, and exhorted to look unto Jesus the Lamb of God, for aid and comfort in the hour of distress. She expressed a willingness to depart, and said, "Christ is better to me than all the world." A few moments before her decease, the solemn commendatory prayer was said, and as the soul left its frail tenement of clay, her minister alone beside her, pronounced "Into Thy hand I commend her spirit, O Lord, thou God of Truth." Weep not for the departed, but rather for the living. Weep for the young stricken hearts, who by the loss of one parent, and the mental infirmity of the other, were wont to lean upon each other. Weep for the two brothers, who miss from the hearth of home all that tender care and that sacred joy which was imparted by the presence of an only sister.

Yet let us not sorrow as those without hope. Again shall ye meet; again shall ye be joined, no more to part. Let a solemn warning to the young come from the new-made grave. "Be ye also ready." Let her meek and pious deportment, her early choice of the Saviour in Confirmation and Communion, direct the thoughts of her companions to the importance of immediate attention to every Christian duty; and happy will it be for them if the Sunday before they enter "the place of departed spirits," they are found at the holy table of Christ."

Died, at her country residence, in Burlington, New Jersey, on the morning of Sunday, July 8th, Mrs. SUSAN WALLACE, widow of the late John Bradford Wallace, Esqr., and sister of the Hon. Horace Binney. Mrs. Wallace was born the 22d of February, 1778, and was the daughter of Dr. Barnabas Binney, originally of Boston, afterwards of this city—a physician of eminent virtues and ability—and a surgeon in active employment in the army during the war of the revolution.

In consequence of the death of both her parents, during her childhood, Mrs. Wallace was principally indebted to her paternal aunt, wife of the Hon. Nicholas Brown, of Providence, R. I., for her early training. In the example of this estimable lady she saw acted out in daily life, those principles of household order, those precepts of exalted morality, and that happy discipline of mind which subjects feeling to reason, which were so highly illustrated in her own character. In all these qualities, in the qualities which first fill and adorn the sphere we were made to move in, and then extend on to a more artificial and expanded world in well doing, she has left an example of the truest style of woman. Of her obligations to Mrs. Brown, personally, and morally and intellectually, Mrs. Wallace at all times spoke, as the inestimable and continuing blessing of her life. She could not be ungrateful for such a blessing or misapprehend its extent.

Her health had been declining and precarious for several years. In the death of her excellent and distinguished husband, and in the more recent death of that most accomplished lady her daughter, the late Mrs. Macalester, Mrs. Wallace had a grief that could not fail to affect her health. A wife and mother could hardly lose more than she did—the truest solace and glory of earthly being. Yet she bore these trials with singular patience, and ripened under them in every Christian grace. No person could see her in her last years without being struck with the clearness and force of her mind, her cheerful grace and dignity under so much bodily infirmity.

Removed, according to her custom at this season, to her country residence at Burlington, in New Jersey, she was in the enjoyment of her usual vigour until the day preceding her departure, when a slight attack of illness almost immediately prevailed over the powers of her system. In the presence of her affectionate children, and of her kind friend and physician, Dr. Horner—with a serenity more perfect than living slumber, she breathed her last.

Her remains were removed to her residence in Philadelphia, and thence taken for interment, on Wednesday morning, to the family vault in St. Peter's church yard, beside the remains of her husband, beneath the marble on which an inscription of her own hand, in lines of striking fitness and grandeur, had recently given testimony of her profound conviction of his unequalled virtues.

Thus has passed away from the scene of life one that I knew well, and knew only to admire. I cannot speak of her in terms suitable to my conceptions. No praise befits the character or the taste of such a person but a truthful and grateful mention of her virtues. These were so numerous and so marked that any just mention of them will seem to border on exaggeration. She was a model of a woman. Her elevation was such, that seen through the distance of a slight or formal acquaintance, it might be mistaken for pride or austerity. But there are many persons of even humble condition who can testify with what ease and readiness she could appreciate the feelings and merits of all. So various were her accomplishments, so profound, ready, and discerning her mind, that whether approached by the most humble, the most refined and fashionable, or the most intelligent and learned persons, she was never at a loss to assume any manner or join in any conversation suitable to their taste and position.

Her mind was conversant with principles, and from these she could start out on any subject, detect its nature and define its limits. She was always entertaining and instructive. Nothing could be said in her presence which she would fail to appreciate justly. She was severely just, severely conscientious. She had all the impulsiveness of woman, all the sensibilities of a cultivated nature, yet all were under discipline and right control, and thus added grace, worth, and certainty to all the virtues of life.

She was in the habit of acknowledging her obligations for the rules of action that governed her to the excellent lady with whom her early years were spent. But those who knew her husband well, and could understand him, or who have heard her describe his qualities of mind and heart, will see much of the forming influence of her character in his example. No woman could speak and write of her husband as she did, without having had a living realization of the original. Mrs. Wallace could say nothing if there was nothing to speak of. She could not be earnest and eloquent without cause to be so. After describing his various excellencies, and owning the greatness of her loss, she adds, "I must admit God has still left me permanent benefits and inexhaustible consolations. The character and qualities of my late husband, I reckon among the most precious of these. To honour those who honoured him, will ever be among the most valued gratifications that now remain to me."

Again she says of him in words so comprehensive and discriminating, and at the same time so expressive of her own character that I cannot forbear adopting them as a part of her just eulogy, and as more indicative of mind than the writing of volumes might be. "To impart and extend what he loved, was the law of his life." What better definition of philanthropy and happy living could be given? After quoting Paley as saying, "It is the interest of all men to conciliate affection," she adds, "Abilities, and knowledge, and great accomplishments, always give power; but power, devoid of social cement, and centered in self advancement and illustration, is ever without its proper influence, or confidence or recompense; a cold assumption of superior advantages which places others at a painful distance, and repels rather than attracts allegiance and service. It can be cheated by the innumerable omissions of even the humblest of men, and secretly deprived of the instrumental agency which it is often important for them to give. It is disturbed by the rivalry and competition of all who may aspire to its level, and surrounds itself by an atmosphere, deleterious to the peaceful products of the healthful affections. It finally gathers itself on a sterile pre-eminence, where gradually settled above the invigorating action of natural life and love, it languishes in the desolation of unimpaired grandeur, and unapproachable distinction. Such power at best is cheerless, and in the day of its decline it finds no sympathy, no ready help, and walks on in its narrow path, without that best companionship of the unfortunate, the pleasurable sense of reflected benefits. With unquestionable qualifications for all that invites to station, reputation, and honour, this generous man counted them at their true price; and always in subservience to the extended means of doing good, and the improvement and exercise of his own virtues. The stamp on all his characteristics was of essential not extrinsic value. Hence his enjoyments as well as his estimates, were above the accidents of life." Thus wrote this excellent woman of her excellent husband! Who could say so much in so little, and say it so well? An epitome of the moral system under which we live, its range, its penalties, its best rewards told in a word!

I feel that I shall not do the character of Mrs. Wallace justice or value her for what she valued herself most, if I fail to speak of her as a model of a wife, in all duties that pertained to her household. It is a common notion that great powers and attainments tempt their possessors to go out of their sphere for influence and pleasure. It was not so with her. She was too great to feel such a temptation. In the order and harmony of her own sphere she saw the greatness and found the happiness of destiny. She was scrupulously observant of all the compliances of dutiful affection. She was alike the mistress and the subject of law in her house; and what to less noble and cultivated natures might seem like undue subjection, was in her the truest dignity and the amplest power of control. With her resources and her instincts of fitness, she could afford to condescend, and was all the more noble and happy for doing so. Who that was ever in her house could fail to see that the very genius of order, neatness, and grace, reigned there? I honour her for this her example; I see in it how great she truly was; and if it is the fitting good we do which lives longest and makes us the truest models, she has attained a distinction, which no words can exalt and no time efface with adequate admirers. Happy illustration of the wisdom and benevolence of all first designs, when not frustrated by those appointed to fulfil them! But it should not be forgotten that she had a husband whom to obey was mastery; his exactions were as suggestions of her own, not his—the reciprocal action of excellence in subject and in object.

Of her religious character, so blended as it is with all that I have written or known of her, little more need be said. She had a Church mind and a Church growth, comprising a right living from the principles that constrain and ensure it. There was no ostentation, no obtrusion about it, but when any special occasion or official relation prompted her to speak it was seen to be as life within life—a fountain of being which could have due expansion only when relieved from mortal constraints. Her loss will long be felt in this city and in the Church. Her merits will brighten and magnify as they are viewed through the distance of time. The many who enjoyed her intimate converse will realize in all the comparisons of life that a vacancy has occurred which none can fill. I have thus tried to speak of her life and qualities in such a way as to make them profitable to the living, which, if I have succeeded in doing, is the best use she would have made of them, and the only praise she would welcome.

DEATH UPON THE OCEAN.

BY D. C. BARTLETT.

We find the following sketch in an exchange paper. It is one which the reader of taste or feeling ought not to overlook:

Upon a recent voyage from Liverpool to New York, I became intimately acquainted with a young man, a fellow passenger who was going on a visit to America. When I first saw him, I was struck with his appearance. He was of a slender make, with a glorious forehead, and eyes of delicate blue. His hair was light, auburn in its color, and his countenance expressed a nobility and frankness that is rarely found. We were introduced, and from some cause became quite intimate. I soon found that we possessed mutual friends in England. He had come from one of the best families of the upper stratum of what is called the middle class of English society. It is not strange that we became intimate, for I loved his native land, and he loved mine. Upon the pleasant moonlight nights, we sat upon the quarter deck, conversing about the land, the homes, and the friends we were leaving—of England's poets and statesmen; or, shifting the scenes, of our own New England, or the broad expansive West, with its everlasting prairies. Often the unwelcome sounds of the midnight bells broke upon us, ere we had finished our conversation, so pleasantly had passed the evening away. He was not long in gaining the friendship of all his fellow cabin passengers.

After we had been out a few days, I missed him one morning from his accustomed place at the breakfast table. I did not see him on the deck during the morning, nor at the dinner table. When I visited his state room, to my surprise I found him lying on his berth quite ill, with the surgeon in attendance. He had experienced, in the night, a severe attack from a dangerous disease, and was already very much prostrated. He was glad to see me, and seemed to be in good spirits. Tears came into his eyes when I took his hand, and he wished a fellow passenger who was a clergyman, to read a portion of the Scriptures to him. It was the first time I had seen him low spirited, and it was the last. The clergyman came and read a solemn psalm to him, and his sadness left him—even he was joyful hearted.

The change that had come over him, in a single night, was miraculous. His fair brow was covered with a damp as chill as death, and his auburn hair was clotted with moisture. But his pure blue eyes had not altered—they had the same affectionate, half-sad, half-joyous expression that they had always worn. The flush had disappeared from his cheeks, for his anguish had been great during the night. I took his hand in mine, but dared not speak, for fear of betraying the emotion of my heart. He said, with a singularly calm and clear voice: "I am going to die, my friend,—but I am not afraid." A pressure was gone from my spirits at once. "I wish to give my friends a few trifles—and if you will call the captain, I will tell you to which I wish them given." I called him, and he continued calmly; "My gold watch I wish my sister Emma to have, and my silver one—give that to Georgy, my little brother Georgy, and my rifle let it be kept for him until he is old enough to use it. Give to Meggy the ring on my little finger. To my mother"—his voice faltered when he came to her, and tears crept down his pallid cheeks. "Ah, she was a good mother! Give back the Bible that she gave me, and tell her that her boy did not fear to die?" All else he bequeathed to his father to dispose of as he pleased. The captain left the room, and he said, looking earnestly up in my face: "Write to my mother when I am dead, and tell her that everybody was kind to me, and that I had every attention,"—(how tender and thoughtful was this wish of his to save his mother's heart from pain!) "that I did not fear death. Tell Meggy that I love her in death; you should see her, she has such soft, meek eyes, and her hair curls so beautifully about her fair forehead. Poor Meggy! And—and—there is one of whom I have not spoken, Mary—: I was engaged to her—give my best ring to her, and tell her I hope to meet her in heaven." Becoming exhausted, I left him for a short time. When I came back, he said: "I wish once more to see the ocean, in whose depths my grave will soon be made; let me gaze at it once more!" Alas, he was too weak to be raised upon deck—poor fellow! And then he wished a bucket of sea water brought to him. His eyes were suffused with a smile when he saw it. He put his hand in it, and bathed his forehead, saying, I could hardly tell whether sadly or joyously: "Soon shall my body be in the dark blue sea." There was something magnificent in that self-baptism of his—his fearlessness was so triumphant over death.

All the day the wind had been increasing in strength, and at night it blew a hurricane. Towards midnight the sea became frightful—the waves dancing over us amidships, or striking our side, sounding like heavy thunder. Many of the passengers were frightened, nearly all. They were up, and, when the captain came down into the cabin, they gathered about him, with anxious eyes and earnest questions. I was up all night with the dying one—some of the time holding him in his berth; a part of the time he lay in my arms. He was perfectly calm, and his fearlessness was a rebuke to those who were pale with fright from the storm. At day-break it had reached its height; at daylight the poor young man said: "I thank you all for your kindness to me—farewell, for ever!" and died.

The storm went suddenly down, and the next morning there was a perfect calm, and the canvass was idly flapping in the air. The sun shone calmly upon the beautiful sea—the air was balmy, like that of the south; but we were all sad, for we were to see what few of us had ever seen before—a sea burial. I will not describe the ceremony, for abler pens than mine have done so. I will say nothing of the little band that sadly stood at the gangway, and saw the corpse stretched upon the death plank; of the horrid plunge of the body into the mysterious ocean—nothing. All that gentle day, little parties were clustered together, talking about the poor young man. All of us were sad.

When the evening came on, and the full moon shone upon us with a lustrous purity, I went out upon the quarter-deck, and mused long upon the young man, his English home, and those who dwelt there. His mother perhaps, was praying at that moment, a safe voyage for him—a happy sojourn in the New World, a happy, O! how happy! return; but the sea was his mother now, poor woman! His dear Meggy "with her hair curling beautifully about her brow," lay, at that moment, perhaps kissing him in her dreams. Dream on Meggy! too soon will you wake to the stern agonies of life! Then I thought of the time when every post would be eagerly watched by this home, for they expected a letter from him. And a letter does come, with a foreign post-mark, but in a strange hand. The father grows pale, as he looks at it; the mother, watching his countenance, anxiously asks why he is pale. He hands the letter to her, and she covers up her face and shudders. They dare not open it. The brother does, and reads—the letter that I wrote to them. Shivered, in a moment, are all their beautiful hopes, and they weep in anguish—and Meggy! she is out among the flowers playing, they have not told her; the brother goes to her, and says: "Come to me, Meggy," the girl runs to him, and he bursts into tears—he cannot tell her what he wishes. He grows stronger, and he tells her that her brother is dead, and is buried in the blue ocean, and will never come back. She asks sadly: "Will he never, never come back?" "Never, Meggy,"—and the beautiful child cries as if its heart would break; but the dark ocean will not heed its cries, nor its mother's, but hugs him as a trophy in its embrace.

Selections.

THE REV. PIERCE CONNELLY.

The Rev. Pierce Connelly has assumed a position of some notoriety. Mr. Connelly is a native of the United States, we believe of Delaware, and notwithstanding his Romish-sounding name, by birth and education a Presbyterian. He however united himself to the Church, in which he took orders. Whether this took place before or after his marriage, and whether his wife was originally a member of the Church or not, we do not know; but he is a married man and the father of three children. In the year 1835 both he and his wife were perverted to the Church of Rome. Of course he denied his orders; and we recollect him advertised, some years afterwards, as Pierce Connelly, Esquire, to deliver a speech of some kind in the so called Cathedral of Baltimore, during the meeting of one of our diocesan Conventions in that city. His Romish managers were unable to deny themselves the paltry triumph, as the price of preserving that consistency in maintaining the distinctions between the laity and the clergy, and between consecrated and unconsecrated buildings, upon which they affect so much to pride themselves. He afterwards chose to take orders, and separated from his wife by mutual consent, under the authority of Pope Gregory XVI. He took orders, she became a nun, of a new order founded by herself, and both of course took vows of celibacy. He has now commenced, in the court of Arches, which is held by authority of the Archbishop of Canterbury, in whose diocese she lives, a proceeding to compel her under pain of ecclesiastical censures, to live with him. She refuses, and defends herself under the authority of the Pope, which it seems quite impossible that the court of the Archbishop of Canterbury should recognize; while that court may find some difficulty in enforcing its decree against her should it make one.

"The Tablet," is of course very indignant at Mr. Connelly's course, and devotes a long article to abusing him in good set terms. Mr. Connelly it seems was chaplain to the Earl of Shrewsbury, and is supposed to have aided and counselled him, in the attempt which he made to expose the murderous conduct of certain Irish priests, in exciting their ignorant congregations to violence. This conduct the Romish authorities dared not punish, for fear of losing influence, and therefore found it necessary to deny. Lord Shrewsbury thought the truth the best policy, and if Mr. Connelly concurred with him, it is in a Scottish phrase, "no the worst thing we have heard of him." It is however considered a great offence in the eyes of "The Tablet." That paper also charges him with a similar enormity in attacking, in "Dolman's Magazine," Mr. Faber's absurd "Life of St. Rose of Lima," and exposing the folly, blasphemy and idolatry of that ridiculous and wicked production, of which we gave some account in our last volume.

It is well known that Mr. Connelly was sent by Lord Shrewsbury to Rome, in a sort of quasi diplomatic capacity. "The Tablet," intimates that the objects of this journey were threefold, two of them being personal. The first "to procure in the rules of his wife's order such a change as would allow him to have the management of it in his own hands; to stand to it in the character of a patron and director and to have the comfort of habitual amicable intercourse with his wife." The other personal object, was the Cardinalate, a thing which seems hardly credible. Of the remaining one of the threefold objects of the journey, "The Tablet" speaks thus: "A second object of his journey was supposed to be the diplomatic relations bill, which was then under discussion; and certain stories of letters misdirected and misdelivered in Rome, were current a year ago, and seemed to implicate him in the Whig plot against the Church."

A little while after the writer says: "Whatever his business in Rome, and we vouch absolutely for none of these stories, though they all rest on very good authority—his failure was egregious. He was not made director of his wife's convent; he made no way in upholding the Whig diplomatic intrigue; he got no votes for the Cardinal's hat; but on the contrary, being caught tripping in his sermons, once or twice, he had to make a public recantation or explanation of his heretical expositions, and it is supposed, left Rome rather less elated than when he entered it."

The tone of these extracts, and indeed of the whole article, shows that the usual Romish policy is to be resorted to, and Mr. Connelly's character is to be blackened, because he is no longer an obedient servant of the Church, into which he had been seduced. But the strangest part of the story is the following sentence. "It is however generally believed, that Mr. Connelly does not pretend to renounce the faith but only the morals of the Church; that he does not avow apostasy, nor deny his character as a priest, but seeks to combine with his peculiar position of Catholic Ecclesiastic, the violation of engagements which every gentleman and man of honor would consider binding, and full license to commit the crime which his religion calls incest and to involve his wife in the same hideous ruin." Now we are not at all surprised that Mr. Connelly, supposing his conscience to have been awakened, should renounce the morals of a Church which has permitted him to violate and dissolve engagements, which not only "every gentleman and man of honor would consider binding," but which the express words of our Blessed Lord, and the law of the Church of Rome herself, declare indissoluble, and which gives the name of incest to that which the Apostle pronounces undefiled. A Church, which, moreover, allowed both him and his wife to agree to desert their offspring, whose years must then have been tender. It would be difficult to find a case in which the law of God was made void by the traditions of men more clearly than this. OUR SAVIOUR said, "Full well ye reject the commandment of God that ye may keep your own tradition. For Moses said, Honor thy father and thy mother, and whoso curseth father or mother let him die the death. But ye say, If a man say to his father or mother, It is Corban, that is to say a gift, by whatsoever thou mightest be profited by me; he shall be free. And ye suffer him no more to do ought for his father or his mother: Making the Word of God of none effect by your traditions which ye have delivered."—Mark vii. 9-13.

Now here is a case almost exactly parallel. The Word of God directs parents to bring up their children "in the nurture and admonition of the Lord"—Eph. vi. 4; but the Church of Rome allowed Mrs. Connelly to abandon this duty, because she had made herself "Corban." We repeat that we do not think it strange, that Mr. Connelly should have renounced such morals; but we do think it strange, that he should not have renounced the doctrines upon which they are built, which "The Tablet" absurdly calls the faith of the Church.—True Catholic.

THE INQUISITION.

Our readers will remember an account of the interior of the Roman Inquisition, which we published some weeks since. That exploration of the secret chambers, and the historical investigations attendant upon it, brought some strange facts to light.

"The person of most note found in the prisons of the inquisition was a bishop named Kasner, who had been in confinement for about twenty years. He related that he arrived in Rome from the Holy Land, having in his possession papers which had belonged to an ecclesiastic there. Passing himself for that person, he succeeded in surprising the court of Rome into ordaining and consecrating him a bishop. The fraud was afterwards discovered, and Kasner, being then on his way to Palestine, was arrested and brought to the prison of the Holy Office, where he expected to have ended his days—less, as he expressed himself, to expiate his own fraud than the gross blunder of the court of Rome, which had no other means of concealing his character of bishop, its own absolute laws preventing his being deprived of it."

The Memorials of the Roman Government relative to the suppression of the Inquisition thus concludes:

"In a few categories we may sum up the results of this inquiry:

1. That the Court of Rome availed itself of the tribunal of the Holy Office for temporal and political ends.

2. That to succeed in its purposes the Holy Office had especial recourse to confession, of which it made the most enormous and abominable abuse, not only violating its secrecy but tampering with its integrity.

3. By means of confession the most odious licentiousness was insinuated into the confessionals. With this branch the Holy Office occupied itself with extraordinary diligence, but without finding a remedy for the causes of such scandal.

4. That the Holy Office corrupted all classes, buying information and secrets.

5th, and lastly. That the ecclesiastical nuncios at foreign courts are in constant correspondence with the Holy Office, and, from possessing means of procuring intelligence quite peculiar to themselves, keep the Court of Rome informed of the most hidden political secrets."—Calendar

THE STRANGER'S VISIT.

The following narrative, says an exchange paper, is copied from the Christian Penny Magazine, a periodical published in London. The occurrence took place at a Sunday-School in East Grinstead, a small town in the south of England,

Just as we were all busily engaged in our Sunday-School, a few Sabbaths ago, the door was quietly opened by a respectably dressed person; he said to the superintendent: "I hope, sir, I shall not disturb the proceedings of the school by my visit. I am a stranger here: still I feel a desire to look into the Sunday-school, and, if you will allow me, I will just go round, and see how the classes are getting on. I am a teacher myself, and feel a deep interest in the instruction of the young." The superintendent assured the stranger that he was always glad to see a brother teacher, and hoped he would feel quite at home as he visited the classes. The time allowed for teaching quickly passed away, and the children were to be seen quietly seated in the body of the chapel.

It was usual at this school to give the children a short address before they were dismissed. On this occasion the superintendent asked the stranger, if he would be kind enough to say a few words to the children; adding that the words of a stranger would be more likely to engage their attention. The unknown visitor cheerfully consented; he came forward and spoke as follows:—

"My dear children, many years ago there used to be side-galleries to this place of worship; and in that corner," said he, pointing to the right, "there used to sit a little boy by the side of his mother. So sure as the Sabbath came, so sure was this lad and his mother to be seen in their places in the gallery. This boy was also a scholar in the Sunday-school. His mother was a pious woman, and she used often to teach her little son to pray: she would instruct him in the Scriptures, and try her utmost to lead him to love the Saviour. Although this good woman felt so great a concern for her son's eternal happiness, she was not permitted to continue her good work; she became sick, grew worse, and very shortly died. This was a severe loss to the poor little boy; his dear mother was dead, and it seemed to him as though he had lost his all; he had a father, but he was not pious, and cared little about bringing his child up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. Soon after the death of this boy's mother, he was removed away to a distance; and as he advanced in years, it is sad to relate, he became a companion of unsteady youths, and very soon forgot the pious counsels of his dear mother and kind teachers. He obtained a situation in a manufactory, where there were nearly fifty men employed; and these were nearly all ungodly characters; they were swearers, drunkards, and infidels. While in this unfavorable situation he very nearly lost the fear of God, and became a wicked young man; he went to great lengths in sin, and appeared in the high road to ruin. So forgetful was he of the day of judgment, and its awful consequences, that he made up his mind to have a merry life if it were a short one. He had now gone so far in the downward course that there seemed no hope of him: all the good instructions which were given him in his youth appeared wholly lost. In the midst of this course of folly and sin he was seized with a severe illness. There he lay amidst his sufferings, and it became doubtful whether he would recover. He now began to reflect; he thought of death and eternity, and then on his past wicked life, and he saw how unprepared he was to meet God. He called to mind the days of his youth: he remembered the Sunday-school and his pious mother, and he felt how ungrateful and wicked he had been; he then resolved, if it should please God to spare his life, and permit him once more to enjoy his health, he would alter his whole course. The Lord, who is full of mercy, did recover him, and he kept his promise; he sought and obtained pardon, and yielded his heart and his all to Christ; he broke off from his old companions, and followed no more the way of transgressors; he soon entered the Sunday-School, and found a real pleasure in the work of teaching; he continued firm in the service of God, and could truly say, 'The ways of religion are my delight.' After some years, this once wicked, but now pious young man, had occasion to come within a few miles of his native place, and feeling a strong desire to see his old Sunday-school, he determined to pay it a visit; and here," said the stranger, as all eyes were fixed on him, "here you see the individual whose history I have been relating: I shall never forget my Sunday-school, nor my pious mother." He then affectionately warned the children, from his own history, to shun bad company, and lay hold of instruction; and after delivering a word of encouragement to his fellow-teachers, he concluded with an earnest prayer, that the Lord would continue to bless Sunday-schools, and render them the means of training thousands of souls for heaven.

FUNERAL OF A SLAVE.

Travelling recently on business, in the interior of Georgia, I reached, just at sunset, the mansion of the proprietor, through whose estate, for the last half hour of my journey, I had pursued my way. My tired companion pricked his ears, and with a low whinny indicated his pleasure as I turned up the broad avenue leading to the house. Calling to a black boy in view, I made him inquire of his owner if I could be accommodated with lodgings for the night.

My request brought the proprietor himself to the door, and from thence to the gate, when, after a scrutinizing glance at my person, and equipments, he inquired my name, business, and destination. I promptly responded to his questions, and he invited me to alight and enter the house, in the true spirit of southern hospitality.

He was apparently 30 years of age, and evidently a man of education and refinement. I soon observed an air of gloomy abstraction about him; he said but little, and even that little seemed the result of an effort to obviate the seeming want of civility to a stranger. At supper, the mistress of the mansion appeared, and did the honours of the table, in her particular department; she was exceedingly lady-like and beautiful. She retired immediately after supper, and a servant handing some splendid Habannas on a small silver tray, we had seated ourselves comfortably before the enormous fire of oak wood, when a servant appeared at the end door near my host, hat in hand, and uttered, in subdued but distinct tones, the, to me, startling words:

'Master, de coffin hab come.'

'Very well,' was the only reply, and the servant disappeared.

My host remarked my gaze of inquisitive wonder, and replied to it—

'I have been sad, sad,' said he, 'to-day. I have had a greater misfortune than I have experienced since my father's death. I lost this morning the truest and most reliable friend I had in the world—one whom I have been accustomed to honour and respect since my earliest recollection; he was the playmate of my father's youth, and the Mentor of mine; a faithful servant, an honest and sincere christian. I stood by his bedside to-day, and with his hands clasped in mine, I heard the last words he uttered; they were, 'Master, meet me in heaven.'

His voice faltered a moment, and he continued after a pause, with increased excitement:—

'His loss is a melancholy one to me. If I left home, I said to him, "John, see that all things are taken care of," and I knew that my wife and child, property and all, were as safe as though they were guarded by a hundred soldiers. I never spoke a harsh word to him in all my life, for he never merited it. I have a hundred others, many of them faithful and true, but his loss is irreparable.'

I came from a section of the Union where slavery does not exist, and I brought with me all the prejudices which so generally prevail in the Free States in regard to this 'institution.' I had already seen much to soften these, but the observation of years would have failed to give me so clear an insight into the relation between master and servant as this simple incident. It was not the haughty planter, the lordly tyrant, talking of his dead slave as of his dead horse, but the kind hearted gentleman, lamenting the loss and eulogizing the virtues of his good old friend.

After an interval of silence, my host resumed:

'There are,' said he, 'many of the old man's relatives and friends who would wish to attend his funeral. To afford them opportunity, several plantations have been notified, that he will be buried; some, I presume, have already arrived; and desiring to see that all things are properly prepared for his interment, I trust you will excuse my absence a few moments.'

'Most certainly, sir; but,' I added, 'if there is no impropriety, I would be pleased to accompany you.'

'There is none,' he replied; and I followed him to one of a long row of cabins, situated at the distance of some 300 yards from the mansion. The house was crowded with negroes;—all arose on our entrance, and many of them exchanged greeting with my host, in tones that convinced me that they felt he was an object of sympathy from them. The corpse was deposited in the coffin, attired in a shroud of the finest cotton materials, and the coffin itself was painted black.

The master stopped at his head, and laying his hand upon the cold brow of his faithful bondsman, gazed long and intently upon features with which he had been long so familiar, and which he now looked upon for the last time on earth; raising his eyes at length and glancing at the serious countenances now bent upon him, he said with much feeling—

'He was a faithful servant and true Christian; if you follow his example and live as he lived, none of you need fear when the time comes for you to lie here.'

A patriarch, with the snow of 80 winters on his head, answered—

'Master, it is true, and we will try to live like him.'

There was a murmur of general assent, and, after giving some instructions relative to the burial, we returned to the building.

About nine o'clock a servant appeared with the notice that they were ready to move, and to know if further instructions were necessary. My host remarked, to me that, by stepping into the piazza, I would probably see, to me, a novel scene. The procession had moved, and its route led within a few yards of the mansion. There were 150 negroes, arranged four deep, and following a wagon in which was placed the coffin; down the entire length of the line, at intervals of a few feet on each side, were carried torches of the resinous pine, here called light-wood. About the centre was stationed the black preacher, a man of gigantic frame and stentorian lungs, who gave out from memory the words of a hymn suitable to the occasion. The southern negroes are proverbial for the melody and compass of their voices, and I thought that hymn, mellowed by distance, the most solemn and yet the sweetest music that had ever fallen upon my ear. The stillness of the night and strength of their voices enabled me to distinguish the air at the distance of half a mile.

It was to me a strange and solemn scene, and no incident of my life has impressed me with more powerful emotions than the night funeral of the poor negro. For this reason, I have hastily and most imperfectly sketched its leading feature.—Home Journal

"GOOD GIFTS" AND "PERFECT GIFTS."

MR. EDITOR:

Though I am only preparing an essay for your readers, I hope they will not frown if I take a text:—my remarks flow from the passage—"every good gift and every perfect gift is from above, and cometh down from the Father of lights." Whatever is "good" in any form or degree comes from God; much more, what is eminently good, "perfect" in itself, or perfecting in tendency and operation. This is a fundamental truth. And the "good gifts" and "perfect gifts" are discriminated: there are, among men, endowments that are "good," yet not "perfect,"—correct, but not reaching the higher standard. The former (the context applying to "every man"*) what is said of the "gifts,") are virtuous inclinations and habits in a heart not changed and renewed; while the latter comprise the deeper and more earnest affections of a sanctified bosom: moral "light," from "the Father of lights," is intended in each case; the vicinity of the passage naming "temptation, lust, sin, superfluity of naughtiness—the righteousness of God, receiving the word with meekness, doing the word, pure religion and undefiled." (James i.) As both measures of "goodness" are "from above," from heaven, from God, the Holy Spirit is the author of the virtues, not generally accounted pious, (though really of that cognation,) which are recognized in Article x., and termed man's "own natural good works,"—as well as of those better qualities in the godly which are denominated graces, or fruits of the Spirit: the religious "light" of nature and reason is from Him,—much more, the religious "light" of revelation and grace; the former being usually (though often disparagingly) named moral; the latter spiritual. It is not intimated, however, that the smaller goodness will, without the graft of converting faith in the heart, the greater goodness, be accepted by the Judge: and elsewhere it is loudly proclaimed that the natural man cannot please God,—that we must be "transformed by the renewing of our mind,"—that, besides the "good gifts," we must obtain the "perfect gifts" also, to be pleasing to our "Father in heaven who is perfect."

Of course, the entire donation of both natural and spiritual power is through the merit of Christ; 'in Him is the life of men, in Him is the light of men,' all their "light," of whatever kind or degree: and only through Him is the best goodness accepted. If He had not been promised and given, to purchase for them His store of benefits, they would have been without any of the "gifts from above,"—without the moral faculties and virtues of nature, without the graces of the Spirit.

From this truth it results, that, if man had been left unredeemed, he would have had no consciousness of divine obligation, and of course no such obligation would have existed. Had Adam been respited after his fall, and his posterity been allowed to come into existence, without the intervention of the Saviour, they would have had neither religious light nor religious ableness, nothing moral in the high philosophical sense,—all being forfeited. Intellect there would have been, feeling, honour, affection, sympathy, and a regard for mutual rights; which latter is earthly morality, social morality,—just as respectful and winning deportment forms the "minor morals." But religious morality, rectitude through the heart-binding sense of accountability to God, would not have been on this earth. And all this would have realized the infidel notion,—animal man, rational, sentimental, progressive, but not religious. Blessed be God, the case is but imaginary! for Christ was given for us before the foundation of the world; and the benefit of His atonement supervened immediately on the fall from innocence; and one of these benefits is the Holy Spirit in every heart.

Through the blood of the Atonement, then, devoted from "the beginning," heavenly influence was instantly restored to fallen men; by which they might be reclaimed from depravity, and enabled to work out their salvation. This reclaiming influence was granted to all, without an exception,—Christ lighting, by His Holy Ghost, every man that cometh into the world. Not one human being, of the ordinary faculties, but carries in his bosom a spark from this universal Light. Not one, mature or maturing, except he be "quenching" this spark, in whom the Spirit is not breathing, to make it brighter, and burning, to purify his soul with the "Refiner's fire." And yet, alas, there are few hearts that prefer not their native coldness, their willing hardness, and, either partially or entirely, "receive the grace of God in vain."

The primary sentiment of virtue, the elementary "good gift," may be called natural, because possessed universally; but, as coming distinctly from God, discriminate from animal intellectuality and mind, it is above nature. It is the conscience, or consciousness of accountability to the Supreme Lord, the Ultimate Moral Sovereign,—including the power to obey these moral movings within,—the whole being unquestionably a supernatural gift, and as unquestionably universal. The rule by which conscience must govern itself may vary, being modified by prevalent ignorance or error. Man may commit vices which he does not know to be forbidden, misinterpreting artlessly portions of the law of God; but he cannot release himself from the conviction that he is bound to obey that law according to his best interpretation of it, and avoid whatever he believes or fears to be wrong.† Here is a measure of the light

* "Each man" who is "tempted," i. e. all men, singuli et omnes.

† The "law in the heart" may be misconceived, as may written law. And both cases require the protection of the converse of a scripture superlatively valuable,—to him that knoweth not to do good, and doeth it not, to him it is not sin."

given to every man,—the bond within to rectitude, as being the will of God, and agreeably to the clearest knowledge of duty we can obtain,—that knowledge being sought and accepted "without partiality, and without hypocrisy." And this "light," the conscience, improves and ripens as the heart becomes gracious and grows in grace,—the "perfect gift" being a heightening and refining of the "good gift." Some, indeed, (both Calvinists and Puseyites,) have fancied that the goodness of what is called a moral man is, in its very nature, i. e. generically, different from the goodness of one who is sanctified, particularly of one sufficiently eminent in piety to be held one of the elect or a saint,—that the conscientious honesty of an infidel, e. g., is not the same virtue that it is in a true Christian; the eminent reason being that the latter is elected, or is baptismally regenerate. But this imagination is groundless; it will not bear examination. The honesty is good; obeying conscience is good; and these are alike in both: but doing all this through divine love is best of all; and here the true Christian excels the infidel,—so far excels him that his virtue is hallowed and accepted, while the other is not. This however, as relates to honesty, is a difference in degree, not in kind; that point of rectitude exists in the infidel, but its motive is imperfect; not without the divine motive is the rectitude complete; yet the lack of completeness is not the lack of every thing.

Scripture plainly determines the identity of "goodness" in the unregenerate and the regenerate. They both "are from above," "come down from the Father of lights;" and we cannot believe that "goodness" not sanctifiable flows from Him. It is the same Holy Ghost of Christ and the Father, who calls, "awake, thou, that sleepest," and who afterwards gives the awakened the greater "light from Christ." The Paraclete, speaking in the conscience, "reproves the world of sin;" and the same Paraclete "convince[s] of righteousness" or justification. The Gentiles have both a divine "law written in their hearts" and also the divine accusing or excusing in their "thoughts,—their "conscience" [the divine Spirit within] thus "bearing joint-witness" with the heart-written law. It is the same Spirit, who is "resisted" by the "uncircumcised in heart," and who is "grieved" and "vexed" by the baptized whether holy or unholy, and by adopted Israel whether holy or unholy, and who may be "quenched" by all these in all the grades of their "rebellion," whether they be renewed or unrenewed,—and also by sinners who are "aliens" from the commonwealth and kingdom, else they would not be "rebels" against the Lord, "against the light," the "rebellious of the nations exalting themselves," there being "gifts for the rebellious also,"—yet that same Spirit, if not quenched, no longer resisted, no longer grieved, converts and sanctifies. It is the same Christ who, by His Spirit, "stands at the door, and knocks," and who "comes in and sups with him who opens the door" of his heart. It is the same "Spirit" who "strives with man," and is successful when man yields: He "strove" with the corrupt antediluvians through their long lives; (Gen. vi. 3) He "strove" with them during the "hundred and twenty years" that the deluge was threatened; He "strove," sometimes with effect, with resisting men, when life was reduced to "an hundred and twenty years;" (let either or both be the interpretation;) and He "strives," not always in vain, with us, who are careless and obstinate though we have but "three score years and ten." The Spirit who contends is the Spirit who conquers; the influence upon unconversion effects conversion; and conversion includes the whole state of grace.—Utterly futile, therefore, is the allegation, that the "goodness" of the unconverted is essentially other "goodness" than that which improves and is exalted by the "perfect gifts" of the Sanctifier. No moral quality or capability can come from Him, that may not be hallowed and perfected.

Without therefore a generic change in the heavenly influence,—when we become obedient to conscience, the power of the Spirit of God flows into the heart more abundantly. And the result, in those not early pious, may thus be stated. While the deep and lofty truths of Christianity open gradually to the understanding, particularly the awful truth of God's hatred of sin, the will and the affections, yielding to the holy movement, are, after salutary alarm and holy reaction, more and more purified, until godly character is formed and dominantly established. As victory over the natural mind is confirmed, nobler graces appear; and so it continues throughout. But, as something yet more excellent is always to be attained, and the want of better attainments will always be felt, humility perpetually restrains the triumph with which the soul gratefully acknowledges, "I can do all things through Christ who strengtheneth me."

The Spirit alone "worketh in us" ALL that is right, "both to will and to do,"—by the Spirit alone come both the elementary and forming "good gifts" and the growing and maturing "perfect gifts." Man is morally free,—yet moved by the Holy Ghost to every thing, from first to last, in the change to godliness. How is this?

On both sides of this difficulty are errors to be avoided. Through the fear of derogating from the honour of God in the conversion of the soul, one party maintains that man, "wholly inclined to all evil," is but the passive instrument of divine agency, and must await the moment of a heavenly impulse, and, when it comes, cannot counteract it,—or, if it come not, the man is rejected and reprobate,—and all this, through the arbitrary will of God, who "created" the latter for perdition, and the former for the everdure mercy. To meet this error at the fountain head, the other party contend that a remnant of his former virtue was retained, as of right or of course, by Adam when he fell, and that this relic of goodness continues with his offspring,—and also, that it belongs properly, as the intellect does, to their very nature; and on this wreck of upheld former virtue, man's co-operation with the Holy Spirit is founded,—the aid "from above" being added to his own natural endeavour. We reject instinctively the former theory. Yet it is clear that the latter does not ascribe to Heaven all that scripture demands;

Philadelphia, July 18, 1849. + Overlook

Chicago, July 18, 1849.

The perusal of Bishop Cobb's letter to the clergy of Alabama, together with the annual allusions of all our Bishops to the sufferings of the clergy from inadequate ministerial support, haled me to reflect much on the subject; and the conclusion which I humbly submit to you and your readers is this: That the fault, thus far, is principally in the clergy themselves; and my reason for so thinking is this; God's word obliges every baptized person to contribute to the support of the Church's officers according to his ability. The Prayer Book, in the Offertory, attaches a prominence to this duty; and yet while ministers explain all other commandments, their lips are closed on this, through that "fear of man that bringeth a snare." What else can be expected, but that the people will neglect that of which they are not reminded from the Pulpit? The clergy are only reaping what they sow.

Our gratitude is richly due to Mr. Hooker for the promptness with which he has placed this great work of a highly gifted mind within the reach of the clergy and laity of the American Church. As will be seen from the title, the object of the author is not so much to treat of the Incarnation as an isolated doctrine as to view it in its relations with mankind and the Church; and in doing so, he has necessarily unfolded the great general outline of Catholic theology; a feature which adds greatly to the value of the work. The great Catholic principle—the reception of manhood into God in order that sinful and fallen manhood might be purified, restored, indeed more highly exalted than ever, through the actually infused leaven of the Humanity of the Eternal Word, as the Head, Saviour, and Regenerator of our renewed race—forms the basis of the book; and is justly regarded by the author not only as the great fact of the Gospel, but as the secure basis upon which the Church system, and especially that part of it which relates to the ministry, and sacraments, essentially rests; and hence the noble motto borrowed from St. Leo, "Corpus regenerati fit caro Crucifixi," which adorns the title page of his work, and offers a key to the general character of its contents. This motto, and we own it is a somewhat remarkable one for these times, will probably suggest to the theological reader better than any thing we can say, the grand idea of the book. Throughout he occupies, not indeed new, but much neglected ground; and we fervently thank God that his labours have gone far to fill a chasm long felt and deplored in our Church literature. That this admirable production will be at once fully appreciated, and its merits and truthfulness frankly admitted by all who take it up, is of course not to be looked for; but at the same time we do not believe that any truly pious and unbiassed man can rise from its perusal without being convinced that to take up with wrong and uncatholic views of the sacraments amounts to little less than the virtual denial of the truth of our Lord's Incarnation. We hail its timely appearance as an earnest that the time is not far off when Christianity will be studied, not as has been unhappily too much the case in times past, as a mere bundle of distinct and individual doctrines; but as a living, and organic whole, which is exquisitely sensitive and sympathetic throughout. Nothing is more certain, or more borne out by the test of experience, and fact, than that every departure from the sacramental views of the Church is necessarily a step taken towards infidelity. Hence it is that Lutheranism has so often terminated in Pantheism; Congregationalism in Unitarianism; and the principles of George Fox in those of Elias Hicks. The principle holds of bad leaven as of good, that a very little suffices to leaven the lump. The work now before us presents an antidote to the very dangerous error of supposing that the sacramental views of the Church can be vitiated without likewise vitiating every doctrine of the Apostles, Creed. As well might we hope to crush or amputate a limb without maiming the body to which it belongs!—so certain is an injury inflicted upon any one of its parts to thrill through-the whole sensitive frame of the Christian system. It is not the least of the merits of this noble book that, without directly seeking to do so, it serves to fasten a just sense of this upon the mind, and upon this account we trust that it may be read by intelligent and true men far beyond the pale of the Church. To rightly constituted minds and hearts, no matter what theological views they happen to embrace, it can hardly fail to prove a powerful instrument for good. It is in no sense a controversial work, but simply aims at the scientific development of the coincidence which exists between Christianity and the instinctive wants of mankind. And surely mankind can have no stronger motive to receive the gospel, and therein the Incarnate Saviour and His Church, than the feeling that they need it. Upon a certain class of minds, inaccessible to the more usual modes of approach, we have no doubt that the work before us, on account of the extremely natural and unartificial way in which it introduces the grandest of all truths, will prove the means of producing very powerful effect. With respect to the description of persons alluded to, it begins just in the right place; not by affecting to discuss with them the mysteries of religion, but by making them feel their want of a Redeemer. This is the true fulcrum from which to shake and overthrow the stronghold of infidelity. It must not, however, be thought from any thing we have said, that Archdeacon Wilberforce handles his subject with any special view to such a result.

We are sorry that we can at present do little more than give notice of the publication of this invaluable book to the many friends who are anxiously expecting it. Though so very recently published, the demand for it in Great Britain has been immense, and on this side of the Atlantic a book upon so grand a subject from such a pen as that of Archdeacon Wilberforce is not very likely to fall still-born from the press. Curiosity, and the great literary merit and celebrity of the work, if not sympathy with its contents, will doubtless render thousands in this country, as in England, eager to read it. Our only fear therefore is that the publisher has issued quite too small an edition for the present demand. For the century we live in, it may well be said to be a very remarkable book, as well as a most able expose of Catholic doctrines from a point of view in which it is much to be feared too many even in the Church have been but little used to examine them.

We observe that the work is furnished with an unusually full table of contents, which cannot fail to add greatly to its value as a book of reference. It is printed from clear beautiful type, upon fine white paper, and may be had from the publisher for about one third of the price of the English edition.

GOSPEL TRUTH, AND PRIMITIVE ECCLESIASTICAL ORDER.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 4, 1849.

THE PRINCIPLES OF THE CHURCHMAN.

No man ever better deserved than Bishop HOBART, the encomium pronounced by the first Bishop of Calcutta, the lamented Middleton, on the great champion of the faith and primitive order, to which High Churchmen are devoted—the pious Bishop Horsley—that “he ran a glorious but unpopular career in the midst of an heretical and apostate age.” Whatever difficulties opposed his discharge of the duty which he felt that he owed to his divine Lord in the extension of His blessed Kingdom—“with all faithful diligence to banish and drive away from the Church all erroneous and strange doctrine, contrary to God’s word, and both privately and openly to call upon and encourage others to do the same”—Bishop Hobart suffered no worldly estimation to betray him into a temporizing and accommodating profession of the distinguishing principles of the Church; but faithfully pursued, throughout the whole of his brilliant Episcopate, a consistent, firm, and undeviating course. His solemn Charges to his clergy were always dictated by a strong sense of the obligation to set forth and maintain those principles, which he felt was assumed by every Bishop at his consecration; and in recent extracts from several of these admirable productions, our readers will have seen the truly Christian spirit in which he endeavoured to guard his brethren of the ministry, and, through them, those whose spiritual interests were in some measure, in the providence of God, confided to him, against the errors which he conceived that his official station, and the circumstances of the times, rendered it his duty to “lift up his voice like a trumpet.” We now close with some further extracts from his third Charge, delivered to the Clergy of the diocese of New York, at the opening of the Convention, October, 1819; and entitled, The principles of the Churchman stated and explained, in distinction from the corruptions of the Church of Rome, and from the errors of certain Protestant sects. It was intended by him to be in some measure a sequel to a former one, (largely quoted from in our last number but one;) in which certain corruptions of the Church of Rome were contrasted with some Protestant errors.

The present is extolled as the AGE OF LIBERALITY. And so far as it guarantees to every individual the free exercise of his opinions, unawed by the sword of secular power, or the fires of ecclesiastical tyranny—so far as it renders homage to the sincerity and purity of the purposes of the heart, however the understanding may be subjected to the sway of erroneous opinions—so far as it denies no office of Christian kindness, no courtesy of social intercourse, no sentiment even of personal affection, to the honest and the worthy, though bearing a different religious name, and unhappily deformed by heresy and schism: so far as the present age thus establishes the rights of conscience, and banishes that bigotry which, in denouncing errors, would persecute their abettors—it deserves the plaudit of an enlightened and Christian liberality.

Yet even if circumstances did not establish the fact, the theory of human nature would justify the apprehension, that liberality to men would be extended to their opinions; and that from admitting the equal sincerity of the former, the acknowledgment would be made of the equal truth, or, to speak more properly, of the equal indifference of the latter; so that sincerity of intention would be considered as the only standard of truth, and the age of liberality become the AGE OF INDIFFERENCE.

It is in this view that it is the duty of Churchmen to guard against that popular liberality which claims for professions of respect and kindness which Churchmen may reciprocate, a return, which, without treachery to their Church and to their Master, Churchmen cannot render—an indifference or a lukewarmness in professing and vindicating the distinctive principles of their Church.

I say, my brethren, Churchmen cannot adopt the phraseology of the day, and rank their distinctive principles among the non-essentials of religion, without treachery to their Church and to their Master. For their Church considers many of these principles as lying at the foundation of that sacred edifice which, in clearing from the false ornaments and unhallowed appendages with which superstition and ambition had deformed it, she has sought to exhibit in the lustre with which, reared by apostles, martyrs, and confessors, it shone forth in the first ages of Christianity.

In proportion to the purity and importance of the principles which distinguish any community, is it the duty of every individual who composes it, frequently to recur to them; in order to refresh his knowledge of them, to animate his attachment to them, and to apply them with increased fidelity and firmness to the regulation of his conduct. The importance of a frequent recurrence to first and distinctive principles is increased, whenever, from the spirit of the age, or from any other circumstances, the danger is increased of our accurate perceptions of them, our warm attachment to them, or our steadfast adherence to them, being obscured or diminished.

The principles which form the character of the CHURCHMAN are not perhaps clearly understood, or sufficiently appreciated by all who bear the name. And undoubtedly, in the spirit and circumstances of the present age, there are many obstacles both to a clear perception of their nature, and a proper estimate of their importance. The greater, then, is the necessity of their being delineated and enforced.

It shall be my object, then, at the present time, to delineate and enforce, with as much plainness, and necessarily with as much brevity as possible, some of the leading principles which constitute the character of the Churchman; in order to vindicate him from the charge of symbolizing with that Church whose corrupt sway he rejected, and to show the importance of those points, in which he must lament his difference from his Protestant brethren. * * * * *

The CHURCHMAN lays at the foundation of his faith and practice the doctrine of the corruption of human nature, leading to those actual transgressions which render man guilty in the sight of God, and rendering unworthy of divine acceptance his best works. * * * * *

He asserts, in common with his Protestant brethren, the corruption of human nature, and man’s inability, by his “natural strength, without faith and calling upon God,” to perform works acceptable to God. And herein he opposes the Romanist, who maintains the ability of the natural man, unassisted by supernatural strength, to do works which render it fit in God to bestow grace, (works which “deserve grace of congruity,”) and which thus recommends him to the divine favour. * * *

The deep, the lively, the permanent conviction of his corruption and unworthiness, humbles him before his Maker and his Judge: and disposes him cordially to embrace the doctrine of salvation through the merits and grace of a divine Redeemer.

It is this doctrine of justification and salvation only through the free grace of God in Jesus Christ, his divine Lord and Redeemer, which the CHURCHMAN daily and constantly cherishes as the only solace of his wounded conscience, and the only ground on which he can hope for acceptance at the tribunal of his Almighty Judge, and for advancement to the celestial glories which infinitely transcend the merit of his best works.

He rejects, with horror, the idea of bowing, with the Romanist, to created intercessors, to saints and images; and of invoking, in epithets of celestial dignity and sovereignty, the intercession of the virgin mother of the Saviour, in derogation of the sole and all-sufficient mediation of her divine and blessed Son. * * * *

With respect also to the mode of the application of the merits of Christ to the justification and salvation of believers, the CHURCHMAN is distinguished by the great stress which he lays on the sacraments, and ordinances, and ministrations of the Church.

He is very far, indeed, from the impiety and absurdity of supposing, with the Romanists, that the sacraments, and ordinances, and ministrations, of the Church are available to salvation, opere operato, on account merely of the performance of them, in virtue of the work itself, and the intention of the administrator. But still, viewing the Church as the divinely constituted body of Christ, to which he applies the merits of His blood, and the efficacy of His grace; and considering the sacraments, in the language of his Church, as “a means whereby he receives, and as a pledge to assure him of,” all those spiritual blessings which Christ’s merits purchased, and His grace confers; and considering further, that Christ set over this Church ministers to celebrate its sacraments and ordinances; he would think that he hazarded his salvation if he refused or neglected to receive these means and pledges of the divine favour. Sincere repentance and lively faith, producing obedience to the divine commands, qualify the believer for acceptance through the merits of his Redeemer. But, surely, it would be difficult for him to establish his claim to salvation on Gospel principles, while he rejects or neglects those sacraments, ordinances, and ministrations, which are “a means whereby he receives the same, and a pledge to assure him thereof.”

While, therefore, against the Romanists he extends the efficacy of the sacraments, which depends on the grace of Him who has instituted them, solely to those qualified to receive them, he considers them in a higher light than some of his Protestant brethren; who, whatever may be the correct language of their public standards on this subject, seem to consider the sacraments as merely decent rites, to be received on the principle of submission to divine appointments; and not as the means and pledges of divine favour and grace, necessary to salvation where they may be had, and except in the case of unavoidable ignorance or involuntary error.

In accordance with this sentiment, and with scripture and the faith of the primitive Church, the CHURCHMAN considers baptism as the sacramental commencement of the spiritual life, and the entrance into that fold of the Redeemer, the mystical body of Christ, in which he enjoys a title to the blessings of salvation. * * * *

When the Churchman, in the language of Scripture, of primitive antiquity, and of the articles and liturgy of his Church, calls baptism regeneration, he does not employ the term in its popular signification among many Protestants, to denote the divine influences upon the soul, its sanctification and renovation, in abolishing the body of sin, and raising up the graces and virtues of the new man. The term regeneration is used by him in its original, and appropriate, and technical acceptation, to denote the translation of the baptized person from that state in which, as destitute of any covenanted title to salvation, he is styled “the child of wrath,” into that state which, as it proffers to him, in all cases, the covenanted mercy and grace of God, and in the exercise of repentance and faith actually conveys to him these blessings, is styled a “state of salvation.” * * * It must be obvious, that the sacramental commencement of the spiritual life in the regeneration of baptism, and the subsequent sanctification of the principles, the powers, and affections of the new man by the renewing of the Holy Ghost, are distinct acts and operations; the former leading to the latter, which, without it, is wholly inefficacious to salvation; on the contrary, increases the condemnation of the despiser of the gifts and calling of God.

And, therefore, the CHURCHMAN insists on the necessity of that spiritual change denoted in scripture by the terms sanctification, renewing of the mind, renewing of the Holy Ghost.

He does not, with the Romanist, lay an undue stress on external performances, and on his own works and endeavours, as means of obtaining the divine Spirit; and substitute a round of superstitious observances, for “righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost.” Nor does he, with some Protestants, rush into the contrary extreme, and expect the divine Spirit in sudden illapses, independently of means, of ordinances, and of the acts of his mind; nor determine the certainty of the operations of the Spirit of God by any other standard than the exhibition in his heart and life of the graces and fruits of this divine Sanctifier. But firmly convinced both of the reality of His operations, and of their entire conformity to his character as a rational and accountable being, he seeks for them in the use of moral means, pious reading, meditation, prayer, self-denial, holy resolution; and in the participation of the ordinances of the Church:—and he employs no other standard to ascertain the sanctifying presence of the divine Spirit in his soul, than the holy tempers which are produced there, and which exhibit the fruits of godliness and righteousness of life.

As one of those means by which baptismal regeneration is to be perfected, the Churchman receives Confirmation, or laying on of hands.

Divested of those unmeaning ceremonies which the superstition of the Romanist substituted for the original gesture of “laying on of hands,” the Churchman observes this ordinance as practised by the Apostles, with this significant gesture only. And considering its highly beneficial tendency in a moral point of view, as bringing to the reflection of young persons, under the most solemn and impressive circumstances, their Christian duty and responsibility, and regarding its apostolic rank among “the principles of the doctrine of Christ,” the Churchman feels himself bound to receive a rite which his Protestant brethren have unfortunately rejected as a superstitious ceremony of Papal origin.

In his view of the highest instituted means of sanctification and pledge of divine favour, the holy sacrament of the Lord’s Supper, the Churchman conforms to the first and purest ages of the Church, renouncing the corruptions of the Papal age, and the errors of modern times.

He shudders—and reason sanctions the powerful impulse of nature—at the unparalleled absurdity, the tremendous impiety, of changing, by a literal construction of language evidently figurative, bread and wine into the body, soul, and divinity of his Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ; of thus literally feasting on his Redeemer; and of bowing to these inanimate elements, and calling them his God, his Saviour. The adherents of the Papacy, shuddering too at the naked view of this, I think I may call it, horrible doctrine of transubstantiation, are sometimes disposed to disguise its deformity, and to assert, that on this point the Church of Rome does not go further than our own Church, when she maintains the spiritual presence of Christ in the Eucharist: as if his spiritual presence, by the spiritual graces and blessings which he bestows on the faithful in the reception of the holy supper, was the same with his substantial presence—his presence, soul, body, and divinity—under the qualities of bread and wine. * * * * *

We have also reason to be thankful to the Disposer of all good, that He has connected us with a Church which, while she rejects the terrible doctrine of transubstantiation, gives that significance to the holy Eucharist which it maintained in the primitive ages, but which has been denied to it in the opinion of some Protestants. Many of them regard the Eucharist as merely a feast; in which, with suitable dispositions, bread and wine are received in memory of their Saviour. But surely something more than this was meant when our blessed Redeemer solemnly took the bread and wine, and blessed them. For what did he bless them? Surely to be symbols of his body and blood. As symbols they must have been offered as an act of worship to his Almighty Father. As symbols they were given to the disciples, and received by them. And all this which He did, Christ commanded his disciples to do in remembrance of Him, and thus to show forth his death until he come.

On this authority, our Church directs the Priest, in her Communion office, to bless the bread and wine, to be symbols of the body and blood of Christ, and thus to make a solemn oblation of them to the Father; beseeching Him that they who worthily receive them may be partakers of his body and blood. This form of celebrating the Eucharist, conformable to the Liturgies of the primitive ages, she has derived immediately from the venerable Episcopal Church of Scotland, who, by God's gracious Providence, has preserved, through great sufferings and trials, the faith, ministry, and worship of the first and purest ages of the Church.

The Churchman, then, maintains the oblation in the Eucharist of the bread and wine as symbols and memorials of the body and blood of Christ. He will not be tenacious of the term sacrament, as applicable to the offering of the consecrated elements. For in the appropriate application of the term, it doubtless denoted those offerings only in which there was shedding of blood. Neither the liturgy of his Church, nor the primitive liturgies, apply this term to the bread and wine of the Eucharist. All due significance is given to this most sacred ordinance when there is a solemn oblation made by God's authorized minister of the consecrated bread and wine, as symbols and memorials of the body and blood of Christ; assuring to those who worthily receive them all the blessings of his meritorious cross and passion.

Another obvious characteristic of the Churchman is, his adherence to a worship by a prescribed form—a measure which so effectually secures all the essentials of worship; soundness and accuracy in the matter of the prayers; perspicuity and pathos in the style; reverence, solemnity, and order, in the manner; that even if it were not sanctioned by the practice of the Jewish Church, and by the prescription and example of Christ and his Apostles, the sober reason of mankind would have recourse to it. * * * *

In his preference of this worship, the Churchman, and particularly the Church clergyman, is uniform and consistent; not merely adhering rigidly to it as far as the Church has plainly enjoined it, but carefully avoiding the suspicion of a secret preference for extempore effusions, by not mixing them with her well-ordered and comprehensive services.

In the service of the Church, the Churchman recognizes the power of authoritative absolution in the Christian ministry; founded on the declaration of Christ to his apostles, and through them to their successors to the end of the world—"Whosoever sins ye remit, they are remitted; and whosoever sins ye retain, they are retained."—While he acknowledges this power in the due administration of the sacraments and ecclesiastical discipline, he considers it as also exercised in the sentence of absolution in the daily worship, by which, he maintains, God certifies to those who truly repent and believe, the pardon of their sins.

But while in making this absolution a part of the daily service, he differs from his Protestant brethren in general, he even more essentially differs from the Church of Rome. For the Church of Rome makes the absolution of the priest in the sacrament of penance essential to the salvation of every individual. The Churchman only considers a general absolution as an edifying and consolatory part of public service. The Church of Rome makes auricular confession—the private confession to the priest by every individual of all his sins of thought, word, and deed—an indispensable condition of forgiveness. The Churchman justly deems auricular confession, and private absolution, an encroachment on the rights of conscience, an invasion of the prerogative of the Searcher of hearts, and, with some exceptions, hostile to domestic and social happiness, and licentious and corrupting in its tendency.

It is another characteristic of the Churchman, that, recognizing the authority of the Church in matters of faith, and prescribing rites and ceremonies, he submits to her lawful decisions.

Constituted as the Church is in this country, where she speaks authoritatively only through the united voices of her Bishops, Clergy, and Laity, there is no principle of social order which would justify resistance to her decrees, except when they plainly contradict the word of God, or manifestly and injuriously violate some principles of common reason or justice. * * * *

Lastly, let me not omit the great characteristic of the Churchman, that he maintains the unity of the Church in submission to the Episcopal constitution of her ministry.

The process of reasoning which leads him to act on this principle is short, and in its various steps luminous and conclusive. The Church is a divinely constituted society, of which Christ is the head. Its officers must derive their commission from Him its Head. This commission is transmitted through a superior order of the ministry, among whom ranked Timothy and Titus, subsequently called Bishops. The Churchman, believing that this order is the order of Bishops, would think that, in separating from their ministrations, he cut himself off from the Communion of the Church, and was guilty of the sin of schism.

These opinions may not now be popular. And yet they were popular; they were the only principles recognized in those ages when Christian faith was most pure, Christian morals most holy, and the Christian Church most united. For the first three centuries the Christian Church knew no other opinions. Opposition to these opinions is of modern origin. The Christian Fathers inculcate them in every page of their writings. We hold them, my fellow Churchmen, with "the glorious company of the apostles," and with "the noble army of martyrs." Let not Papal advocates, asserting those claims of Papal supremacy of which the primitive Fathers uttered not a word, drive us from Episcopacy, the true principle of Church Unity, into the usurped domains of the Bishop of Rome. Let not the clamours of our Protestant brethren, who are unfortunately destitute of the primitive bond of Church union in the order of Bishops, intimidate us from avowing and acting on the principle which the Churchman in every age has avowed and acted upon; and which one of the first Bishops of the Christian Church, a disciple of an Apostle, the venerable martyr, Ignatius, lays down, "Let no man do anything of what belongs to the Church without the Bishop." * * *

The great principle, into which all the other principles of the Churchman may be resolved—that we are saved from the guilt and dominion of sin by the merits and grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, received in the exercise of penitence and faith, in union with his Church, by the participation of its sacraments and ordinances from the hands of her authorized ministry—distinguished the Church in her first and purest state. It is the universal reception of this principle which alone can restore purity and unity to that Christian family which is now deformed and distracted by heresies and schisms.

To this principle, then, my brethren of the Clergy, let us, in the strength of our Master, consecrate our talents, our labours, and our lives.

Animated by this principle, my brethren of the Laity, as well as of the Clergy, we shall exhibit those holy graces and virtues which flow from a vital union with the Redeemer; and, finally, when He comes to translate His mystical body from the changes and trials of its militant state on earth to the glories of its triumphant state in heaven, we shall participate of its triumphs, and be saved with the Israel of God.

THE BOMBARDMENT OF ROME.

The English Churchman of July 5, contains the following extract of a letter from "Father Ventura":—

"At the moment that I am writing these lines my heart is bowed down with grief. The French soldiers are bombarding Rome, destroying its monuments, and massacring its inhabitants, and blood is flowing in streams on both sides. Fears are entertained lest when the French enter Rome by assault the people should in its rage massacre all the priests and all the nuns. What a fine victory will this be for France! What a great restoration of the Pope! History tells us that restorations by force are not durable, and that thrones raised upon dead bodies and in blood are certain to be soon overthrown. Of all the combinations discussed at Gaeta the most fatal has been chosen. But what is still more grievous to every Catholic mind is that this restoration, if it takes place, will destroy the authority of the Pontiff without establishing the power of the Prince. Each cannon-ball that ruins the walls of Rome will destroy by degrees the faith of the Romans in the Catholic religion. The effect produced by 'confetti di Pio Nino a mandati a suor figli' (the Cannon-balls so ticketed and carried through the city) is known, but is as nothing compared to the rage against the Church, and the Catholic religion, created by the sight of the French shells. As most of these shells have fallen in the Transtevere, and ruined the houses of the poor people who inhabit it, as well as killed some of them, the Transteverini—that portion of the population, lately so Catholic, are those who now curse and blaspheme against the Pope, and the Clergy, in whose name they see all this carnage and horror.

I am far from believing that Pius the Ninth desires, or even knows all this; but what I know and believe on this matter is unknown to the Roman people, who only see and feel that they are suffering. They see that the Austrians, with Monsignor Bedini amongst them, are ravaging the legations, bombarding towns, imposing enormous taxes on peaceable citizens, are proscribing and shooting the most ardent patriots, and re-establishing the Clerical absolutism wherever they go. They see that the French are spilling Roman blood in the name of the Pope, who has sent against them four powers, armed with all the means of destruction, against the Roman State, like a pack of hounds against a wild beast. They feel and know all this, and they rise against the hope and the Church in the name and interest of which the Pope proclaims that it is his duty to reconquer by force his temporal power. The excesses of Rome have been surpassed by the excesses of Gaeta. Not a word has been said of peace, reconciliation, or pardon; not a promise made to maintain public liberties; and yet this ought to have been done by the Pope. The last allocution of the Pontiff has been read. How imprudent to have made the Pope praise Austria, and the King of Naples, who have ever been the sworn foes of Italian independence. How much more imprudent still to make him say that, of his own accord, he had appealed to the powers to re-establish him on a throne which he had himself abandoned. It was confessing that he wished to do to his people what he had declared unwilling last year to do against the Croats and Austrians, oppressors of Italy. Even the women feel this reasoning; and now that they see the effects of this brutal war of four great Powers against a small State, their husbands and children killed and wounded, you cannot form an idea of the rage of these women, of the energetic sentiments that they utter, and the fury that animates them against the Pope, the Cardinals, and the mass of the Priesthood. You can conceive therefore how it is that Churches have been devastated. People will no longer confess themselves, or communicate, or hear mass. There is no longer any preaching at Rome, because no one will listen. Everything that is presented by a Priest, or smells of a Priest, is shunned.

"To me Pius IX. is always the Vicar of Jesus Christ, the head of the Church. But can the mass understand this? I know that all the youth of Rome, and all those who have instruction, reason as follows:—'The Pope wants to reign over us by force. He wants for the Church, or the Priests, a sovereignty which only belongs to the people, and he thinks that it is his duty to act thus, because we are Catholics, and because Rome is the centre of Catholicism. Well, what is there to prevent us from abandoning Catholicism, and becoming Protestants if necessary; and then what political right can he urge against us? For is it not horrible to think that, because we are Catholics and sons of the Church, we must be kept in leading strings by the Church, abjure all our rights, and expect from the liberality of Priests as a concession what is justly due to us, and be condemned to the lot of the most miserable of nations?'

"These sentiments are more common than they are supposed to be, and have even penetrated into the minds of women. And thus my labours of twenty years have been lost, and Protestantism is de facto implanted in a portion of the good and religious Roman people, and that too, horrible to relate, by the Priesthood itself and the bad policy into which the Pope has been drawn.

"Had Pope Pius IX. been left to himself, he would never have left Rome. Had he done so, he would not at any rate have left the Roman States, but would have gone to Bologna, Ancona, or Civita Vecchia, where he would have been received as from heaven. He would not have gone to Gaeta and refused to see the Roman deputations, and he would have said: 'Let me stay in exile rather than appeal to arms which would perhaps subdue but would cause the loss of the hearts of my people.' Rome will probably fall, and the Pope may again enter the Eternal City, but he will never reign over the hearts of the Romans."

The following introduction to Bishop Doane's Address on the 73d anniversary of American Independence, and the 3d anniversary of Burlington College, describes a beautiful and touching scene, which could not have been witnessed without deep interest; and we are sure that its perusal will give pleasure to our readers.

The anniversaries of Washington's birth day, and of the Declaration of Independence, are the two secular holidays, at Burlington College. At half past eight, on the morning of the fourth day of July, just passed, the Teachers and Student of the College repaired, as is their custom, to Riverside, to pay their respects to the President. William C. Doane, of the Middle Class, made the following Address, in behalf of his fellow Students.

My Father,

It is to us a double festival; upon which I have been chosen, by your sons, to express their love, and mine, to you. We celebrate, to-day, a nation's birth; and the birth of that which is a nation's noblest ornament, a Christian College. We speak to you, not, in loud words, of bloody wars; but with the "still small voice" of peace, which whispers softly from our hearts, and finds, in yours, an answer, and an echo. The stars of thirty States glitter upon the blue of our country's flag; and, on the banner of our country's science, stands enrolled, amid those stars, whose brightness will increase, the name of Burlington College. There, as in our hearts, and in our halls, your name will be inseparable from it. We love you, and we look to you, as the George Washington of our College. In our hearts, your name will ever dwell with his, the greatest of all human names, as the father of many children; and, through them, a second father, to our country. We would stand round you, ever as we now do, here, the representatives of many States, as a forest of young saplings stand round a great, old oak; to keep from you, and take to ourselves, the storms, of which you have had full enough; and which we need, to make us oaks, instead of saplings; men after your pattern, and after God's own heart.

The President replied, returning their congratulations; commending the National Flag, borne by one of their number, to their protection; and exhorting them to endure hardness, as good soldiers of Jesus Christ, that they might secure the victor's crown.

At half past eight, the School Room, most tastefully dressed with flags and appropriate devices, was filled with the members of the College, and the ladies and gentlemen who were their guests. The Declaration of Independence was read by Mr. Timothy Greene Mitchell; and the Address delivered by the President.

In the evening, as has long been customary, the family of St. Mary's Hall were entertained at Riverside; and the day was closed, at nine, with Bishop Ken's sweet Evening Hymn.

The Calendar of July 21 failed to reach us, and therefore we did not see the able and conclusive letter of the Rev. Dr. Jarvis, in reply to its misrepresentations, until we found it in the Churchman of last week. The editor of the Banner will probably return to his post next week, when we have no doubt that he will settle matters in full with his contemporary.

On Sunday, June 3, eight families, amounting altogether to forty-two individuals, were admitted into communion with the Protestant Episcopal Church, in Creagh parish, diocese of Limerick, Ireland. "At their own earnest solicitation, the heads, and several of the members of those families, were allowed to read their recantations; expressing their desire by this public act to deprive their late clergy of all pretext for visiting them with the cruel penalties of the Church of Rome."

DIED,

At St. Louis, Mo., on the 24th ult., of the prevailing epidemic, the Rev. WHITING GRISWOLD, rector of St. John's church in that city. Thus has nobly fallen at his post a faithful, exemplary, and universally beloved clergyman; who for several weeks had zealously devoted himself, day and night, to the unremitting discharge of his solemn duties in visiting the couches of the sick and dying.

At Sing Sing, on the 21st ult., ANNA, wife of the Rev. John M. Forbes, D. D., rector of St. Luke's church, New York.

At Waterbury, Conn., on the 12th ult., MARY DEFOREST, wife of the Rev. Jacob L. Clark, rector of St. John's church, Waterbury.

LONG SERMONS.—Our witty brother of the Richmond Christian Advocate, (Methodist,) takes us to task for a word or two that we lately said about the length of sermons, and reminds us of the long one which was once preached at Troas by St. Paul; adding—

If the Editor of the Banner had been there, we presume he would have "ordered the drums to beat" at sun down; or, perchance, like Eutichus, he would have gone to sleep, even at the risk of falling down and breaking his neck. At any rate, it is presumable he would have found out some method of showing his dislike to the sermon "at the expiration of half an hour."

Not so. With such a preacher, we trust that we could have listened most patiently and attentively, even though he "continued his his speech until midnight;" nay, though he afterwards resumed his discourse, and "talked a long while, even till break of day." But then it must be remembered that modern preachers are not St. Pauls; and the Advocate will excuse us for repeating John Wesley's saying, that "no man can preach above half an hour, without preaching nonsense." He will also excuse us, we hope, if we apply to preaching, what he says, in another column of the same number of his paper, of prayer—that "it is not the length, but the strength of prayer, that is required. 'Let thy words be few,' as Solomon says, 'but full, and to the purpose,'" We are not responsible, however, for the perfect accuracy of the quotation.

PATAPSCO FEMALE INSTITUTE.—We have been favoured with the eighth annual Report of this institution, beautifully situated in the mountainous region of Elk Ridge, near Baltimore; and are happy to learn from it that it is in a sound and flourishing condition, under the many happy influences which have tended to its prosperity and usefulness. The Principal is Mrs. Lincoln Phelps, daughter of the late distinguished Judge Phelps, of Vermont; a lady who has had long experience in directing a literary institution, and is favourably known to the public as the author of Lincoln's Botany, a series of works on Chemistry, Natural Philosophy, &c., and of sundry works on the subject of Education, &c.

The Bishop of Maryland is Visitor of the Institute, who states that "the late examination has afforded still greater evidence, if more were needed, how competent is Mrs. Phelps to sustain an institution inferior to none in the country of its kind."

The English Churchman is generally distinguished for the soundness of its views, and the accuracy of its predictions, in relation to political events. In the latest number received by the last steamer, it says—

FRANCE is quiet at present, but it is evident that the Republic cannot last much longer. The journey of the Duchess of ORLEANS to England, and of the Prince DE JOINVILLE to Vienna, while the Emperor of AUSTRIA and the Duke of BORDEAUX were there; the return of the Prince DE JOINVILLE to England, the journey of the Duke DE BORDEAUX to Holland; and the intended visit of the Duke of LEUCHTENBERG to the President of FRANCE; all show that a strong effort will soon be made to settle the government of that country upon a permanent basis. The Emperor of RUSSIA is supposed to be the projector of the scheme which is to have this effect; and it is said to be as follows:—The Duke of BORDEAUX is to be King of France; the Count of PARIS is to be declared heir to the throne; and the Bonaparte family are to be made Royal Dukes, with the right of succession after the Orleans branch of the Bourbons. It is believed that the principal parties concerned will be willing to accede to this plan, for the sake of giving peace to their distracted country.

We beg leave to refer our readers to the advertisement of the Rev. James Bonnar, B. D., on our last page. He is an accomplished scholar, and has had much experience in the instruction of youth. His Classical Academy offers advantages which justly entitle it to a more liberal patronage than it has yet received from Churchmen. We speak with the more confidence, since our own sons have for several years been under his care.

Rev. Dr. Colman

The committee of the British and Foreign Bible Society have agreed, by a vote of 24 to 21, that the meetings of the Society shall in future be opened with reading Scripture, and by prayer; in consequence of which the clerical Secretary has resigned, from a persuasion that the proposed change will lead to endless divisions!

On Monday last, 30th ult., the corner-stone of the new Church of the Mediator, N. W. corner of Lombard and Schuylkill Fourth Sts., Philadelphia, (of which the Rev. Dr. Vaughan is rector,) was laid by Bishop Potter.

On the 22nd ult., in St. Peter's Church, Cheshire, Conn., Mr. John A. Paddock was admitted to the holy order of Deacons, by Bishop Brownell.

New Publications.

THE DOCTRINE OF THE INCARNATION OF OUR LORD JESUS CHRIST, in its Relation to Mankind and to the Church. By Robert Isaac Wilberforce, A. M., Archdeacon of the East Riding. First American, from the second London edition. Philadelphia, 1849: H. Hooker & Co., S. W. corner Chesnut and Eighth sts; 12mo. pp. 411.

We hail with no small pleasure this handsome edition of one of the most valuable books which has appeared in England for many years, from the gifted pen of one of the noblest sons of her noble Church. It is high, but at the same time only just praise, to say of it, that it goes farther than any single book in the language to set forth the real ground upon which the Church system eventually rests—the reception of Manhood into God, in order to remedy what Manhood suffered by the Fall.

A more extended notice of this important work, furnished by a correspondent whose Theological learning qualifies him to judge of its merits, will be found on another page.

Its price is very moderate; and we have no doubt that the enterprising publishers will be remunerated, as they deserve, by a speedy call for another and still larger edition.

The American Quarterly Register and Magazine. Conducted by Judge James Stryker. June, 1849: Vol. II. No. 2. 8vo. pp. 300. Published by the Proprietor, No. 520 Chesnut St. Philadelphia; at $5 per annum.

The design of this work is to embody, quarterly, a history of the times; statistical information, embracing tabular statements; original and selected articles—literary and scientific; biographical notices and obituary; a chronicle of general incidents; congressional proceedings and debates, and official documents. Judge Stryker is well qualified to conduct such a work, and he "pledges himself to observe a rigid impartiality, avoiding interference in political or sectarian controversy of any kind." The Register is on a new plan, and we observe that it is highly recommended by some of the first men in our country—Lewis Cass, Millard Fillmore, Abbott Lawrence, J. C. Spencer, W. H. Seward, F. Wayland, Horace Binney, &c.

Tracts for the Christian Seasons. London and Oxford; John Henry Parker.

This admirable publication embraces a series of the best tracts we have ever read, for the seasons of Advent, Christmas, Epiphany, Lent, Holy Week, Easter, Whitsuntide, and Trinity. It is appropriately inscribed "to the author of the Christian Year, whose high calling it has been to kindle a new love for the seasons and services of the Church;" and we are happy to learn from the publisher's preface, that a work designed to further the same good end, meets with such success as to prove that that love is still growing.

THE MAIDEN AUNT. A Story, by S. M.: reprinted from the last English edition. New York, 1849, D. Appleton & Co; Philadelphia, Geo. S. Appleton; 12mo. pp. 241.

We have not yet found time to read this tale, but have observed numerous notices of it by the press, which speak of it as a remarkably interesting and able work. It originally appeared in Sharpe's Magazine, (London,) and the favour with which it was received has led to its publication in a separate volume. The Guardian, a leading journal of the Church of England, has often spoken of it; and in its last notice says, "For truth of character, and beauty of thought, it far surpassed all others in that once popular periodical of light reading and useful knowledge for Churchmen." From such a quarter, this is no slight praise.

TRANSCRIBERS OF THE SCRIPTURES.—In transcribing the sacred writings it has been a constant rule with the Jews, that whatever is considered as corrupt, shall not be used, but shall be burnt, or otherwise destroyed. A book of the law, wanting but one letter, with one letter too much, or with an error in one single letter, written with anything but ink, or written on parchment made of the hide of an unclean animal, or on parchment not properly prepared for that use, or prepared by any but Israelites, or on skins of parchment tied together by unclean strings, shall be holden to be corrupt, that no word shall be written without a line first drawn on the parchment, no word written by heart, or without having been pronounced orally by the writer; that before he writes the name of God, he shall wash his pen; that no letter shall be joined to another; and if the blank parchment cannot be seen all around each letter, the roll shall be corrupt. There are certain rules for the length and breadth of each sheet, and for the space to be left between each letter, each word, and each section. Even to this day, it is an obligation on the persons who copy the sacred writings of the synagogues to observe them.

Obituary.

For the Banner of the Cross.

Died, on the morning of the 17th ult., at his residence near the Girard College, NATHAN DAVIDSON, Esqr., in the 70th year of his age.

Though Mr. Davidson had attained the period designated by the Psalmist as the term of human existence, and in the ordinary course of things, the time of his departure could not, therefore, be very remote, his numerous friends will not mourn less deeply on that account, a bereavement which has removed from them one whom, in common with the whole community, they had been accustomed to regard with feelings of confidence and respect. His commanding stature, conspicuous above the people, may no longer, alas! be seen among men; but the impress of a character cast in the same lofty proportions will not soon be effaced from their memory. Kind, social, obliging, and sincere in disposition; frank, affable, and courteous in his demeanour; full of pleasantry and good will, "in wit a man, simplicity a child;" he confirmed by the warmth and manliness of his address the esteem which the reputation of higher attributes of mind and heart had conciliated. Soundness of judgment, punctuality in engagement, and a rigid observance of method in all his transactions, were qualities by which he was pre-eminently distinguished. The nature of his occupation had brought him into extensive acquaintance with our leading political men, and furnished him with much practical and entertaining knowledge; which, added to an original vein of thought and expression, made him a most agreeable and instructive companion. Successful in the acquisition of wealth, he had retired from the perplexities of business; and while passing the evening of life in the bosom of his family, and in the indulgence of a generous hospitality, might, in the full capacity of enjoyment, have calculated, not unreasonably, upon long days of sublunary happiness. But it was his lot to add one more to the countless illustrations of the remark, that,

"The spider's most attenuated thread
Is cord, is cable, to man's tender tie
On earthly bliss."

It was in circumstances such as these,—beloved at home, respected abroad, and in the possession of all that could cheer the heart and gladden the eye,—that the warning came, mercifully tempered with long delay, to allow opportunity for preparation. His constitution, impaired by early toil and exposure in the then desert wilderness of the west, sank under a weight of years, which he would probably otherwise have borne without inconvenience; and, with no serious organic disease, none such at least as should have terminated life, he went down to the grave with steady, though almost "unperceived decay;" resignation gently smoothing the descent, and the cheering hopes of the Gospel irradiating his passage to that better world where there is no more death, neither sorrow nor pain; and where the souls of the faithful, after they are delivered from the burden of the flesh, rest from their labours, awaiting in joy and felicity, their perfect consummation and bliss in the eternal and everlasting glory of their REDEEMER. LAMBDIA.

For the Banner of the Cross.

Died, at her residence near Edenton, North Carolina, on the 28th April, after a lingering and painful illness, MRS. SARAH C. SKINNER, in the 51st year of her age, relict of the late Joseph H. Skinner, Esqr.

Mrs. Skinner was left with a family of young children to rear and educate, and a large property to manage and improve. Up to the time of her widowhood, she had lived a quiet life, unaccustomed to the vexations and trials of business. But she was endowed with a strong intellect, and great energy of character; and the result of her management has been the improvement of her estate, and the education of her children in schools of the highest character. Nor was this entirely the result of prudence: Mrs. Skinner was a devout member of the Church, and all her faculties and powers were under the guidance of that "wisdom which is from above." She feared God herself, and all around her were taught to fear and honour Him. She believed in the Lord Jesus Christ herself, and she reared her family to believe in His Holy Name. When the administration of the estate came to her hands, she at once had the black children baptized: and the tutor to her own children, (a pious member of the Church,) became the catechist of the coloured children. Her pastor, the rector of St. Paul's Church, Edenton, visited and instructed her servants occasionally, until she and another worthy christian family, her neighbours, jointly erected a chapel for their slaves; and they now have the services of the Church every Lord's day celebrated by a priest of the Church.

One who had so much the welfare of her servants at heart, and who so well performed her duty towards them, did not neglect the no less responsible and higher duties of a mother towards her children. They were early taught their duties as Christians, and she lived to witness God's blessing upon her constant precepts and faithful example. Every member of her white family was confirmed early, and is a communicant of the Holy Catholic Church. These, except her two eldest sons, who were absent at St. James' College, received with her the Lord's Supper the evening previous to her death.

Nor did Mrs. Skinner only govern her household well. She exhibited her faith in alms-giving and every good work. She was kind and considerate to the poor, and always liberal in her donations to the Church. She was diligent in the use of all the means of grace, prayer, the sacraments, alms-giving; and God vouchsafed to her fidelity a blessing to her family, and a good measure of grace to herself, through which she was enabled to perfect holiness in the fear of God.

There are few persons who have served their generation more faithfully than this excellent Christian woman. She was revered by an extensive circle of friends and relatives, and all honour the memory of so exemplary a matron—a mother in Israel indeed.

THE FOREST FUNERAL.

She was a fair child, with masses of long black hair lying over her pillow. Her eye was dark and piercing, and as it met mine she started slightly, but smiled and looked upward. I spoke a few words to her father, and turning to her, asked her if she knew her condition.

"I know that my Redeemer liveth," said she, in a voice whose melody was like the sweetest strain of the Æolian. You may imagine that the answer startled me, and with a very few words of the like import I turned from her. A half hour passed, and she spoke in the same deep, rich, melodious voice—

"Father, I am cold—lie down beside me;" and the old man lay down by his dying child, and she twined her arms around his neck, and murmured in a dreamy voice, "dear father, dear father!"

"My child," said the man, "doth the flood seem deep to thee?"

"Nay, father, for my soul is strong."

"Seest thou the thither shore?"

"I see it, father—and its banks are green with immortal verdure."

"Hearest thou the voices of its inhabitants?"

"I hear them, father—as the voices of angels, falling from afar in the still and solemn night-time; and they call me; her voice, too, father, O, I heard it then."

"Doth she speak to thee?"

"She speaketh in tones most heavenly."

"Doth she smile?"

"An angel smile! But a cold, calm smile. But I am cold, cold, cold! Father, there is mist in the room. You'll be lonely. Is this death, father?"

"It is death, my Mary."

"Thank God!"

Sabbath evening came, and a slow procession wound through the forest to the little school-house. There, with simple rites the good clergyman performed his duty, and went to the grave. The procession was short. There were hardy men and rough, in shooting-jackets, and some with rifles on their shoulders. But their warm hearts gave beauty to their unshaven faces, as they stood in reverent silence by the grave. The river murmured and the birds sang, and so we buried her.

I saw the sun go down from the same spot—and the stars were bright before I left; for I always had an idea that a graveyard was the nearest place to heaven on earth—and with old Sir Thomas Brown, I love to see a church in a graveyard, for even as we pass through the place of graves to the temple of God on earth, so we must pass through the grave to the temple of God on high.

WASHINGTON AND HIS MOTHER.

Who that has parted with his aged mother, and received her last blessing as he was about to go forth into a land of strangers to seek a home for himself, can read the last interview between Washington and his mother, and suppress the rising tear that starts unbidden at the remembrance of such a scene. Time may dim the recollection of many of the incidents of youth, when we come in contact with the world; but there is a magic in the mother's voice; her well remembered tone of admonition—her kindness and unceasing care will rise up before him who loved her, and follow him, as a guardian angel, in all the varied scenes of life. Happy the man who was blessed with such a mother, and loved her—happier he who having such, forgets not her love, her kindness and instructions.

Immediately after the organization of the present government, George Washington repaired to Fredericksburg, to pay his humble duty to his mother, preparatory to his departing for New York. An affecting scene ensued. The son feelingly marked the ravages a torturing disease had made upon the aged frame of his mother, and thus addressed her:

"The people, madam, have been pleased, with the most flattering unanimity, to elect me to the chief magistracy of the United States; but before I can assume the functions of that office, I have come to bid you an affectionate farewell. So soon as the public business, which must necessarily be encountered in arranging a new government, can be disposed of, I shall hasten to Virginia, and"—here the matron interrupted him:

"You will see me no more. My great age and the disease which is fast approaching my vitals, warn me that I shall not be long in this world. I trust to God, I am somewhat prepared for a better. But go, George, fulfil the destiny which heaven appears to assign you; go my son, and may Heaven and your mother's blessing be with you always."

The President was deeply affected. His head rested on the shoulder of this parent. The brow on which fame had wreathed the purest laurel virtue ever gave to created man, relaxed from its lofty bearing. That look, which could have awed a Roman senator in its Fabrian day, was bent in full tenderness on the time-worn features of this venerable matron.

The great man wept. A thousand fond recollections crowded upon his mind, as memory, retracing scenes long past, carried him back to his paternal mansion, and the days of his youth, and there the centre of attraction was his mother, whose care, instructions, and discipline, had prepared him to reach the topmost height of laudable ambition; yet now were his glories forgotten, while he gazed upon her from whom, wasted by time and malady, he must soon part to meet no more.

The matron's prediction was true. The disease which had so long preyed upon her frame, completed its triumph, and she expired at the age of eighty-five, confiding in the promises of immortality to the humble believer.

THE PARISH MINISTER.

There is a charm in the week-day services of a parish minister, which has not been duly estimated either by philanthropists or patriots. He, in the first instance, meets with general, and I had almost said universal welcome from the families—at least from those in the humbler classes of society. His official and recognized character furnishes him with a ready passport to every habitation; and he will soon find that a visit to the house of a parishioner is the surest way of finding an access to his heart. Even the hardest and most hopeless in vice cannot altogether withstand this influence; and at times, in their own domestic history, there are opportunities, whether by sickness or disaster, or death, which afford a mighty advantage to the Christian kindness that is brought to bear upon them. It is thus that nature and Providence may be said to act as the handmaids of Christianity, by the frequent opening which they afford to its officiating ministers; and of which if he do but avail himself, he is sure to obtain a vast moral ascendancy over the people. Even his courtesies on the way-side are not thrown away upon them; and little do they know of humanity, who would undervalue the most passing smiles and salutations which reciprocate between a clergyman and his people, whether as the symptoms or as the effluents of a cordiality the best fitted to soften the asperities of our nature, and so to cement and harmonize the jarring elements of a commonwealth. And his week-day attentions, and their Sabbath attendance, go hand in hand. A house-going minister wins for himself a church-going people. The bland and benignant influences of his friendly converse, of his private and particular affection, are enlisted on the side of their piety; nor can we imagine a position of greater effectiveness than his, whence to bear on the hearts and habits of a surrounding population.—Chalmers.

"A clergyman ought to have a far greater proportion to live upon than any other man of an equal condition. He is not bred to multiply three-pences; it becomes him not to live mechanically and sordidly; he must be given to hospitality. I do know myself a clergyman, no dignitary, whose books have cost him a thousand pounds, which, when he dies, may be worth to his wife and children about two hundred."

"It will be a shameful reproach to so flourishing a kingdom as this, to have a poor beggarly clergy. For my part, I think nothing too much, nothing too good, for a good minister, a good clergyman. They ought least to want, who best know how to abound. Burning and shining lights do well deserve to be set in good candlesticks."—Nelson, vol. 2, pp. 298, 300.

The lawyer, the physician, the merchant, through cheaper pains, do usually arrive at richer fortunes. And, but that it please God to work inwardly, I should wonder that so many able heads, ingenious spirits, and industrious souls, should joy in the continual life-long pains and care of a parish cure, about one hundred pounds per annum stipend for life; when with easier brows, fewer watchings and lesser charge, they might in another profession (as every day we see it done) fasten a steady inheritance to them and their children of a far larger income.—Sir Edward Dering.

ANSWER OF GREAT BRITAIN

TO THE APPLICATION OF THE POPE FOR ASSISTANCE IN RE-ESTABLISHING THE PAPAL AUTHORITY AT ROME.

"Viscount Palmerston to the Marquis of Normanby.

Foreign-office, March 27, 1849

"My Lord.—I have received your Excellency's despatch of the 8th instant, transmitting to me the copy of the note which has been addressed by Cardinal Antonelli to the representatives of all friendly Powers, requesting them to co-operate for the purpose of re-establishing the Papal authority at Rome.

"I have to instruct your Excellency to say to the Nuncio that her Majesty's Government have received and have attentively considered the communication which he has made to them through your Excellency, and that you are instructed to express to him the deep regret with which her Majesty's Government have witnessed the differences which have arisen between the Pope and his subjects, the assassination of Count Rossi, the departure of the Pope from his capital and states, and the proclamation of a republic at Rome.

"The British Government is, for many obvious reasons, not desirous of taking an active part in any negotiations which may result from the application which the Pope has addressed to some of the Catholic Powers of Europe, whose territories are nearer than Great Britain in Geographical proximity to the Italian peninsula. But the British Government will be much gratified if the result of those negotiations should be such a reconciliation between the Pope and his subjects as might enable the former with the free good will and consent of the latter to return to his capital, and there to resume his spiritual functions and his temporal authority. But it is the opinion of her Majesty's Government that such a reconciliation could scarcely be effected, for the moment, could never be permanent, unless the basis upon which it was founded were to be that the Pope should engage to maintain the constitutional and representative system of Government which he granted last year to his subjects, and unless the separation between the spiritual authority and the temporal Institutions of the state were so clearly and so distinctly established as to put an end to those manifold grievances which the mixture of the spiritual with the temporal power has for so long a period of time produced in the Roman States. The great importance of admitting laymen to administrative and judicial functions in the Roman States was pointed out to the late Pope by the memorandum presented in 1832 to the Roman government by the representatives of Austria, France, Great Britain, Prussia and Russia, and the events which have happened since that time, not only in the Roman States, but in the rest of Europe, have tended to make it still more important that such a reform should be carried out in full and complete execution.

"Your Excellency will give the Nuncio a copy of this despatch. "I am, &c., PALMERSTON."

FORESIGHT.

There is a story of Bishop Seabury, which the temper of these times makes memorable. While he was yet with us, he preached often, and always very earnestly, on the doctrine of the Trinity. So often did he exhort his people to hold fast the faith in this fundamental part, that somebody ventured to ask him whether there appeared to be any doubt on that head, and why he dwelt so feelingly on what no one seemed disposed to question. His reply was, that, in his opinion, the time was not distant when Churchmen in New England would be the only remaining defenders of that essential doctrine, and that he was resolved they should understand its radical importance to practical piety, as well as to sound Divinity. It was foresight worthy of a suffering confessor, and an instinctive adaptation of himself to the future necessities of his flock, which well became the high calling of a founder of a Church.—Church Review.

OUR BLESSINGS MORE THAN OUR CROSSES.

Consider that our good days are generally more in number than our evil days—our days of prosperity (such I mean as is suitable to our condition and circumstances) than our days of adversity. This is most certain, though most of us are apt to cast up our accounts otherwise. How many days of ease have we enjoyed for one of pain! how many blessings for a few crosses! For one danger that hath surprised us, how many scores of dangers have we escaped, and some of them very narrowly! But alas! we write our mercies in the dust, but our afflictions we engrave in marble; our memories serve us too well to remember the latter, but we are strangely forgetful of the former. And this is the greatest cause of our unthankfulness, discontent, and murmuring.—Bishop Bull.

FEARFUL ILLUSTRATION OF SCRIPTURE.

A Liverpool paper says, that when Mr. Nicholson, who was Mr. Hudson's (the English defaulter) brother-in-law, went out and committed the melancholy act which terminated his life, he left on his desk a note containing the following passage; Jeremiah, xvii. 11:—"As the partridge sitteth on eggs and hatcheth them not, so he that getteth riches, and not by right, shall leave them in the midst of his days, and at his end shall be a fool."

BE CAREFUL FOR NOTHING.

What an oppressive burden is taken off a Christian's shoulders by his privilege of leaving all consequences, while in the path of duty to God! He has done with "How shall I bear this trouble?"—"how shall I remove this difficulty?"—"how shall I get through this deep water?"—but leaves himself in the hands of God.—Cecil.

July 18th, P. M., at Sunbury, catechised the children, and addressed the parents and teachers.

July 18th, Evening, preached, and confirmed one person in public and a sick person in private.

July 20th, A. M., at St. Peter's, Philadelphia, confirmed a sailor just going to sea.

July 29th, A. M., at St. Paul's, (Phila.) preached and admitted Mr. Francis C. Clements to Deacon's orders. Died, 1852

July 29th, P. M., at the Floating Church of the Redeemer, preached and confirmed six persons.

July 30th. Laid the corner stone of the Church of the Mediator, Philadelphia, and delivered an address.

VIRGINIA.

ORDINATION.—On Trinity Sunday, at Grace Church, Genito Parish, in the County of Powhatan, the Rev. A. B. TIZZARD was admitted to the order of Priesthood by the Bishop of the Diocese. The candidate was presented by the Rector of the Parish who, with the Rev. Mr. Fisher, united in the imposition of hands. The sermon was preached by the Bishop.—Southern Churchman.

MAINE.

On Sunday, July 8th, the fifth after Trinity, Mr. George Slattery, of the recently graduated class at the General Theological Seminary, was admitted to the Holy Order of Deacons in St. Stephen's Church, Portland. Morning Prayer was read by the Rev. Mr. Pratt, who also presented the candidate. The sermon, on St. Luke, x. 5, 6, was preached by the Bishop.

In the afternoon of the same day, five persons were confirmed in the same church. A sixth had on the preceding day received confirmation on her sick bed.

On Tuesday, July 10th, the Bishop visited the parish at Old Town and Milford. Evening Prayer was read by the Rev. Mr. Burgess, and after a sermon by the Bishop on St. Luke v. 5, eight persons were confirmed. The temporary chapel was thronged with a most attentive congregation; and the increased solemnity in the department of all, and the cordial participation in the services, as well as the number of those who received the laying on of hands, were tokens of the deep impression made by the Church and its services on that community. In the Church at Bangor, on the same evening, the Rev. Mr. Slattery read prayers, and a sermon was preached by the Rev. Mr. Fales.

On Wednesday, July 11th, the annual Convention was held at St. John's Church, Bangor. Ten clergymen were present. Morning Prayer was read by the Rev. Messrs. Gardiner and Pratt; the sermon was preached by the Rev. Mr. Burgess, on 2 Kings vi. 16; and the Holy Communion was administered by the Bishop, assisted by the Rev. Mr. Pratt. In the afternoon the Address of the Bishop and the Parochial reports were read. Sixty-one persons had been confirmed: two deacons and one priest ordained; the Diocesan Board of Missions had been enabled, with an expenditure of $1200, to close the year without debt; there were thirteen clergymen and one candidate for orders. In the evening, prayers were read by the Rev. Mr. Eastman, and the annual Missionary Sermon was preached by the Rev. Mr. Pratt.

On Monday, July 12th, after Morning Prayer had been read by the Rev. Mr. Murray, the Convention continued its proceedings with much interest and harmony; and in the afternoon, the business of the Board of Missions was transacted. Perhaps no Diocesan Missionary Society has labored more efficiently than this, in proportion to its resources; but it has been, and must be much indebted to the free gifts of friends to its work in older and wealthier dioceses. The Bishop and most of the Convention proceeded in the evening to Orono, seven miles above Bangor. Here, the services of the Church have been held for a few months past, and, as this occasion demonstrated, with much promise and with fruit. The Congregational meeting-house was granted for the services of the evening; the Rev. Mr. Burgess read prayers; the Bishop preached on Matthew xxv. 21, and seven persons, all of most respectable position and character, though but recently acquainted with the Episcopal Church, received the laying on of hands. The cordial and hospitable welcome tendered to the clergy and brethren of the Convention on this their first visit to Orono, and the warm affection disclosed for the treasure which had been found in the ritual and communion of the Church, left upon every mind a stronger conviction of the wideness of that door which is opened for us in the remote East.—Christian Witness.

MASSACHUSETTS.

ORDINATION.—On Wednesday the 25th ult., St. James' Day, the Rt. Rev. Bishop Eastburn admitted the Rev. Thomas R. Pynchon to the order of Priests, in Trinity Church.

The address was made by the Bishop; and the candidate was presented by the Rev. George M. Randall. The Rev. Messrs. M. B. Chase, Woart, Slafter, Randall and Porter, united with the Bishop in the imposition of hands. The holy communion was administered by the Bishop, assisted by the Rev. Mr. Porter.

The Rev. Mr. Pynchon has received and accepted a call to the rectorship of St. Paul's Church, Stockbridge.—Witness.

LOUISIANA.

SAILOR'S HOME, NEW ORLEANS.—We are informed in a communication from Mr. Henry B. Brewster, that the Rev. Mr. Whitehall, formerly a minister of the Methodist persuasion, but now a clergyman of the Church in New Orleans, is conducting a mission among the sailors in that city with great success. A handsome, neat, commodious church building has been erected, and was to have been ready for consecration by the 4th of July.

Mr. Brewster says,—"Having for the last thirteen years resided at the South, and feeling a deep interest in the cause of Seamen, and knowing that a Home cannot be supported without Temperate Seamen, and that some months, or more probably, years, must elapse before the Home can be built and put in operation, I have concluded to come to New York, and try if possible to raise some means to enable me to co-operate more efficiently there; to devote myself to the out doors working, so necessary and indispensable to the success of the Bethel cause in New Orleans. The Church and Christian men, have everything yet to do in that city, and out door labor by somebody, must be performed. I have therefore resolved on trying it, myself, provided I can find friends to aid me, and I am now in New York, on this business, and shall be happy to see my friends interested in these matters, if they will call on me at the Sailor's Home in Cherry Street, during my short stay in this city." We have no personal acquaintance with the writer, but are confident that the ardor and devotion with which he writes will recommend the cause and its agent to the attention of our readers.—Churchman.

Clerical Changes.

The Rev. John P. T. Ingraham, late of the Diocese of Wisconsin, has received letters dimissory to the Diocese of Tennessee, and has been appointed Missionary to the city of Nashville, where he requests all letters and papers to be directed.

The Rev. John Stearns has resigned the pastoral care of Christ Church, Oyster Bay, and accepted an unanimous call to the Rectorship of St. Peter's Church, Brooklyn. Correspondents will please direct accordingly.

The Rev. William N. Irish, having received and accepted a call to the rectorship of St. John's Church, Harper's Ferry, Va., desires his letters and papers to be directed accordingly.

GATHERINGS FROM NATURAL HISTORY.

THE LARK.

Whilst speaking of these birds, I will mention another curious circumstance respecting them. I have often strained my eyes in watching them while they sang their beautiful notes on the wing, till I could see them no longer.

"Up springs the lark,
Shrill-voiced and loud, the messenger of morn."

If, in his descent, he hears the voice of his mate, you may observe him fall to the earth apparently like a stone. This, however, does not take place during the period of incubation, or before the young birds have left their nest. At those times I have observed that the lark, in his descent, flies along the surface of the field, and alights at some distance from his nest. It is evident that this foresight is given to it, by its benevolent Creator, for the better preservation of its young, as, if it alighted at its nest, the spot might easily be watched, and its brood fall a prey to some thoughtless or unfeeling marauder.

This bird is a great favourite with me, and notwithstanding all the poets have said of the nightingale, I doubt whether the lark be not listened to, during its aerial flights, with more pleasure than any other of our songsters.

"To hear the lark begin his flight,
And singing, startle the dull night,
From his watch-tower in the skies,
Till the dapple dawn arise;
Then to come, in spite of sorrow,
And at my window bid good morrow."

Some time ago one of my labourers told me, that, in mowing some grass, he had found the nest of a sky-lark, with young ones in it which seemed to have been hatched three or four days. At my request he watched the old birds, and saw them come to their nest, and remove their young to a place of greater safety. This they did by taking them up with their feet. I was much pleased with this information, not only as communicating a new and interesting fact in natural history, but as corroborating my former opinion respecting the uses to which the apparently unnecessary length of the claws of the lark may be applied.

I will mention another instance:—As some gentlemen were walking on an open and elevated road, with fields on both sides of it, their attention was attracted by a shrieking cry, and they discovered a pair of sky-larks rising out of the stubble, and crossing the road before them at a slow rate. One of them had a young bird in its claws, and, when she reached the opposite field, she dropped it from a height of about thirty feet, and it was killed by the fall. On taking it up, it appeared to have been hatched about eight or nine days. It is evident that the affectionate parent was endeavouring to convey its young one to a place of safety, but that its strength failed in the attempt.

The lark has kindly feelings even towards the young of another species. One of these birds which had been taken from the nest when very young, and brought up in a cage, was turned out when it was able to fly, and some young goldfinches put into its place. The lark returned to her former abode, and was again put into the cage with the goldfinches. They were weak and feeble, and she not only brooded over them, but fed them.—Jesse.

THE RAVEN.

No bird in the creation exhibits finer symmetry than the raven. His beautiful proportions, and his glossy plumage, are calculated to strike the eye of every beholder with admiration. He is by far the largest of all the pie tribe in Europe; and, according to our notion of things, no bird can be better provided with the means of making his way through the world; for his armour is solid, his spirit unconquerable, and his strength surprising.

Necromancers of old were noted for their attention to the movements of the raven; and they are said to have counted no less than sixty-five different inflections of the voice. His sable robe and hollow croaking, seem to have rendered him of vast importance in those days; when old women were known to travel through the air on broom-sticks, and when the destiny of man was frequently foretold by the flight of birds. Nay, in our own times, the raven has not quite lost all claim to the knowledge of things to come; for good farmer Muckrag's wife, while jogging on with eggs to market, knew that there was mischief brewing, as soon as she heard a raven croak on the unlucky side of the road—

That raven on the left hand oak,
Curse on his ill-betiding croak,
Bodes me no good.

She had scarcely uttered this, when down came her old stumbling mare to the ground. Her every egg was smashed to atoms; and, whilst she lay sprawling on the ruins of her oological speculation, she was perfectly convinced, in her own mind, that the raven had clearly foreseen her irreparable misadventure.—C. Waterton.

THE BEE.

The power this insect has of producing its own species appears to be much increased in this climate, where there is no pinching winter. The produce of one hive gave, in three years, three hundred hives; besides those that had escaped into the bush, and became wild. This statement may appear extraordinary at first sight, but a reference to figures will attest its truth; and it must be recollected that the parent hive, and each of its swarms, with their produce again, and so on, are continually increasing.—Rambles in New South Wales.

THE RELIGIOUS CONDITION OF NEW-ENGLAND.

If any one imagines that we have inadvertently included Romanism in this catalogue, or have only introduced it to eke out our Heptarchy of heresy, we shall not leave him long in his error. We have made out our descending scale of unbelief, advisedly, regarding the Romanism of Mr. Newman as a mere system of rationalism, of which the former might just as well be set to Swedenborgianism or Pantheism, as to Tridentine Popery. The Development of Mr. Newman is only a dignified name for the progress which is so everlastingly bleated by the disciples of Dr. Horace Bushnell. Mr. Orestes Brownson has demonstrated the identity dialectically, in his Review, and exhibited it practically in his person. Besides, we wish to be understood as distinctly asserting that Romanism is already as really enshrined in one Puritan College in New England, as Socinianism is in another. We could be particular, but we shall be sufficiently clear to those who know the facts, when we say, that if there be concealed Jesuitism in New England, it is embodied, not in any high-churchman, but in a Puritan Doctor of Divinity, who presides over a New England College. Many will know where to look, as we whisper, without, as yet, pointing the finger.

Ecce! latet Romæ vultus sub veste Geneva! With Romanism, we have placed on our list the more refined and imaginative forms of rationalism, just in the order in which they seem naturally to succeed. In Pantheism, there is something large and pseudo-catholic, into which, as an ocean, the others naturally empty; and we think, even now, we might find in Boston, a man of intelligence and education, who in precisely the order we have set, has become the epitome of Puritan degeneracy. He first adopted a loose and vague negation of Calvinism, and came to man's estate in the good-humored persuasion that no heresy was so bad as to be accused, and no sinner so reprobate as to be damned. Passing lightly through the vulgar stage of Universalism, he soon avowed more distinctly an entire coincidence with the less fetid and revolting, but not less noisome, unbelief of Channing. A Yankee habit of free inquiry, soon carried him, by influences, quite as far as he could now be led by Theodore Parker; but here he was arrested by the more systematic infidelity of Fourier, whose Socialism at least appeared to descend to actual humanity, and to propose something remedially adequate to its innumerable ills. He was already a disciple to Mesmer, when he was introduced to a Swedenborgian treatise on the resurrection, which seemed to him the very essence of Philosophy and Poetry together. The credulity of scepticism had nearly identified him with a "New Jerusalem" congregation, when he was met in company by a fascinating Congregational Minister, whose learning and accomplishments are never fully exhibited except in table-talk and social intercourse.

There was in this gentleman, a mysterious combination of frankness and concealment, and an air of mingled sympathy and respect, conveyed in a certain keen suavity, which, in America, is not frequently encountered, though in Europe it is instinctively recognized as the only livery of a Jesuit. The vague yet apparently deep suggestions of this extraordinary apparition, had thrown our inquiring friend into a new train of reflection, when he found himself introduced by his new guide to the society of a lady, who gave him more definite directions as to the books he ought to read, and the course he ought to adopt. The later writings of Mr. Newman, with those of certain French sophists of the reactionary school, were put into his hands, and he soon began to think that his own principles, if honestly developed, would infallibly carry him into the unsuspected necessity of joining extremes, and resting at last in paradoxical, pictorial, poetical, and even philosophical Rome. Our friend was of an imaginative mould, and soon owned to a new yearning, which his fair promptress was not slow to stimulate. He began to feel the awful beauty of the Madonna; he soon yielded entire assent to Newman's argument for her deification; he was next found hovering at the side of his Sybil, around the dim interior of the Romish Cathedral; and then he was easily brought to his knees, by her example, or, as he explains it, by virtue of a vigil, which she had celebrated in his behalf, appealing to the Blessed Virgin for the salvation of his soul. Finally, before he knew it, kneeling on his knees, one evening, he actually bowed his head, and adored the Holy Sacrament, as it was lifted among the tapers, and shone in the glittering monstrance amid the smoke of incense which curled around it like clouds about the Transfiguration, while a melting female voice—from the Opera—gave forth that ringing melody from Aquinas,—

Pange lingua gloriosi
Corporis mysterium!

That Latin did the business! To be sure, it was somewhat marred by the fact, which afterwards transpired, that the whole artistic effect had been the result of special negotiation for his sake, and of some broad suggestions to Father Dermot to be graceful in his part of the business and to omit (for that night only) the taking of snuff, and of blowing his nose, just before the final genuflection; but it was, on the whole, successful. The newspapers announced the conversion of "an accomplished and highly gifted young Bostonian," and for awhile the proselyte outdid his confessor in the multitude of his devotions, and the rigor of his fasts.

It deserves also to be noticed that, from a mistaken idea of the nature of purgatory, which his ghostly fathers never took the pains to correct, he found great consolation in purchasing masses for a long line of heretical grandmothers, who had died as hardened in Puritanism as Plymouth Rock could make them. It was not till a nice little portion of his patrimony had been thus piously appropriated, that he discovered that it was de fide to believe the whole tribe of his ancestors unentitled to purgatorial benefits, and beyond all peradventure, lost eternally, unless, in bar of judgment, they had put in the plea of invincible ignorance, which their great reputation for veracity rendered impossible. This discovery gave the first shock to our friend's sense of the value of cash and self-respect, and prepared him for an introduction to those publications of an English Society called "The Catholic Series," which a member of Harvard University recommended to him as grafting a broad philosophy upon a stock of Romanism. He was soon carried away with Michelet and Quinet, whose confession of the great services of Romanism, in times past, gave him so comfortable an escape from modern Ultramontanism, into the noble Catholicity of all-absorbing Pan. He now saw clearly the natural unity of all religions and creeds. He could be, at once, a Romanist, a Brahmin, and a Ghebir. Even the æsthetical ritual of the Latins need not be relinquished. He found even in Chateaubriand, a confession that its most bewitching ceremonies were but reproductions of oriental idolatries. "What else," says that author, "are the tonsure, the stole, the host itself—when the Holy Sacrament is lifted radiant in priestly hands! Is it not the same symbol which, among the Persians, represented the sun's disk and glittering rays? Would not the Magi claim the whole scene for their own?" True, answered our friend, as he thought of Father Dermot; and in short, he is now a Pantheist: and may the Lord have mercy on his soul!

That such may, very possibly, be the various stages of New England degeneracy, unless Providence graciously gives mastery to the Truth, must be apparent to any one who knows the religious condition of the "Modern Athens,"—as it is the fashion to style Boston, probably because so many of its inhabitants "spend their time in nothing else, but either to hear or to tell some new thing." The prediction is justified by glaring facts, by the very waning of Socinianism, which has emptied itself into the pulpits and seminaries of reputed orthodoxy, and dismissed its disciples to the lower seats of irreligion. Many, who care not to join a sect, are nevertheless, in fact, the disciples of Parker and Fourier. Swedenborgianism has got possession of some strong points d'appui in Massachusetts and the State of Maine. Romanism dwells hard by, and confidently bides her time, while she secretly pulls every wire to hasten a reactionary development of rationalism; while if the religious influence of Harvard be worthy of a name, it is already Pantheistic. A feeble attempt has indeed been made by one of its Doctors to save the modicum of faith which he retains, and for which he fights, like an Athanasius; but there is not a straw's worth of difference between Pantheism and his own Ism, in the estimation of a Catholic. So true it is that even unbelievers love to imagine themselves Abdiels, and that—as our historical tract has noticed—they, who all their lives have promoted the issues from which they shrink at last, will die in the last ditch, for the shadows of truth, to whose standards they profess to cling.

But we will not embarrass our own position by undertaking for the future. It may be that none of the seven Isms will ever win the day: the Truth may be graciously allowed to prevail. We are content to speak of the present. What actually is—is bad enough. Rationalism, in its broad comprehensiveness, is already the distinctive religion of New England. We appeal to the tracts we are reviewing; we appeal to the movements of the day; we appeal to the eyesight of every educated and pious man in the six States. Again, we appeal to every New England Churchman, and we beg him to ask himself, where is the remedy, if not in the religion of which he is a professor? Where else is the New Testament fully preached and fully believed? We look then to Churchmen to show their colors and, "to speak the truth in love." Let a firm and consistent front be maintained; let us know ourselves, and show our antagonists that we know them. And by knowing ourselves, we mean knowing what are truly the "distinctive principles" of our religion, as it exists among heresies so various and so flagrant. Episcopacy and the Apostolical succession may be regarded as matters of course. Our ritual system should be less commended, and more thoroughly carried out: for merely to talk about Lent and Ember-days is pharisaism, while the keeping of them, in unobtrusive sincerity and truth, would be letting our light shine before men. But our distinctive principles are the Creeds.

The Trinity, the Incarnation, the Atonement, Regeneration, Justification, and the Resurrection of the dead—these doctrines, and those which are inseparable from them, as they are revealed in the Gospel, and as they were originally believed in the Church—are, in short, confessed in our own Communion, and nowhere else in New England. This is a truth which every day is making more and more apparent; but as there are many persons involved in the spreading degeneracy, who do not suspect it, it is our duty to give them warning in the spirit of frankness and charity. Having no standards of doctrine, they cannot see whither they are drifting, nor how far they have already floated from the anchorage which they intended to hold. Let us then light up the beacon fires of Truth and Love. Let us lift up the Cross. Let us claim that as our great principle. To such an appeal, many an ear will be open, that closes like a bivalve at the first syllable about Bishops, Priests, and Deacons. We have depended too much upon cold logic and dry history; we have felt that the plain matter-of-fact doctrines of the Succession and the Apostleship were enough to persuade men. And so they would be, if men were ordinarily capable of seeing the bearing of these things, and of feeling their necessity. In our Church's feeblest day, and while she but lisped these alphabetic verities, amid scorn and contempt, their force was felt. Yale has never forgotten the searchings of heart, the hubbub and the havoc, that were made among her Doctors a century ago, by the few stubborn things discovered in her library, by her own sons, ere yet habitual imperception had blinded their moral vision. To the merest outside truths, which we preach, the head and front of Puritanism bowed down in 1722. Yale never had a President of whom she has more reason to be proud, than of Rector Cutler, who leaving all she gave, came out from Puritanism, to join a feeble handful of Churchmen, because among them only he could find and exercise a valid Ministry. Let her remember too her Johnson, and others with him, who made themselves martyrs for the same constraining truths, and let her not affect to sneer at doctrines which, however elementary, she has been made to feel so deeply, and to which she has paid such tribute! Yet we repeat it, these triumphs were gained upon a giant, with the sling and pebble stones of our youth. We cannot do the feat again, for the simple reason that truth felt, and yet resisted, is less forcibly felt another time. The blow made all New England reel: but when Puritanism recovered itself, and found that it had retained here and there an important name, it could say to her youth, "the worst is over, and we are yet alive." This single assumption has been its preservation. It has taken for granted that the Church had no more to say, and has always represented the contest as one about forms, to which sound minds refused to listen. This we have too much encouraged by consenting to make no advances, and by fighting the battle over, on the old fields. But it must be so no longer. The true issues now are more serious, and by God's good providence we have grown strong. A hundred Churches in Connecticut alone; six Bishops where once there seemed no prospect of one; and a College baptized into the Trinal name, and capable of being made an armory and a fortress of the Faith,—these are our sinews; and for our strength—the Lord of Hosts is with us; He teacheth our hands to war, and our fingers to fight! Now then, let us quit ourselves like men. We no longer dispute for outposts; it is the Citadel which is attacked, and which we must defend. In plain words we are not contending for Episcopacy, but for the Faith once delivered to the Saints.—Church Review.

INDIAN ORATION AT WILLIAMSBURGH.

A son of the forest, named, we understand, Couperthwaite, has recently been delighting large audiences at Mr. Stevenson's church, Williamsburgh, by his delineations of Indian character and community. He belongs to one of the northwestern tribes, which tribe, until 16 years ago, he stated, had never heard the name of a Redeemer and that a Saviour had died for the sins of men.

In speaking of this subject, in his discourse on the Sabbath, he turned back to the title page of the Bible, and said, in reference to this blessed book, I find that it is one thousand eight hundred and forty nine years since the Saviour was born—it is more than 300 years since your Puritan fathers came to this land with this holy, this blessed book in their possession—with the knowledge of the Saviour as their guide and shield—that you have sent this book with all its glorious privileges and hopes to every part of the world, and yet to the poor Indians, who live at your very threshold, it is but 16 short years since the missionary found his way to his forest home and dispensed to him the bread of life. Oh, did you know the Indian character as I do, could you have seen as I have, more than 400 of my poor countrymen, after they had received the knowledge of this dear Saviour, weeping at the thought of that love which came upon earth to seek and to save dying men. They had previously acknowledged a Great Spirit, a Great God, but they thought he ruled his world by agencies, that there was a God of the hunter, a God of the warrior, a God of the flowers—that everything was conducted by agencies; but when this book came it revealed a God, a creation, and a Saviour, and dispelled the mystery and uncertainty which hung over their lives.

Oh, would you have known the feeling, continued the speaker, before the light of this book came among us, when myself and some of my kindred, at times, after painting our faces black, which was the custom for the occasion, would go at early dawn to the summit of the highest mountain, and placing our faces towards the rising sun, gaze at its disc to see if by any spot or other indication it would give hope that I should be a great warrior, or great hunter, or great medical man, which three constituted the height of our ambition, and after watching it all day, and finally behold it set beneath the western horizon without having given such indication, we would turn our eyes below, see the smoke of our father's wigwam, and return to it with a disappointed and a heavy heart. Not so after we received the light of Christianity—we no longer looked at the sun's disc for indications of the future, but saw them in the light of the Saviour's love, and in the hope and immortality revealed in this blessed book.

The speaker made many points of pure and impassioned eloquence, particularly when speaking of the wants, and neglect by the white man, of his poor countrymen, and presented many beautiful and impressive metaphors. He stated that while on a journey, on one occasion he observed a pine tree on the top of a high mountain, on the shore of Lake Superior, and overhanging the waters; his attention was attracted by the appearance of two eagles flying and whirling around this tree and then flying across a deep chasm or ravine which was near to it. On approaching nearer he observed a young eagle sitting on one of the branches, and again the eagles flew past the tree and back to their former hold. Soon the young eagle fluttered its wings, at first seemed timid, but finally took its flight, and followed the eagles across the ravine! and O what joy did those eagles seem to possess at seeing their young first venture through its native element. Such, I thought, was the poor Indian; let the white man but soar before him, showing the way the Saviour trod, and he will gladly follow in their wake.

He made many other fine points of the kind, and earnestly plead for the care of the white man over the hitherto benighted children of the forest. The speaker appears to be not only a man of deep eloquence but sincere and fervid piety.

On Wednesday evening he gave a more general lecture as to the character and requirements of his brethren. The church, which is very capacious, was filled to repletion. The speaker was attired in the costume of his country, which appeared very becoming. He spoke with deep feeling, and genuine unsophisticated eloquence, for nearly two hours, enchaining the interest of his hearers, and creating a deep effect. He spoke of the efforts of the missionaries, the gladness with which their advice and instructions were received—the readiness with which the Indian exchanged his wild habits, erected a school-house, then a church beside it, cultivated the earth, built houses, and commenced lives of happiness and civilization—but while, on one hand, the missionary came, with healing on his wings, he was soon followed on the other, by his white brethren, who told the Indian he must leave the land he had cultivated, the house he had built, the school-house and church he had erected, the bones of his kindred that lie sleeping beneath, and go further West—and if they did not remove sufficiently quiet, the soldiers would come and compel in the work of banishment—this would be again and again repeated in each new location—thus said the speaker, the tree of life and knowledge, which grew bright and flourishing, by frequently being transplanted, its branches withered and its roots died.

He said the Indian character was such as easily to acquire the habits and adornments of civilized life; he has seen those among them who, like Newton, could read the stars. The character of the Indian is a peculiar and a strong one, and wants but cultivation to be useful to himself and to mankind.

The speaker stated his intention of revisiting his native wilds, and to return, if possible, in season to solicit Congress for a grant of land whereby his tribe may remain located and unmolested, and enjoy undisturbed, the light of christianity and civilization.

At the close of his oration, crowds of ladies and gentlemen pressed forward to take the speaker by the hand. It was indeed a proud occasion for a child of the forest—a son of the ancient lords of the continent, and a fervent and effective appeal for the aborigines.—N. Y. Express.

From the Churchman's Companion.

THE UNBELIEVER.

The infidel's voice died away, his head sunk on his breast, his tale was told. Could he have said a word to add to the fearful picture he had drawn? Had he not disclosed most fully in his long narrative, even to minute details, that state so awfully, so comprehensively described in these words—"without God in the world?"

Raymond breathed a long sigh of relief, when at length the deep despairing accents of the sceptic ceased to fall upon his ear,—like one who on a gloomy winter's night sits listening with a sort of fascination to the moaning of the wind, that seems to wail in bitterest lamentation; a sound more full of hopeless melancholy than any nature could produce, he had sat there, while the infidel laid bare before him the desolation of his soul; stripping the veil from every delusive joy this earth can offer, and giving not even the shadow of a hope to fill the vacancy they left. Now, overcome with the ghastly images he himself had conjured up, Araby sunk into a state of utter exhaustion, and he had turned away his face from his companion as though he desired never more to look on any human being.

Raymond spoke very gently: "Araby," he said, "you know not how deeply I feel for you; if there can be indeed exist upon this earth that thing of which we often lightly talk—despair—to you it is assuredly given to know its bitterness. I feel as though you had taken me by the hand, and led me forth into a dismal wilderness,—a black, a dreary, boundless waste; no light in heaven, but only thick portentous clouds; no flowers on earth, but only thorny labyrinths, and pitfalls deadly and unseen. But, O wanderer, most helpless and benighted, wherefore is it that you cannot see how your own words rise up in judgment against you? You have said you will not believe a power all evil formed and rules this world; nor yet that it is the spontaneous effect of chance; see you not, then, that if the Creator, whatever be His awful attributes, had never given a hope to man, your existence—even yours only, one of unnumbered millions of His creatures—would be a blot upon His gorgeous and sublime creation, which could obscure and tarnish all the glory of His hundred thousand worlds?"

"Well have you shown what this life is: how ephemeral, deceptive, and corrupt; and can you suppose that generation after generation, age after age, the helpless race of man would have been cast forth upon this desert world, to wander to and fro, bewildered and weeping, till driven to the tomb like cattle to the slaughter—whilst, throughout His serene eternity, the Universal Father never once sent up through the echoing realms of infinite space, the one all-sufficient word—consummation of every soul's desire—the awful 'I AM'?" No; it is an impious thought; there was, there is a revelation!

"You have shown what a horrible mocking sport would have been the creation of man, if he were destined never to know an existence holier and happier than this brief feverish strife: but is there nothing sublime in the idea, worthy even of the DEITY, that the Omnipotent called forth from the womb of vacancy by the mere power of His will this whole stupendous universe in all its wonderful details, with myriads on myriads of living creatures, exquisitely formed, for the one and only purpose of giving them the sensation of happiness? Not here, for here He hath permitted that a power should work, of which we can and may know nothing; and there was never madness like to that which would seek to penetrate the mystery of evil; for it is self-evident that to comprehend the Infinite and His mysteries, the mind must in itself be infinite, and His own created soar to a level with the Supreme, the Unapproachable even in thought? O folly most presumptuous!"

Raymond paused, and lifted up his eyes in deep thought to that weak, faint reflection of the Eternal's glory which the skies by night display; while Araby, burying his head in the pillows, seemed determined not to hear him. The Christian observed this with a heavy sigh, and when he spoke again he made no attempt to address his companion, but continued to pursue the train of his own reflections.

"There is a thought," he said, "one awful thought, beneath whose power the soul shrinks, cowering as a stricken bird beneath the lightning's flash—the thought of that tremendous solitude enduring from all eternity, when the First Cause, the one only Self-Existent—did alone exist—ere yet from His inscrutable will the universe had sprung, bearing aloft into space the principle of life; and infinity, knowing His presence only, was replete. It is thus that the spirit, rising up to acknowledge and to know the FATHER, must first behold Him; then came the rush of the worlds through the air, as, born from the Omnipotent Thought, they fled into existence through the realms of ether: star after star brightened into life, and marshalled themselves in glittering ranks, like soldiers at the war-cry: system after system, majestically complete and perfect in each minute detail, rose up from void, and ranged themselves in order. Like a wind rife with fragrant odours stealing over the sea, a life-giving breath swept through the vibrating air, and speedily whole myriads of sentient and seraphic beings awoke to purity and joy; and the first cry of their new being was the sweet melody of adoring praise. Hand in hand did life and beauty walk abroad to penetrate the young creation.

"Then, and with awe-struck reverence, let us approach this mystery: slowly from unfathomable depths a mighty shadow rose. Darkness in visible shape passed over the shrinking universe; but in that same hour it was decreed that by the light it should be combated and conquered. And so it was, and is; the war doth yet endure, the triumph is to come; and every event, the least as well as greatest, which occurs in the vast regions of unknown space, bears reference to this decree: not a helpless babe is born of human parents, or mighty world extinguished and driven a wreck from sphere to sphere, but to this end! Our sight is limited, our minds are finite; we can only look around and see it working here.

"Troubled and heavy laden, our earth hung powerless in its appointed place; confused and blind, her children staggered over her breast, mournfully wondering why they existed and why they suffered. Those who sat by the dead sorrowed without hope; those who by sin could gratify their evil passions, sinned and repented not; those who, being deceived, were tortured, in their turn used deceit and smiled again: virtuous names were given to unholy deeds: revenge was called honour: cruelty was termed justice; oppression was said to be necessity; there was a chaos in every soul, and a blight on the sweet flowers of innocent love and faithful friendship, which had strayed from Paradise to blossom here.

"But the revelation came: not in the whirlwind—not in the fire—but in the still small voice, in the first low murmur from the Sinless Lips of the Child Divine. The declaration sent from the high and lofty One that inhabiteth eternity, to His creatures on this puny earth, was simply this, 'God is love!' At His command the words made themselves wings and passed over the world, penetrating every corner. The deep shadow had been there, but they dispelled it; as of old the outer darkness fled, when it was uttered, 'Let there be light.' They passed over the earth, and her children ceased to wonder mournfully why they suffered: but, looking upward, adored Him Who chastens where He loves; they who sat by the dead, sorrowing without hope, arose and sung hymns of thanksgiving, of which the burden was ever immortality. Men ceased from iniquity, repented them of sin, and plucked the unclean thing from their breasts, through self-inflicted wounds: the deceived forgave and prayed for the deceivers; meekness was exalted, pride and arrogance laid low. There was a new creation, bright and pure in every soul, when the Spirit of God moved over the chaos of the mind. The blight was taken from the flowers which love or friendship scatter on our path, and hues to them were given which should be able to endure throughout the light of everlasting day. From those blest realms, where good will is cherished towards men, the Spirit of Peace descended upon earth, and passed with pitying steps from land to land. Beneath her soft and pure white wings she gathered all who mourned and were oppressed, the weary and the penitent, the desolate and lonely, the outcast from the world, and chilled in heart, the rejected and betrayed; to her they came, and nestled closely by her side, and from their eyes the tears were wiped away, and the throbbing of their hearts was stilled; for there they rested in hope."

"Raymond?" exclaimed Araby, starting up, with a flushed cheek and glaring eye, and with something almost of madness in his feverish excitement; "I tell you I cannot bear such words to-night; they mock me with their whispers of peace. Go, leave me, I entreat you; the sound of a human voice is hateful to me; I have fulfilled my promise; I have told you all. Now why do you stand to triumph over me with your unattainable calm? why do you speak to me of joys I cannot share? To-morrow—another day—we may talk again, but now, now you torture me with your serenity. I will not lie here to see you looking out from the paradise of your soul's deep rest upon my miserable strife. Release me from that quiet gaze—leave me to-night."

Raymond saw that it would be both cruel and injudicious not to comply at once with the request of the unhappy man; he therefore rose, and would have given his hand, but Araby turned away impatiently, and hid his face on the cushion; it was evident that his envy of the Christian had turned to positive hate.

THE FIFTH COMMANDMENT.

"Honor thy father and thy mother, that thy days may be long upon the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee."—Exod. 20: 12.

"Honor thy parents, those that gave thee birth, And watched in tenderness thine earliest days, And trained thee up in youth, and loved in all. Honor, obey, and love them; it shall fill Their souls with holy joy, and shall bring down God's richest blessings on thee; and in days To come, thy children, if they shall be given, Shall honor thee, and fill thy life with peace."

The judicious Hooker used to say—"If I had no other reason and motive for being religious, I would earnestly strive to be so, for the sake of my mother, that I might requite her care of me, and cause her widow's heart to sing for joy."

Washington, when a boy, was about going to sea as a midshipman, and his trunk had been taken to the boat, when, as he went to take leave of his mother, he saw the tears bursting from her eyes, and an expression of deep sadness on her countenance. Seeing the distress of his parent, he at once turned to the servant, and said, "Go and tell them to bring my trunk. I will not go away, and break my mother's heart." His mother was struck with the spirit and manner of the decision, and at once said to him—"My son, God has promised to bless the children that honor their parents, and I believe he will bless you."

Philip Henry, speaking of an undutiful and wicked son in his neighborhood, charged his children to observe the providence of God concerning him—"Perhaps (said he) I may not live to see it, but do you mark if God does not send some remarkable judgment upon him in this life, for thus revolting the fifth commandment." But he lived to see it fulfilled soon after, in a very signal providence.

Olympia, the mother of Alexander the Great, was so severe towards him, that his deputy, Antipater, wrote him long letters of complaint against her; to which Alexander returned this answer—"Knowest thou not that one tear of my mother's will blot out a thousand of thy letters of complaint."

A youth lamenting the death of an affectionate parent, a friend endeavored to console him, by saying he had always conducted towards the departed one with tenderness and respect. "So I thought (said the other) while my parents were living; but now I remember, with shame and deep sorrow, many instances of disobedience and neglect, for which, alas! it is now too late ever to make any atonement."

"Let all children remember, (says Dr. Dwight,) if ever they are weary of laboring for their parents, that Christ labored for his; if impatient of their commands, that Christ cheerfully obeyed; if reluctant to provide for their parents, that Christ forgot himself and provided for his mother amid the agonies of the crucifixion. The affectionate language of this divine example to every child is, 'Go thou and do likewise.'

A SCENE ON THE RIVER JORDAN.

(From Lieut. Lynch's Narrative.)

At 9 o'clock P. M. we arrived at 'El Meshra,' the bathing place of the Christian pilgrims, after having been 15 hours in the boats. The ford is consecrated by tradition, as the place where the Israelites passed over with the ark of the covenant; and where our blessed Saviour was baptized by John. Feeling that it would be desecration to moor the boats at a place so sacred, we passed it, and with some difficulty found a landing below. My first act was to bathe in the consecrated stream, thanking God, first, for the precious favor of being permitted to visit such a spot; and secondly, for his protecting care throughout our perilous voyage. For a long time after, I sat upon the bank, my mind oppressed with awe, as I mused upon the great and wondrous events which had here occurred. Perhaps directly before me,—for this is near Jericho, 'the waters stood and rose up upon an heap,' and the multitudinous host of the Israelites passed over—and, in the bed of the stream a few yards distant may be the twelve stones, marking "the place where the feet of the priests which bare the ark of the covenant stood." Tradition, sustained by the geographical features of the country, makes this also the scene of the baptism of the Redeemer. The mind of man, trammelled by sin, cannot soar in contemplation of so sublime an event. On that wondrous day, when the Deity veiled in flesh descended the bank, all nature, hushed in awe, looked on. And the impetuous river, in grateful homage, must have stayed its course, and gently laved the body of its Lord. In such a place it seemed almost desecration to permit the mind to be diverted by the cares which pressed upon it—but it was wrong—for next to faith, surely the highest christian obligation is the performance of duty. Over against this was no doubt the Bethabara of the New Testament, whither the Saviour retired, when the Jews sought to take him at the feast of the dedication.—The interpretation of Bethabara is 'a place of passage over.' Our Lord repaired to Bethabara, where John was baptizing; and as the ford probably derived its name from the passage of the Israelites with the ark of the covenant, the inference is not unreasonable that this place has been doubly hallowed.

DISTRUST OF PROVIDENCE

Is a speedy process; throw away faith with its trust for the past, love for the present, hope for the future, and you throw away all that makes sorrow bearable, or joy lovely; the best of us, if God withheld his help, would apostatize like Peter, ere the cock crew thrice; and, at times, that help has wisely been withheld, to check presumptuous thoughts, and teach how true it is that the creature depends on the Creator. Temptation comes to show weak man that he was fitted for his station, and his station made for him; that fulfilment of his ignorant desires will only make his case the worse; and that

Providence alike is wise
In what he gives and what denies.—Tupper.

The first minister who preached the gospel in North America was Robert Hunt, of the Church of England, an exemplary man, who came out in the same company with Captain John Smith, in the year 1607. He was much esteemed as a man of peace, and was in many ways useful to the colony. There is no record of his death, or of his return to England; he died at Jamestown. He had a good library, which was burnt, with all his property, at the burning of Jamestown, the next winter after he came out.—Nat. Intelligencer.

GOSPEL TRUTH, AND PRIMITIVE ECCLESIASTICAL ORDER.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 11, 1849.

The Editor of the Banner, in resuming his duties, gratefully acknowledges the kindness of the Rev. Dr. Coleman, who has conducted this paper for several weeks past. Intending an absence only of three days, the Editor was suddenly taken ill in the city of New York, while attending a meeting of the Board of Trustees of the General Theological Seminary. Having made no arrangement for the paper, this unexpected detention must have occasioned great anxiety, had it not been for the prompt and ready kindness with which an abler substitute filled our vacant office. For one burdened with the cares of a large parish at this sickly season, and during the trying heat of our city, this is no small act of friendship and brotherly kindness. It was done by one who will always verify the truth of the adage, "a friend in need is a friend indeed."

We have only to fear that our readers may regret that the Editor's convalescence was so rapid, since his duties, while interrupted by sickness, could be thus provided for.

A PROMPT AND LIBERAL RESPONSE.—The Editor of the Banner has received "$50 from S. B. B. towards building a Church for the Swedes and Norwegians, under the Pastoral care of the Rev. Mr. Unonius." The contribution has been forwarded to its destination. This liberal gift is in answer to the appeal of "a Western Churchman" in the last Banner, in behalf of one of the most interesting efforts now making in the Church. It is a neighborly act, worthy of a good Samaritan—who will "go and do likewise"?

THE BISHOP ELECT OF INDIANA.

We ask, as a matter of justice to the Rev. Dr. Upfold, that the Church papers which have made strong comments upon an announcement in the Banner of July 21st will correct the unfavourable impressions produced.

The arrangement referred to was not intended to be permanent, but temporary until such time as suitable provision could be made for the Bishop's residence.

There was no assertion that this plan would be persisted in, if it seemed likely to occasion any difficulty.

From a letter, just received, from Dr. Upfold, we are authorized to announce that he has been requested, by the Rector and vestry of Christ Church, MADISON, to make that growing city his residence, and that he has returned a favourable answer to the request, deeming such a residence in all respects most eligible and convenient. He will remove there as soon as the necessary preparations can be made, if upon a personal examination his present impressions of the eligibility of this place shall be confirmed.

THE NATIONAL FAST.

For the credit of our country, and the welfare of her citizens, we rejoice to see, from all our exchanges, that the "Recommendation" of the President of the United States received such general attention.

Although the City of Philadelphia, on her own account, has cause rather for grateful thanksgiving to God for the mercy by which our citizens have been spared, we are happy to say that this day was generally marked with the solemnity of outward observance at least. There was a general cessation of business, and our houses of worship were well attended. Christian sympathy teaches us to "weep with those who weep," and that heart must be mailed in the iron panoply of selfishness which can feel no sorrow for the dread calamity which is now desolating many cities in our land, and darkening the homes of our fellow citizens with "Sorrow's dismal night," while our own homes are cheered with the light of health and happiness.

Besides, so far as this is a visitation from God upon our country, it is a judgment for national sins, and, as every citizen must share the guilt of such, so should each and every one join in that humility under the mighty hand of God which may tend to avert His just anger. And in how many awful ways is the God of heaven insulted and provoked in this Christian land. By theoretical and practical atheism, by infidelity in all its shapes; by "false doctrine, heresy and schism," by "hardness of heart and contempt of His Word and Commandments"; by open disregard of the Institutions of Christianity, by the desecration of Holy days, by loud and open mouthed profanity, by riot and debauchery: and last but not least, by that idolatry which bows down to Mammon, whose crowds of votaries swell the pilgrim trains which track the western wilds with new made graves: do the people of this land call down from heaven, in the imprecations of their idolatrous Litany, "the Pestilence after the manner of Egypt." If our awful presumption has brought the plague upon us as it did, for the same cause, upon God's people of old, let us trust that our humiliation may equally propitiate God's mercy. Who could fail to apply those appropriate verses in last Sunday's 1st Morning Lesson?

"And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, Get you up from among this congregation, that I may consume them as in a moment. And they fell upon their faces."

And Moses said unto Aaron, take a censer, and put fire therein from off the altar, and put on incense, and go quickly unto the congregation, and make an atonement for them: for there is wrath gone out from the Lord; the plague is begun.

And Aaron took as Moses commanded, and ran into the midst of the congregation; and, behold, the plague was begun among the people: and he put on incense, and made an atonement for the people.

And he stood between the dead and the living; and the plague was stayed."

We have a mightier Priest than Aaron to stand between "the dead and the living." Let us hope that the incense of Prayer and Supplication, which His earthly Priests have offered up in the midst of their congregations, at the recommendation of our earthly Rulers, may secure His all-prevailing intercession, and if He thus stands between the dead and the living, the Plague shall be stayed.

ST. LOUIS.

The mercy of God has again revisited this desolated city with comparative health. Since we penned a brief notice two weeks ago, we have received a private letter from the Editor of the "St. Louis New Era," written July 18th, and giving a most graphic account of the state of things during this awful visitation. This gentleman was reported to have fallen a victim to the pestilence, and the sad rumor brought sorrow and grief to his many friends at the East. Himself and four others of his household had the disease, and three out of the five fell victims. This letter was not written for publication, but we cannot forbear giving the following interesting extract:

"I have no heart, and scarcely the strength to write you the faintest account of the unprecedented ravages of the cholera in this city. We have tried every remedy, almost every thing that could be heard of; but the displeasure of an offended God has rested upon us for near ninety days, and we feel as if nothing would avail us until that is withdrawn. It has swept off hundreds of our best citizens and most devout Christians, and the number of married ladies that have fallen is incredible. No part of the city has been exempt, neither any class or condition in society. St. Louis is virtually a city of sorrow and lamentation, and hundreds there are who grieve as those without hope. Scarce a house can be seen but what its inmates are decked in the habiliments of woe, and those who are spared monuments of God's mercy, know not how soon they may be called upon to give up some cherished object of their earthly love. I know several instances where not a single member of whole families have been spared, and there are hundreds of others among us that have been decimated by the disease. We have interred since the first of January last, over 6500 persons in the City Cemeteries out of a population of less than 70,000 souls, and of those who have died, upwards of 4200 have been carried off by the "noisome pestilence." My family have been here during the whole of it, and we shall continue here. Our trust is in God, and from him or his wrath, there is no place whereunto man can flee with safety."

THE REV. WHITING GRISWOLD.

The notice we gave in the Banner of two weeks ago, of Bishop Hawks and the Clergy of St. Louis, was extracted from a letter of Mr. Griswold just received. Before the paper containing his words had issued, his voice was silent in the grave.

With the devotion and zeal, which have marked his whole ministerial course, he gave himself up to the trying duties of his office in the midst of disease and death.

We have never known one whose heart was more wholly given to his work. We are informed by a relative that every argument, which the earnest wishes of his friends could suggest, was employed to induce him to return to the East. His position in the West involved himself and family in many privations which he might have escaped here. His steady answer was, "No! I have put my hand to the plough here, and I will not turn back." And the private letter received by us from him, perhaps his last, was filled with proofs of his earnest devotion and zeal for the Church. He was a faithful soldier of Christ, and he fell bravely and nobly at his post, in the thick of battle, where duty placed him. Over such a grave, how sweet and consoling is that "voice from heaven," BLESSED ARE THE DEAD.

We cannot give a better conclusion to this brief record than the following just tribute:

For the Banner of the Cross.

THE CHRISTIAN HERO.

Stanzas to the memory of the Rev. Whiting Griswold, late Rector of St. John's Church, St. Louis, Mo., who recently fell a victim to the prevailing epidemic, while discharging his ministerial duty.

BY THE REV. EDWARD C. JONES.

"Thou art fallen, young tree, with all thy beauty round thee; thou art fallen on the plains, and all the field is bare. The wind comes from the desert, and there is no sound in thy leaves," Ossian—Poem of Berrathon.

And thou hast gone—the Archer's poisoned dart,
Hath sent the death-pang to thy noble heart,
Sepulchral stillness settles round thy form,
And that mild face with generous feeling warm,
No more beams out to light a kindred ray,
In eyes now doubly dimmed since thou hast passed away.

Thine was a Martyr's transit—hallowed zeal,
Bare thee right on in deeds of Christian love,
But soon did angel accents downward steal;—
"The crown, the palm-branch, wait thee now above."
In that soft cadence pain was lulled to rest,
And the dread scourge, to thee, a Messenger how blest!

When to the trumpet's clang the warrior hies,
His life-blood pledging to his native shore,
And struggling nobly, rattling hail defies,
Shouts mid his pangs, and triumphs stained with gore,
Then Freedom chants her eulogistic song,
And bids the distant age the swelling strain prolong.

And when in Duty's van the Christian falls,
Foremost and first mid pestilence and death,
Prompt to respond wherever suffering calls,
And mid his labours yielding back his breath,
Perish the thought that He should die unwept,
And have no sacred shrine in which his name is kept.

Soldier of Jesus, thou hast served thy Lord,
With faith unshrinking to the latest hour,
Pass onward, upward to thy bright reward,
The starry crown, the amaranthine bower;
Thine was the turmoil of the battle plain,
Now thine with Christ for aye a "King and Priest" to reign.

One cypress bough above thy grave we place,
Betokening sorrow for a church bereft,
One line of grief upon that stone we trace,
For friends and loved ones thou hast early left;
Then scatter flowers upon thy lowly bed,
And tears of chastened Joy are all the tears we shed.

TRINITY CHURCH, SOUTHWARK.

There is nothing which grows so fast as the spirit of improvement, especially if it is planted in a good soil, and is blessed with the labors of good husbandry. It seems but the other day that we heard of Trinity Church, Southwark, coming out with a new front, a new organ, and a new interior, so that one who had been absent from the city a few months, would have hunted in vain for "Old Trinity."

We are absent from the city only five weeks, and the first thing we hear on our return, is that "Trinity Church, Southwark, which has been closed for improvements," will be open next Sunday, &c. Curious to know where they could put the "improvements," we paid an early visit to the Church, and sure enough it was improved beyond our expectations. The walls painted in fresco, by a skilful hand, with colors of a sober hue, added greatly to the solemn character of the edifice. And then the neat and appropriate gas fixtures assured us that the dimness and smell, and smoke of horrid lamp oil, was now banished, and a clearer light, the only "new light" we prefer to "the old," would shed its brighter radiance over those pleasant evening services, in which it has often been our privilege to bear a part.

So we concluded that improvement, in any Church, might be progressive, and that it would always be so if like Trinity Church, Southwark, there was a devoted and zealous Rector, an efficient and active Warden, and a spirited and generous vestry and congregation.

We forgot to mention that in the recess behind the Pulpit, the following appropriate text of Scripture has been placed.—
"Now mine eyes shall be open, and mine ears attent unto the prayer that is made in this place."

The last CALENDAR contains a letter from the Rev. A. C. Cox, in reply to the editorial in the Banner of July 21st. We regret that the tenor of this letter demands of us its republication, as we consider this an act of great severity towards the writer. We have sought to avoid all personality in this needless controversy. We have had but one object in this matter, to clear the Church and one of her most important Institutions from charges seriously affecting the character of both. We esteem the individuals concerned in this matter of little comparative consequence. We have again and again demanded the proofs upon which the ORIGINAL CHARGE was made. That demand has never been answered. If we were disposed to feel much concern about our individual or editorial rights, all the justice we would ask of the Calendar would be the re-publication of the editorial article which called forth Mr. Coxe's letter. This would at once expose its injustice. We beg our readers will do us the justice to refer to that article as they read the following.

For the Calendar.

MR. EDITOR.—The Banner of this date contains a long article to which I am forced to reply. So far as it is abusive, I waive rejoinder; and as a great part of its argument is its own refutation, I shall touch but one or two points.

It matters very little whether the principle of my Resolutions is in itself wise, so long as I have proved that it has been a recognized principle at the Seminary, and has in the present instance been flagrantly violated, with at least the connivance of a professor who admitted the facts as I presented them to the Board. The inconsistency of that gentleman was signally rebuked, when Dr. Jarvis expressed his unaffected surprise at his admissions, and exposed the truth that having been led by that gentleman, into a practical error, he was in fact confuted by him, when he looked to be sustained. The embarrassed reply of the professor only impeached himself of the inconsistency which he disclaimed.

It is easy to draw an insulting comparison between Dr. Jarvis and so obscure an individual as myself; but as I did not venture to differ from my venerable friend, except in a point for which I was able to produce the mature judgment of professor Haight in my favor, the insult gives me very little concern.

The manoeuvre which has given this matter a personal turn is certainly cunning. It is the old tactics; divide and conquer. My apparent collision with Dr. Jarvis, I deeply feel, for it has long been my privilege to know him intimately, and to receive from him many proofs of reciprocated affection. But the collision is in fact, only with them who have betrayed him into his present position, as I undertake to show.

Bishop Brownell had refused a Visitation of the Seminary, considering it uncalled for; and asserting that "a trial or acquittal is but a poor certificate of character," and that "such a verdict may result from a want of evidence, as well as from innocence." To obtain from a venerable presbyter the Visitation which his bishop had refused; to get a verdict and acquittal without trial, and a "certificate of character" without evidence; and then to interpose the hoary honours of that presbyter between themselves and exposure—such is in brief the contrivance by which I am encountered, and to which I can afford to concede a temporary triumph.

Finding myself furiously set upon from all quarters, for asserting a simple truth, I have endeavored to be patient, and to keep to the spirit of the text—"until righteousness turn again unto judgment, all such as are true in heart shall follow it."—And now, as if the turn had come, the same number of the Banner which calls for this reply, furnishes my complete vindication. It contains a review of "the Lady Alice," as the work of an American clergyman, whom it suspects to be a papist in disguise. It is no secret that this clergyman, the reputed author, is the late Assistant Minister of the Church of the Holy Apostles, and one whose operations, "in the neighborhood of the Seminary," was considered by the Banner as affording no just ground for the Articles on Romanizing.

Yet, until those articles appeared, the disturbing influences of that gentleman, and of his patron, the Rev. Mr. Howland had invaded the Seminary, with no resistance from the Dean of the Faculty; and when that functionary was at length aroused to a tardy interference, he virtually became their champion against me, and strove to overwhelm me with "indignation." As I was then entirely unconscious of having given him the least offence, and as I had studiously worded my article, to exempt him and his respected coadjutors from censure, I was astonished at his assault; and it still remains a mystery to me, why one, to whom I had given credit for efforts to oppose the Romanizers, should do all in his power to throw away such a testimony in his favor, and to identify both himself and the Seminary, which I dearly love, with the cause of "papists in disguise."

I can safely leave my cause to that Providence which has thus far sustained it, by a series of startling and humiliating disclosures.

Truly yours,

A. C. COXE.

Hartford, July 21, 1849.

Upon the above strange letter we are compelled to make a few remarks, and we hope they will be the last we shall be driven to make on this subject.

And first, this letter accuses us of making "an insulting comparison between Dr. Jarvis" and the writer. The following are our very words:

Having listened with the deepest attention to every word spoken by Dr. Jarvis, we cannot think the following, from the Calendar, truly represents what he did say.

"He (Dr. Jarvis) had made the report in the form presented, at the suggestion of others of more experience, and with no idea of transcending his powers, of which perhaps he was ignorant."

If it does, it presents the diffidence of ripe learning and sound wisdom, in refreshing contrast with the confidence begotten of inferior knowledge, and less mature age. The Church at large will not allow her confidence in one who has grown gray in her service, and whose learning is an honor to her ministry, to be so easily shaken."

There are very few in the Church who would esteem it an insult to be thus compared with Dr. Jarvis. "The confidence" and the "less mature age" were too plain to be denied. We have only to apologize then for the "insulting comparison" conveyed in the words "inferior knowledge." We trust the writer will forgive us this wrong.

In the second place, so far as this letter refers to the Rev. Dr. Jarvis, it is most conclusively answered by his own letter. This letter should have appeared last week, only the Calendar was not received at the office of the Banner. We hope it will not be supposed that in publishing this we mean to add force to the "insulting comparison." There is something very startling in comparing the statement of Dr. Jarvis, beginning "in the second paragraph," &c. and the flat contradiction of this in the paragraph of Mr. Coxe's letter, beginning "It matters very little, &c." In the same way also compare Dr. Jarvis's account with Mr. C's assertion of "a contrivance" by which this venerable Presbyter's simplicity and "ignorance" were taken advantage of to make him the tool of a shallow design to secure "a temporary triumph" over his Bishop and his friend! But let Dr. Jarvis speak for himself.

To the Editor of the Calendar.

Rev. and dear Sir—I am not sure that the article in your paper of July 7th, headed "The Seminary," is editorial; but if it be, I beg leave to correct some statements in which you have been misinformed. In the second paragraph it is asserted that "an attempt was made to dignify the usual examination of the students with the character of an investigation. The plan originated with a professor and was inadvertently adopted by the Committee attending the examination," &c. All this is contrary to fact. When the Committee first met, I, as Chairman, proposed to them, that the professors be requested, in conducting the examination, to have especial reference to the questions between us and the Roman Communion. Every member of the Committee assented without hesitation. It was viewed as a dictate of common sense. The first professor to whom this was communicated was the venerable Dr. Wilson. The other professors were spoken to as they severally came up to salute the Committee. The students knew nothing of it; nor did the professors until they were thus privately addressed. The classes immediately separated; the professors went to their respective occupations; the Committee was subdivided, as is usual; and began their notes with a view to the final report. There was no planning about it; but all was conducted with the most perfect fairness and sincerity. During the course of the last fourteen years, I have been frequently present at these examinations, and I declare that I have never known one more creditable to the Seminary, or to its able professors.

There are many more observations in this paragraph which seem to be levelled at me, as Chairman of the Committee, but which, if you were the author, I think you could not have so designed. The Committee are spoken of as having introduced "exculpatory" remarks; as having been guilty of "inconsistency in the whole proceeding." The simple answer to this, is, that I was sustained by the whole Board. Men were present there who had been Trustees of the Seminary from its very beginning; men accustomed to the practice of the Board, familiar with precedents, and jealous of innovations. The Trustee who is said to have exposed all this, was left alone. If I understand the difference between "academic and forensic examinations," (for such I think were the terms used,) the one means an examination to ascertain the knowledge acquired by students under their teachers: the other, an examination of persons charged with offences, to decide questions of fact, and whether they are guilty or not guilty. From the very nature of the examination in the Seminary, it was purely academic; but I do not look upon the Committee as "mere spectators having no right to propose a question." I look upon them as acting in behalf of the Trustees, to examine and report with regard to the sacred trust committed to the professors of instructing young men, who are to be the future ministers of the Church. Such a Committee have a right, therefore, to receive all the information they require with regard to the manner in which that trust has been exercised; and if at any time suspicions have been excited in the public mind as to the soundness of the Seminary in the faith, they have a right to ask that such questions be proposed as may elicit the knowledge of the students and the circumspection of the professors on all such points. When a dangerous epidemic is raging, might not a College of Medical professors be asked to conduct an examination with a view of ascertaining the knowledge of the students, on that particular branch of the healing art? We are not sitting as a coroner's inquest; but we are sitting to ascertain their general knowledge of therapeutics, and how they would be likely to conduct upon a given topic of inquiry.

I desire merely, dear Mr. Editor, to guard your readers against an erroneous statement, which I am sure your candor never would have made, if you had been present, and which to me is an act of personal injustice. The Trustees were not only satisfied with my report, but they appointed me chairman of the examining committee for the next year. It is an honour which I did not covet; for it involves a great deal of labor and personal responsibility. Six hours each day for three successive days in the heat of summer is no trifle. Persuaded that you will do me justice, I remain,

With Christian regard,

Your friend and brother in the Lord,

S. FARMAR JARVIS, Chairman.

In the third place, as to the "complete vindication" furnished by our Review of "Lady Alice" we can leave our readers to judge. We would not insult them by supposing they could not discover the difference between judging and condemning a Book, and judging and condemning a brother Presbyter in a case where he is amenable only to his own Bishop, if indeed the Presbyter referred to be the Author of that Book, which he himself has not declared. The cause we have to sustain is not our own, it is the cause of the Church, and we can safely leave that to the care of the Providence who has promised to be an eternal safeguard.

N. B. The above was sent by the Editor for last week—but came too late for publication.

POPULAR RELIGIONISM.

To the Editor of the Banner of the Cross.

DEAR SIR:—

The following specimen of "popular religionism" has been placarded in the streets of Trenton. I take the liberty of sending it to you, thinking it may be of interest to your readers as showing the presumptuous impiety into which those men may rush, who acknowledged no better guide than their own opinions and fancies.

"RELIGIOUS ENTERPRISE.

ESTABLISHMENT OF PRIMITIVE CHRISTIANITY.

Mr. Mitchell, being anxious to have that standard which has been erected for the people's happiness again extend itself over every country, kingdom, realm and republic of the world; that the time may come or be brought about, when peace shall be the constant companion of us all, he solicits an interview with those who are willing to labour with him for the accomplishment of so excellent a work. He has selected the grove near John Moses', to meet with those who may favor him with their attention, on next SUNDAY, July 22, at 2 o'clock, P. M., and there reason with them from the following words:

'And this Gospel of the Kingdom shall be preached in all the world, for a witness unto all nations, and then shall the end come.' Matt. chap. 24 verse 14."

N. B. Seats and cold water in readiness.

Our friend who furnishes the above need not think that such instances of religious extravagance are new or strange things even in Philadelphia. The (so called) religious notices in our daily papers furnish marvellous illustrations of similar "developments." We take the following from a city paper of Wednesday.

"A WARNING TO THE PEOPLE.

A poor frail mortal, known by the name of ASAHIEL TROTH, is commanded by the Lord to be at INDEPENDENCE SQUARE, in the city of Philadelphia, about the hour of 11, THIS MORNING, that the Lord may speak through him to His people. He is a member of no sect or religious society, but a living monument of the Lord's mercy."

NASHVILLE, TENNESSEE.

A correspondent kindly furnishes us with the following interesting intelligence:—

The cholera has entirely disappeared from the city, which was never healthier than now. You will be gratified to learn that a second parish is about being formed here under the management of the Rev. John P. T. Ingraham, late Rector of Trinity Church, Milwaukee, who has recently been sent here as a Missionary by Bishop Otey. Mr. Ingraham is a graduate of Nashotah, is a man of zeal, energy, piety and sound churchmanship, and he would not be a true Nashotah man if he were not so. In conjunction with the Rev. Mr. Tomes, Rector of Christ Church, a Clergyman of the genuine Apostolic spirit, it is to be hoped the second parish will soon be firmly established. This city contains 21,000 inhabitants, and hitherto has had but one parish within its limits.

I am glad to say that the Church is looking up and steadily and strongly advancing in this diocese. The clergy, twenty-one in number, as a body are talented and laborious, and, what is better, are as united as a band of brothers. The Church by their efforts is beginning to be understood, as she ever will be where she maintains the dignity of her mission with firmness and consistency. The sects here, once paramount, are daily weakened by divisions and sub-divisions; and in the instability of their own societies, men are looking round for some church "founded upon a rock" in which they can rest secure, and they welcome gladly the Church!

Daily service, which, when commenced here five months ago by Rev. Mr. Tomes, was opposed with bitterness by many churchmen, and which began with but two or three in attendance, is now well attended, morning and evening, and felt to be a great blessing. "How could we have lived without the daily prayer so long!" is now the exclamation of many. I trust the day is at hand when every Clergyman of the Church will feel it both his duty and privilege to have daily service. If "he that offereth me praise honoreth me," as saith God, how much more will he be honored by daily worship? Already the good effects of our daily prayer is being felt in the community. Ladies do not find that it "takes the time" they thought it would. They now dress for their afternoon walks or calls and for prayers all in one, and either start to do their shopping or make their calls sometime before the hour of prayer (six), or transact their affairs afterwards. We have the weekly offertory, which works admirably, and hope soon to have weekly communion. If the clergy will be true to their ordination vows, the west will be ere long, a strong-hold of the Church.

LADY ALICE.

THE EPISCOPAL RECORDER of last week has the following:

When it appeared two weeks ago the editor pro tem. of the Banner of the Cross reviewed it in a very impartial manner, a previous cursory glance having led him to the conclusion that it was a production of a Jesuit in disguise. The Calendar has published the review, and more than intimated that the late assistant minister of the Church of the Holy Apostles in New York is the writer of this strange, if not heterodox and indecent work.

Again. Whatever course the absent editor might have taken matters little; it will be seen by the following item which we clip from the last Banner, that his substitute in the editorial chair has bolted out the name, with all its titles and its past connexions.

If the Editor of the Recorder will recur to that Banner, he will find that "the impartial Review" was written not by "the Editor pro tem.," but by "the absent Editor." And further, we beg to inform him that the reason we had for giving so much attention to this worthless production, was the report coming from a reliable source that its author was one of our Clergy.—And still further, we are guilty of conveying to the kind "substitute" who filled our place, the first information as to its then supposed Authorship. As we are sure the Recorder has made the above statement inadvertently, we ask that this paper will do us the justice to correct it.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—AMICUS, is informed, what most readers of the Banner knew, that the EDITOR OF THE BANNER has been absent from the city for near five weeks.

Foreign Intelligence

BY THE LAST STEAMER.

The (London) Guardian in its account of the Parliamentary Week, gives the following in reference to the Irish Church.

We have first a motion for confiscating the temporalities of the Irish Church—a brief notice of which was contained in our Postscript last week—and the debate on which was principally remarkable for the very right-principled and able defence delivered by Mr. Napier, of the claims and position of the Irish Church as representative of the old Christian Church in that island. We only wish that she had ever acted, or would consistently act, up to those claims and that position. The principal point of the attack now made against her, is her admitted failure as a missionary Church, she having manifestly no claim to be the Church of the people, and, therefore, as it is urged, no other ground for asking support except this wanting one of missionary success. The motion was only for a committee on the temporalities of the Church, and did not, therefore, necessarily exclude from supporting it those who thought that the excess of revenue beyond what was required for the Church of one-eighth of the population, ought not to be confiscated for secular purposes, but given to the endowment of the Roman communion, or other like ends. The motion was, however, lost by 170 to 103, a very considerable majority; and one which goes far to justify Mr. Osborne's expression, that he was then celebrating the last obsequies of the famous, but long deceased, appropriation clause.

The following from the English Churchman shows how glorious works of charity may be done on a large scale, if men have only "the mind of Christ."

We are glad to see by a recent circular, that the Committee for supplying "ten!" additional Churches, Parsonage-houses, and schools, to the destitute parish of Bethnal Green, have determined in faith, to finish their gigantic scheme begun ten years since, and to make a crowning effort amongst their friends to that effect, combining therewith a well-merited compliment to their invaluable Treasurer, Mr. WILLIAM COTTON, to whose indomitable energy and unwearied labour, as the prime originator and chief promoter of the scheme, they consider themselves and the subscribers mainly indebted, under God, for its success.

This wretched parish had, ten years since, two Churches only, for a population of 75,000 souls! It already has eleven, and shortly will have twelve! each with its resident Pastor, aided in some cases by Curates and Scripture Readers—and, in all by schools and provident and district visiting Societies—to say nothing of other benevolent institutions, and the physical as well as moral purifications making way daily amidst a mass of poor inhabitants, at this time numbering little below 80,000!

We have reason to believe that the appeal is being fairly responded to—and we heartily wish it well, as a "Corron Memorial," but the higher motive involved ought, with Churchmen, to be wholly irresistible.

ROME.

It is generally thought that the position of the French, now that they have got into Rome (resembling in this, the case of some individuals) is rather more trying than when they were battering and being battered before the walls of the seven hilled city. Now they have got in, the question is, how are they to get out? This question should always be settled by those who meditate a similar entry. Instead of helping the Pope, they have made his position only more difficult. The temper of the Roman people is not to be mistaken, when a Priest is assassinated for shouting "Viva Pio Nono! A basso la Republica." It is certain that the Pope cannot resume his temporary authority at Rome, without keeping General Oudinot to guard him, and even then he would not be safe. We find that he has no present intention of returning to Rome.

A letter from Marseilles, written on the 9th instant, and published by the Univers, the organ of the clergy, shows that, notwithstanding so much said to the contrary by the French papers, the Pope has not yet abandoned the idea of taking refuge in Bologna rather than Rome:—

"I am informed that the diplomatic negotiations are proceeding in such a manner that the Holy Father has every reason to be satisfied. It is thought that his Holiness will immediately send a Commission of Government to Rome. It is said that Pius the Ninth will go to Naples, in order to return thanks in person to King Ferdinand for his generous hospitality. I am also assured that his Holiness will afterwards go to Benevento, and that his intention is to remain in that town until the Commission of Government shall put affairs into some kind of order. Should that occasion too long a delay, his Holiness intends going to Bologna, and living there till the moment when he may think fit to return to his capital."

The Journal des Debats of yesterday publishes the following letter addressed by Pope Pius IX. to General Oudinot, and forwarded by Colonel Niel, who was sent to Gaeta to present the keys of Rome to his Holiness:—

"General—The well-known valour of the French arms, supported by the justice of the cause which they defended, has borne the fruit due to such arms—victory. Accept, General, my felicitations for the principal part which is due to you in that event—felicitations, not for the blood spilt, which my heart abhors, but for the triumph of order over anarchy, for liberty restored to the honest and Christian people, for whom it will be no longer a crime to enjoy the benefits which God has conferred upon them, and to adore with the religious pomp of public worship without running the risk of losing their lives or their liberties.

"As to the grave difficulties which must be hereafter met I confide myself to the divine protection. I believe it will not be without its utility to the French army to know the history of the events which have succeeded each other during my pontificate. They are set forth in my allocation, which is known to you, General, but of which I send you a certain number of copies that you may give them to be read by those whom you think may profit by being made acquainted with them. That document will prove sufficiently that the triumph of the French army has been gained over the enemies of human society, and that triumph ought of itself to raise sentiments of gratitude in the hearts of all the honest men in Europe and in the entire world.

"Colonel Niel, who, with your very honoured despatch, has presented to me the keys of one of the gates of Rome, will hand you this letter. It is with much satisfaction that I profit by this intermediation to express to you my sentiments of paternal affection, and the assurance of the prayers which I address continually to the Lord in your behalf, in behalf of the French army, of the French Government, and of all France.

"Receive the Apostolic benediction which I give you from my heart.

"Datum Cajetæ, die 5 Julii, 1849." "PIUS P. P. IX."

MISCELLANEOUS.

The marriage of the Bishop of Victoria, on Wednesday last, to the daughter of the Rector of Beckenham, created quite a village festival:—

"The children of the National Schools were stationed from the door of the rectory-house on each side of the carriage-way leading to the church, holding bouquets of flowers and decorated with rosettes, provided for them by the bride, who had been in the habit of almost daily attending to their interests. This observation more especially refers to the children of the Infant School, established under her beneficent authority. Their parents and brothers and sisters were admitted to the grounds, and formed in lines behind the children, who strewed flowers upon the path as the bride passed along, leaning upon the arm of her father, who led her directly to the altar, where the Bishop of Victoria was waiting. The Archbishop was attended by the Rev. William Vine and the Rev. John Brandram, in their robes. At the conclusion of the ceremony, the party returned to the rectory, and very soon afterwards the Archbishop, the bride and bridegroom, the clergy, and the friends of the happy pair, appeared upon the lawn in front of the house, and every child was presented with a Bible by the young lady, who received many a blessing for her indefatigable exertions to enhance the spiritual and temporal interests of the poor. After breakfast the Bishop and his lady left the rectory for the Isle of Wight, whence they will, after the honeymoon, depart in one of the Peninsular and Oriental Company's splendid vessels for Hong-Kong in China."

On Sunday week, after the sermon, in compliance with the Queen's letter, was preached in Hullavington church, Wiltshire, by the Rev. William Carter, vicar of the parish, the plate was taken to the three principal farmers, who each in succession refused to hold it at the door. The vicar's lady, on seeing this, left her pew, took the plate, and stationed herself at the door; but, after a few persons had passed, the plate was observed to drop from her hand, and she fell in a state of insensibility, and so continued until her death, which took place between seven and eight o'clock in the evening of the same day. A medical gentleman was prompt in attendance, who gave his opinion that death was occasioned by apoplexy, and a verdict was returned to that effect. The deceased, who was a most amiable lady, was forty-two years of age.—Cambridge Chron.

It is stated that the three Clergymen in succession who were appointed Chaplains to the Liverpool Cemetery have become mentally deranged. The circumstance is attributed to their constant repetition (sometimes as often as six times in a day) of the funeral service, and the impressiveness of the sad spectacle of which they were habitually the spectators.

Mr. Horace Smith, of Brighton, one of the authors of "Rejected Addresses," died at Tunbridge Wells last week, of ossification of the heart, aged 70.

STATE OF EUROPE.

[Extracted from the English Churchman.]

FRANCE is quiet at present, but there are evident symptoms of a disturbance taking place before long. A struggle must soon ensue between the Republicans and Monarchists. The Ministry is in a moribund state, and it is said that they are to have a MOLE and THIERS administration, assisted by MONTALAMBERT DE FALLOUX, DE RUILHERES, CECILE, &c., but this we cannot believe. The pear is not ripe enough for such a combination yet. GENERAL LAMORICIERE has been sent, as Ambassador Extraordinary, to Russia. The village of La Republic near Lyons was destroyed by a water-spout, on the 10th inst., during the prevalence of a violent thunder storm. The pyramid erected in commemoration of the birth of the King of Rome, was also injured by the lightning—Ominous events these both to the Republic and LOUIS NAPOLEON.

The French army has not been well received at Rome—on the day of its entry into the city, seventeen assassinations took place. It took the French two months to get into Rome, but it will take them a longer time to get out of it again. We fancy they will not find the Pope very accommodating.

On the 6th instant the Danes made a successful sortie from the Fortress of Frederica, and drove the Schleswig-Holstein army under General BONIV out of all their positions. It seems to have been a complete surprise. The Schleswig-Holstein army must have lost, in killed and wounded, at least 3,000 men—almost at the same time an armistice for six months was concluded at Berlin between Prussia and Denmark. This is expected to lead to a treaty of peace, the principal condition of which will be the legislative independence of Schleswig, which will be united to Denmark only by the link of the Crown.

The Russians have taken Newsohl, Kremnitz, Königsberg, Altschl, and Schemnitz. They have also taken Debretzten, which is an open town, and therefore indefensible. KOSSUTH is at Szegeden; the BAN at Foldvar. KLAPHA has the chief command at Comorn. BEN is at Hermansstadt with 36,000 men. 20,000 Russians have arrived at Cracow, being the advanced guard of an army of 54,000 men. It is evident from these movements, that the Magyars, having left a strong garrison at Comorn, are gradually retreating into their fastnesses. We have no news of DEMBINSKI, but we fancy he is attempting to make a diversion in the direction of Poland. It is said that the Turks have positively refused to allow the Russian troops to march through their territory.

HUME'S HISTORY OF ENGLAND.

History of England from the invasion of Julius Cæsar to the abdication of James the second, by DAVID HUME: and continued from that period to the present time, by T. BABINGTON MACAULAY. Published by PHILIPS, SAMPSON & Co., Boston.

The interest which the wonderful popularity of Macaulay has thrown around this subject, must create a desire to trace further back, the stream of the eventful tide which has ever marked the course of English History. Under no better guide can this be done, at present, than the Author whose work is now presented to the American public, in a cheap, convenient, and attractive form. We think that the excellence of Hume, as a historian, will become more manifest when contrasted with Macaulay. The former seems most anxious to present the plain, simple truth of history, while the latter appears to think more of his style than of his facts, and would sacrifice everything, almost truth itself, to make a brilliant point, or striking antithesis. For all this he has done good service in directing the popular taste to history, too long sated with trashy novels and romances. The publishers too have done good service, who labor to meet this better demand, and we hope those who are re-publishing the present work, will receive a degree of encouragement which will lead them and others to provide this more wholesome food for the public. The Publishers thus state the manner in which this work will be issued.

"Hume will be comprised in six volumes, which will be issued separately, at intervals of about a month. Two volumes of the continuation of Macaulay having been published, the balance will be issued, in uniform style, immediately on their appearance in London.

The whole, when complete, will form the cheapest and most readable edition of the two authors now extant."

ST. PAUL'S COLLEGE, COLLEGE POINT, NEW YORK.—We have received the Journal of this Institution, containing its course of study, manner of discipline, and religious training, together with the "Register of the officers and students." The admirable situation of this school, and the good work which has been done there for the Church, are well known to all our Readers. Under the present rule, the general system formerly pursued by Dr. Muhlenburg is continued, and the high character of its rector, the Rev J. G. Barton, gives the strongest assurance that all its promises will be faithfully performed.

THE SPIRIT OF MISSIONS, JULY AND AUGUST.—This is a most interesting number, and contains an unusual amount of most instructive and important matter. Among other things the admirable sermon before the Board, by the Bishop of New Hampshire. Want of room prevents us in our present number giving, as we shall do hereafter, a fuller notice of this excellent practical discourse. How important its subject is, for the present day, our readers may judge from the text—"And the second is like unto it—Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself." Besides this, there is a full account of the proceedings of the last Board, and all the important Documents presented to it. Of these too we shall have more to say hereafter.

JOURNAL OF THE DIOCESE OF CONNECTICUT, SIXTY-FIFTH ANNUAL CONVENTION, 1849.—We can only acknowledge, at present, the receipt of the above, as well as the JOURNAL OF THE PROCEEDINGS OF THE DIOCESAN CONVENTION OF DELAWARE, 1849.—And with this a copy of the sermon delivered before the Convention by the Bishop, published by request of that body, and entitled, THE SOCIETY OF DIVINE ORIGINAL. The text is from Ephesians ii. 19.

THE GREATER MERCY.

"How great a mercy," is the exclamation of the Christian who has been sick, nigh unto death, when he feels the first reviving breath of returning health. His soul doth magnify the Lord and his spirit doth rejoice in God his Saviour. The incense of his grateful heart is, praise the Lord, oh my soul, and forget not all His benefits, who healeth all thine infirmities and saveth thy life from destruction. And it is meet, right and our bounden duty, that we should, at all times of recovery, give thanks unto Thee, O Lord, Holy Father, Almighty, Everlasting God. Is it not a mercy that the healing power of the Great Physician has thus given to beloved relatives and friends, the oil of joy for mourning, the garments of praise for the spirit of heaviness? Is it not a mercy, that he who was hard at death's door, is restored to a sphere of existence where he may glorify God, where he may do good and communicate, where he may win a yet brighter crown of righteousness, a larger measure of those pleasures which are at God's right hand for evermore?

But is there not associated with this sense of thankfulness, this appreciation of restored health as a great mercy, the feeling, scarce recognised, perhaps, that a great evil was avoided, when the feet which stood upon the crumbling brink of the grave, were turned back into the path of life? Is it not too much forgotten that the great mercy of restoration was but an alternative of mercies, the lesser mercy compared with admission into that rest which remaineth for the people of God? and is there not the feeling, that in attempting to cherish such a view, we do but

"Strive to wind ourselves too high
For mortal man beneath the sky?"

Yet hear what St. Paul saith, essentially only such a christian as every one that nameth the name of Christ, may be and should, "For to me, to die is gain." "For I have a desire to depart and be with Christ, which is far better." "Earnestly desiring to be clothed upon with our house which is from heaven." But where the waves of the life that now is break upon the shores of eternity, there is the high rolling, loud roaring surf of death: and when the voyage of time is over, we must land through the surf. This, to nearly all, is fearful, and it has its perils too. So doth the Church teach us, when, in her burial service, she puts into our mouths the earnest supplication, "O holy and merciful Saviour, Thou most worthy judge eternal, suffer us not, at our last hour, for any pains of death to fall from Thee." Hence, doubtless, the estimate placed upon recovery. And, unquestionably, with this natural shrinking from the pains and perils of the last end, may be conjoined, a faith that looketh for a city that hath foundations and a sincere and earnest desire to be with Christ: a faith that would eagerly hasten to fruition, a desire that would claim its gratification, crying aloud, when shall I come to appear before the presence of God, if only it were possible to glide through a passage, without terrors or dangers, to the shores of a better country, even an heavenly; if it might only be as it was with him of whom St. Paul writes, "By faith Enoch was translated that he should not see death."

But may we not fear that often, something besides "this natural shrinking," combines to invest recovery with the aspect it wears and to inspire the heart with the feeling that there could even have been no greater mercy? Is there no room to suspect a dimness or feebleness of that faith which is "the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen?" Is there not warranted, even a fearfulness of the test, "For where your treasure is there will your heart be also?"

Says one, speaking of the hope set before us, not yet, alas, laid hold upon by himself, "I can imagine its delights, but, alas, do not feel its reality, but feel that the conviction of its reality must bring its delights." Have we not here the very root of whatever may be defective in the christian's views and feelings, in reference to a departure out of this life; the very root of his inability to look upon that as the greater mercy? Should not, therefore, a wise suspicion and distrust, an holy jealousy make us send up, untiringly, the cry of conscious need, "Lord I believe, help Thou mine unbelief." "Lord increase our faith?" Only when indeed we are obedient to the injunction, "Set your affection on things above, not on things on the earth, for ye are dead and your life is hid with Christ, in God," only then shall we be both looking for and hastening unto the coming of the day of God; only then, as the earthly house of this tabernacle shall be dissolving, will the voice of praise and thanksgiving respond to God's appointment, bless the Lord, O my soul, He giveth thee the greater mercy.

Obituary.

The following brief and pertinent notice is written by the beloved Bishop who watched over the Ministerial life and Christian death of our departed brother. We take the liberty of making this known for two reasons. Such an assurance will enhance the value of this faithful record. The writers of such notices may have an example of brevity which, for the sake of others, it would be well to follow.

For the Banner of the Cross.

Departed this life in Tuscaloosa, Ala., on the morning of the 21st of July, the Rev. C. F. PEAKE, after a lingering illness of seven weeks continuance. In the death of this worthy man, cut off by pulmonary consumption, in the morning of his days, the Church has lost a devoted and faithful minister, and the cause of Christian education, a most able and zealous advocate and promoter. In the language of the Church, "he has been gathered to his fathers, having the testimony of a good conscience, in the communion of the Catholic Church:—in the confidence of a certain faith:—in the comfort of a reasonable, religious, and holy hope:—in favour with his God, and in perfect charity with the world." It may be gratifying to his distant friends, to know that his last days were spent in the house of the Bishop of the Diocese, and that every thing was done for him that could be suggested or provided by kindness and christian sympathy.

The following resolutions in reference to his death were passed by the Vestry of Christ Church, Tuscaloosa.

Resolved, That in the bereavement, with which in the inscrutable ways of Providence, the congregation of Christ Church, Tuscaloosa, have been visited in the death of their late assistant minister, they have to deplore the loss of a pious and faithful Pastor: that the Church has been deprived of an ardent and devoted minister and missionary; the cause of Christian education, of a zealous, active, and affectionate friend, and the community, of a christian gentleman.

Resolved, That we tender to his bereaved friends, the assurance of our sincere christian sympathy.

July 25, 1849.

For the Banner of the Cross.

DIED, on Monday evening the 23rd of July, in this city, at the residence of her brother-in-law, George Lippincott, Mrs. ANNE CAROLINE, wife of E. T. Turner, of Ithaca N. Y., and daughter of the late Ebenezer Greenough, Esq., of Sunbury, Pa.

Thus has passed to her rest in the spring time of life, a daughter of the Church, who in the school of affliction was made meet for the inheritance of the Saints in light; one who in the morn of youth, sought the guidance and protection of the Church, and continued to walk in her ordinances to life's last scenes; one who through a long and painful sickness constantly maintained the uncomplaining temper of the christian; until the hour came when she was gathered to her fathers, "having the testimony of a good conscience, in the communion of the Catholic Church, in the confidence of a certain faith, and in the comfort of a reasonable, religious and holy hope." "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord: even so, saith the Spirit; for they rest from their labours." M.

From the Calendar.

We have the painful duty of announcing that the Rev. CALEB S. IVES, Missionary at Metagorda, Texas, died at Tinnmouth, Vermont, on the 27th ult. Mr. Ives was graduated at Trinity College in 1830, and afterwards pursued his Theological studies at the General Seminary. For several years past he has been a laborious and faithful missionary in Texas. His arduous labors there, together with the enervating character of the climate, had so undermined his health, that he was constrained to leave his post and seek renewed strength for his Master's work in his native air of Vermont. A few weeks since we saw him when on his way north. He was very feeble, and we anticipated for him only returning health. It only now remains for us to bow submissively to the afflictive dispensation of an all-wise Providence.

No snow falls lighter than the snow of age; none heavier, for it never melts.

Miscellaneous.

PRESENT STATE OF THE SEVEN CHURCHES.

At a recent meeting of the Asiatic Society, the Secretary read a memoir, by Captain J. T. Newbold, on the present condition of the seven Churches of Asia, mentioned in the Revelation, which the writer has recently visited. He observes that the history of these interesting localities is well known; but their present condition has been little known. His account with th

John, and that of VOL. XI.—No. 33.—WHOLE No. 555. in giving a title only Bishops at tance. the por as shown by this Report, to be as satisfactory as morass, and for reference to the Mission to the Jews, they regret the site of the once populous city. The village of Ayasulux stands about a mile from the ruins, and contains about forty scattered cottages, one only tenanted by a Christian. The mosque of the village contains only four granite columns, said to have belonged to the great temple of Diana, whose ruins are still visible near the port. The mosque is going to decay like the Christian church, and every thing appears to be in the last stage of dissolution. Captain Newbold noticed that some of the granite which formed part of the ancient temple, had exfoliated evidently from extreme heat; and he suggests that this might have happened when the temple was consumed by fire.

Smyrna, the most flourishing of the whole, is an increasing city. Its population, which twenty years ago was about 77,000, is now 130,000, and is rapidly increasing. There are five Greek, three Latin, and two Protestant churches. The Greeks have numerous schools, and the Latins a large college; but the Protestant Schools have failed. The Greek Church at Smyrna continues in a flourishing condition.

Pergamos is the most prosperous of the churches, after Smyrna. The population is 16,000, of whom 14,000 are Turks, and nearly all the rest Christians. The Christian quarter contains two Greek churches and one Armenian. Close to the ancient church he found a Greek school, where the pupils were seated on marble tomb-stones, which formed the pavement of the school. He gives copies of three of the inscriptions there, none of which have hitherto been published.

Thyatira is still a flourishing town. It had been lost to the Christian world from the fall of Constantinople, under the Turkish name of Alkhisar, until brought to light in the seventeenth century. The population is above 19,000, of whom 2,000 are Greeks, and 120 Armenians, each having a church; the former said to be on the site of the Apocalyptic church.

Sardis, the ancient capital of Cræsus, is now more desolate than even Ephesus. Scarcely a house remains. The melancholy Gyraen Lake, the swampy plain of the Hermus, and the thousand mounds forming the metropolis of the Lydian monarch, among which rises conspicuously the famed tumulus of Alyattes, produce a scene of gloomy solemnity. Massive ruins of buildings still remain, the wall of which is made up of sculptured pieces of Corinthian and Ionic columns, that once formed portions of the ancient temples. The Pactolus, famed for its golden sands, contains no gold; but the sparkling grains of mica, with which the sand abounds, have probably originated the epithet. Captain Newbold suggests that the singular tumuli of Sardis deserved to be opened, and recommends the subject to the attention of the Society.

Philadelphia has a population of 10,000 Turks and 8,000 Greeks. It contains 25 churches, all small and mean, but containing fragments of ancient sepulchres. A massive ruin was pointed out as the church of the Apocalypse.

Laodicea, whose fate has been forgotten for centuries, was brought to light in the seventeenth century. It was and is a mass of desolate ruins. The hills on which it stands have been supposed to be volcanic, but erroneously. They are composed of aqueous beds, chiefly lime.—Church of England Magazine.

SUSPICION.

Suspicious amongst thoughts are like bats amongst birds, they even fly by twilight. Certainly they are to be repressed, or at least well guarded, for they cloud the mind, they lose friends, and they check with business whereby business cannot go on currently and constantly. They dispose kings to tyranny, husbands to jealousy, wise men to irresolution and melancholy. They are defects, not in the heart, but in the brain, for they take place in the stoutest natures, as in example of Henry the Seventh of England, there was not a more suspicious man, nor a more stout. And in such a composition they do small hurt. For commonly they are not admitted but with examination, whether they be likely or no? but in fearful natures they gain ground too fast. There is nothing makes a man suspect much more than to know little, and therefore men should remedy suspicion, by procuring to know more, and not to keep their suspicions in smother.

What would men have? Do they think those they employ and deal with are saints? Do they think they will have their own ends, and be truer to themselves than to them? Therefore there is no better way to moderate suspicions, than to account upon such suspicions as true, and yet to bridle them as false; for so far a man ought to make use of suspicions, as to provide, as if that should be true that he suspects, yet he may do him no hurt. Suspicions, that the mind of itself gathers, are but buzzes; but suspicions that are artificially nourished and put into men's heads by the tales and whisperings of others, have stings. Certainly the best means to clear the way in this same wood of suspicions, is frankly to communicate them with the party that he suspects, for thereby he shall be sure to know more of the truth of them than he did before, and withal shall make that party more circumspect, not to give further cause of suspicion. But this would not be done to men of base natures; for they, if they find themselves once suspected, will never be true. The Italian says, Sospetto licentia fede, as if suspicion did give a passport to faith; but it ought rather to kindle it, to discharge itself.—Lord Bacon.

DIOCESE OF MASSACHUSETTS.

STANDING COMMITTEE.—At a meeting of the Standing Committee, holden on the second day of July, testimonials were signed in favor of the consecration of the Rev. Wm. M. Greene, D. D., of North Carolina, as Bishop of the Diocese of Mississippi.

July 18, testimonials in favor of the Rev. Thos. R. Pynchon were signed, recommending him to be admitted to Priest's Orders.

August 6, testimonials were signed in favor of the Rev. Lewis Greene, recommending him to be admitted to Priest's Orders. Also, in favor of George A. Gordon, and Horatio Gray, to be admitted as candidates for Holy Orders.

The Committee declined signing the testimonials in favor of the consecration of the Rev. Dr. Upfold, to the Episcopate of the Diocese of Indiana, in consequence of the arrangement said to have been made by which he was to retain his parish and residence in the Diocese of Pennsylvania, after his consecration as Bishop of Indiana.—Witness.

BISHOP DELANCEY'S VISITATION.

On Tuesday, the 24th of July, Bishop DeLancey visited St. John's Church, Mt. Morris. The Bishop preached and confirmed eight persons.

On the 25th, being St. James' day, the Bishop preached, confirmed three persons, and administered the holy communion in St. Peter's Church, Dansville.

On the 26th, in St. Michael's Church, Geneseo, the Bishop preached and confirmed one person.

On the 27th, the Bishop officiated in Zion Church, Avon. The Bishop preached and confirmed six persons.

On the 29th, the Bishop visited Rochester.—As Trinity Church was undergoing repairs and improvements, the services for it were deferred.

In the morning, in St. Luke's Church, the Bishop preached and confirmed twenty-four persons, including one from the Diocese of Quebec.

In the evening, services were held in Grace Church. The Bishop preached and confirmed seventeen persons.—Gos. Mess.

MISSIONS.

The following Report of Committees of the Board of Missions will set before the Church the state of her Missionary operations. They are worthy of attentive consideration.

The Bishop of Maine, as Chairman to the Committee to whom was referred the Report of the Foreign Committee, presented the following Report:

The Committee to whom was referred the report of the Foreign Committee, with the accompanying documents, have examined them with great interest, and with as much care as the time would allow.

They rejoice that the Foreign Committee have been able to reach and maintain the desirable position of freedom from all embarrassment; and that the constancy, and in some instances, the large liberality of donations for particular Missions, has indicated so warm a zeal in many hearts for the wider propagation of the blessed Gospel.

It may be important to draw the attention of the Board to the fact, that the entire receipts of the year having been $41,453, and the total expenditure $40,833, of which $34,665 have been expended at the Missions, no less a proportion of this last sum than $30,406 has been contributed under special designation of particular Missions. The China Mission, with all its expenditures for building, has been sustained by such contributions, to within four hundred dollars; the expensive African Mission, to within seven hundred dollars; the Mission at Constantinople to the extent of three-fourths of the annual appropriation; and that at Athens to the extent of more than half. It appears that the actual amount of contributions, the object of which was not specified, was, after deducting the central expenses, little more than four thousand dollars. Without any further remarks on this wide preference of special over undesignated contributions, it is still a fact of importance in the history of our Mission.

The adoption of the season of the Epiphany as an occasion for collections in aid of what may be termed the further "manifestation of Christ to the Gentiles," is so evidently appropriate, and so many parishes may be led to some effort by the recurrence of the occasion fixed by general consent, that the custom of Epiphany collections for Foreign Missions may very well become an established usage.

Thus far, the experiment of reliance on the parochial clergy as the only agents, in addition to the Secretary, for the collection of funds, has been prosperous; and it should seem that it cannot fail, except with a failing zeal of the clergy or under circumstances which need not now be anticipated.

An experience of eighteen years of honored and successful labor justifies the strongest confidence towards the missionaries at Athens. In such confidence, it is still hoped and believed that they will be ready with the same discretion which has characterized their whole course, yet with entire frankness and fulness, to present the doctrines of salvation and the principles of our reformed Church to those whose influence may one day be of great importance to the triumph of the same doctrines and principles in the Churches of the East.

The Committee concur in the views of the Senior Missionary at Cape Palmas, with respect to the establishment of a High School in that colony. To send African youths to this country for education is a measure demanding maturer consideration than the Committee can now bestow. They have some reason to believe that the desired aid of a colored clergyman may shortly be obtained for the Mission at Cape Palmas. The wants and prospects of this Mission cannot but continually suggest how much it might gain through the supervision of a wise, diligent, and self-denying Bishop.

Peculiar causes for devout gratitude are found in the continuance of the life and labors of the Missionary Bishop in China; in the very zealous and efficient exertions of his associates; in the liberality with which the erection of his Church and school, as well as the Mission itself, has been sustained; in the actual conversion of a few, as the first fruits of our Church amongst the Chinese; and in the near approach of the day when one of them is to be ordained as a minister of this Church amongst his countrymen, the first man of Pagan birth who has ever been received to its orders.

The Church having decided that Foreign Missionary Bishops should be sent to China and the dominions of the Sultan, it is clearly the duty of this Board to do all which lies in their power to sustain alike the interests of both. Since the Mission of the American Bishop to Shanghai, measures have been taken for the establishment of the Diocese of Victoria, in the Island of Hong-Kong, belonging to Great Britain, and a Bishop of the Church of England has been consecrated for that See. Your Committee trust that the General Convention will hereafter adopt all such conciliatory means as may promote a cordial unity of operations between the Missionary Bishop in China and the Bishop of Victoria, who are happily united in that one communion and fellowship which existed in Apostolic times, and continues in the reformed branches of the Catholic Church.

While the honorable and judicious purpose of the Foreign Committee, to regard the funds designated for particular Missions as inviolable, is worthy of entire approbation, it was neither foreseen by them nor by the Board, that the operation of the rule which was in consequence adopted, could bring such painful inconvenience to the Missionary Bishop at Constantinople. Most deeply will this result be deplored by all alike; and the Church would certainly see with extreme regret, so important a measure as the relinquishment of this Mission even made a subject of deliberation on a ground so simply financial and executive, and for reasons so insignificant in comparison with the great objects for which the Mission was undertaken. It would cast reproach and disgrace upon the Church, if a difficulty, thus sent out, should be suffered to struggle with such difficulties, involving a loss of credit; and measures should be promptly taken to relieve his harassed mind and to meet his wants, by regular—and, if possible, quarterly remittances. The Committee are relieved from the necessity of dwelling on this subject by the conclusion to which, after due consultation of the canons, and of the proceedings of the General Convention in the origination of the Foreign Missionary Episcopate, they have, with perfect unanimity, arrived; for, they are convinced that this Board has no authority whatever to receive or entertain any proposal of any Missionary Bishop to resign an authority which did not emanate from that Board, and over which the Board has no control.
